Editorial Preface

Regular church-goers have sometimes remarked on an oddity of modern preaching: many sermons are delivered in apparent unawareness of the last two centuries of biblical scholarship and theological discussion. To a less dramatic extent, there has been a similar situation in the resources available to students of seventeenth-century literature. For many years now, no teaching anthology has been available which reflects current scholarship and criticism. As long ago as 1986 I wrote to a major American publisher, drawing attention to this situation. They were not interested, and there the matter rested until several years later a publisher's representative came to my office, and I suggested that his firm might consider the relationship between scholarly discussion and available classroom texts. No longer thinking of compiling such an anthology myself, and unaware that I was talking to Broadview's president, I had no idea what this brief conversation was to lead to.

One more piece of history. On accepting the commission I suggested that, while I take responsibility for male-authored verse, two editors be appointed to take overall responsibility for male-authored prose and for women's writing. The assumption was that both would be senior scholars. However, shortly after Professor David Wootton joined the project he accepted a chair in England with administrative responsibilities, and thereafter lacked time to contribute. He did, however, make a number of useful suggestions for which we are grateful. I eventually suggested that Holly Nelson, then a Ph.D. candidate at Simon Fraser University, should take responsibility for women's writing. Later, Joseph Black, then of the University of Toronto, took responsibility for prose; he also suggested and prepared several verse selections.

Literature used to be taught as belles-lettres. Texts were valued for their aesthetic qualities, and studied for the most part with little reference to the historical moment into which they were published. Milton, for example, was taught, and treated in histories of literature, as a pre-Restoration author, though his major poems were published, and almost certainly mainly written, after 1660. The aim of this anthology is certainly not to suggest that readers should forget about aesthetic quality. If we did not enjoy literature, there would be small point in reading it. However, if we feel the need to understand what we enjoy, we may well find ourselves taken out of "literature" and into "life," which is rarely aesthetically shaped. We shall find ourselves thinking of the historical context of what we read, of what the author hoped his or her work might accomplish in the furtherance of a particular project. We shall want to set ourselves at an author's own viewpoint, to learn, so far as we can, of the formative influences that turned the person into the writer. What about their families, their schools or their tutors? Why did Westminster School, for example, produce so many poets? Were the parents or grandparents of a given writer Catholic or Protestant? What did such choices mean to a family's security or hope of prosperity? What sort of influence might family background have at the point when minds had to be made up as political and religious tensions broke into civil war? What social forces operated to bring it about that people of similar religious views found themselves on opposite sides in that conflict? How did censorship, implicit or official, operate through that author's writing lifetime? How did education, personality, impoverishment or the possibility of enrichment combine to lead people into this choice or that? How did the social networks in which given authors lived and wrote influence their work? How was the meaning of texts shaped by the material conditions of their publication and distribution?

This anthology has been compiled in order to suggest the importance of such questions, and to provide some of the materials that students of seventeenth-century literature will need in their own explorations. What James VI/I thought about kingship might not be great literature; set out in his own words, it suggests vividly the atmosphere in which those who sought influence had to operate. Lawrence Clarkson's autobiographical The Lost Sheep Found and Thomas Edwards's Gangraena might not be the finest examples of the period's prose, but one illustrates the variety of religious choices briefly available, and the other the virulence of anti-tolerationist sentiment that such choices gave rise to in those (and they were the majority) who thought that their way was the only way. These are three examples of works which have not formerly been anthologized along with "canonical" literature. Most of the women's writing, of course, also falls into that category.

Analysis and comparison have been said to be the tools of criticism, and we have tried to make comparison possible, for example by including more than one "country house" poem, more than one poem on Jonson's response to the disastrous reception of The New Inn, more than one translation of Horace's "Beatus ille" ode. We have also tried, in headnotes and footnotes, to cross-refer from one such work to another to facilitate such comparisons. Some of our headnotes are longer than is customary. If we seem to be following Samuel Johnson's enjoyment of "the biographical part of literature" it is in the hope that a knowledge of the life will promote interest in and understanding of the work. In the early stages a good deal of thought was given to footnotes, and I liked the suggestion of one correspondent, who shares my view that annotating a poem is perhaps the best way to discipline oneself to a careful reading, that some poems should be printed "blank" and then again with notes. The question had to be faced as to whether detailed annotation is likely to facilitate learning, or to impede it. In the end, habit, custom, and the realization that very few undergraduates are likely to have the time and resources to deal on their own with poets such as Cleveland or Vaughan led me to think that we should annotate as thoroughly as possible. One pitfall of working in this period is that many words were spelled as they are today, and appear in contexts in which today's meanings look plausible, but may not represent the author's intentions: "horrid," "nice," and "conscience" readily spring to mind. When we are reading Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, we know that we are on unfamiliar linguistic territory; early modern English, in its apparent similarity to our own language, is more insidious; and we have tried to bear this too in mind when annotating. Of course, experience suggests that full accuracy in editing is difficult.

Numerous queries about our progress, in the last two years or so, suggest that university and college teachers were anxious to see the anthology in print. I am sorry for what must have seemed a slow march to completion. All three of us have experienced periods when work on the anthology had to give way to other priorities. We all hope that the result of our labours will be found at least provisionally satisfactory: a benefit of modern printing technology is the comparative ease with which improvements can be incorporated, and we shall be glad to receive comments and suggestions.

A NOTE ON MODERNIZATION

With one or two brief exceptions, our texts are modernized. However, through much of the verse we have retained the italics so frequent in early modern printing; they do not impede understanding, and in fact quite often help us to hear an author's emphases. Most initial capitals have been removed, but we have sometimes introduced them where the early texts did not, to indicate personification.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This anthology is to a high degree a collective enterprise. At the outset, university teachers were asked, on electronic discussion groups such as Ficino and Milton-L, what they would like to see in an anthology of seventeenth-century verse and prose. So long ago was this, and so fickle the computer, that the following list is likely to be deficient. If so, we shall be glad to hear from those who wrote to us so that we can rectify omissions in the future. The anonymous reviewers who commented on the penultimate draft made a great many useful suggestions. In addition, we should like to thank Sharon Achinstein, Jonquil Bevan, David Boocker, Lisa Celovsky, Anne Coldiron, Tabitha Driver, Joseph Holtgen, Alan Howard, Ana Kothe, John Leonard, Michael Lofaro, Diane McColley, Mark McDayter, the denizens of Ficino and Milton-L, David Northrup, Hugh de Quehen, Sheila Roberts, Peggy Samuels, Paul Stanwood, June Sturrock, Stefano Villani, Germaine Warkentin, John Watkins, Thomas Wheeler, Samuel Wong, David Wootton, and James D. Young. Sharon Alker, Hannah Calder, Jim Daems, and Jasmine McAdam gave valuable help as research assistants. Holly Nelson wishes to thank for proof-reading: Juliet Henderson, Marion Henderson and Russell Nelson. Joseph Black wishes to thank the Northrop Frye Centre (Victoria College, University of Toronto); Trinity College, University of Toronto; the Department of English, University of Edinburgh; the Centre for the History of the Book, University of Edinburgh; the Department of English, University of Tennessee; and the Graduate School, University of Tennessee. Alan Rudrum wishes to thank the staff of Simon Fraser University Library, of the Newberry Library, and of four research libraries which have been happy hunting grounds for many years: the Bodleian Library, Oxford; the British Library; the Clark Library, Los Angeles; and the Henry E. Huntington Library, San Marino, California. Finally, at Broadview Press, it has been a pleasure to work with Don LePan; and Eileen Eckert as proofreader and Kathryn Brownsey as production coordinator have worked miracles of observation, endurance and patience.

John Chamberlain

1553 – 1627

John Chamberlain's letters, generally considered the finest of the Jacobean age, provide a continuous commentary on political and social life in London from the late sixteenth century through to the first years of the reign of Charles I. The son of a wealthy ironmonger who left him with an independent income, Chamberlain attended Trinity College, Cambridge, and Gray's Inn in the 1570s, though he appears not to have taken a degree nor to have been called to the bar. Little is known of his activities until 1597, the year he wrote the earliest of his nearly five hundred extant letters. While his wealth relieved him of the necessity of working, Chamberlain was in effect a professional supplier of information: except for a few trips abroad, he never lived more than a short walk from St. Paul's Cathedral, London's general meeting place and the centre of the trade in both books and gossip. Like Samuel Pepys, Chamberlain was well connected, with an unusual number of friends prominent in the city and court; these included Lancelot Andrewes, antiquary William Camden, scientist William Gilbert, diplomat Sir Ralph Winwood, and his most frequent correspondent, Sir Dudley Carleton, ambassador to Venice (1610–15) and Secretary of State (1628–32). Twenty years older than Carleton, Chamberlain was a trusted advisor and discreet friend who kept the diplomat informed of all the news during his stays abroad. Carleton's sister Alice, a recipient of several of the letters included here, was also a life-long friend, and there are hints in the letters that they might have contemplated marriage, though both died unmarried.

The Death of Queen Elizabeth

March 30, 1603, to Dudley Carleton in Paris: I have not written since I received yours of the 8th of this present, after your style,[1] for we were held in suspense and know not how nor what to write, the passages being stopped, and all conveyance so dangerous and suspicious.[2] I make no question but you have heard of our great loss before this come at you; and no doubt but you shall hear her Majesty's sickness and manner of death diversely related, for even here the papists do tell strange stories, as utterly void of truth as of all civil honesty or humanity.

I had a good means to understand how the world went,[3] and find her disease to be nothing but a settled and unremovable melancholy, insomuch that she could not be won or persuaded, neither by the Council, divines, physicians, nor the women about her, once to taste or touch any physic; though ten or twelve physicians that were continually about her did assure her with all manner of asseverations of perfect and easy recovery if she would follow their advice....

Here was some whispering that her brain was somewhat distempered, but there was no such matter, only she held an obstinate silence for the most part; and because she had a persuasion that if she once lay down she should never rise, could not be gotten to bed in a whole week till three days before her death. So that after three weeks' languishing, she departed the 24 of this present, being Our Lady's eve, between two and three in the morning....

[1] after your style Because he was living in Europe, Carleton used the Gregorian calendar, which was ten days ahead of the Julian calendar used in England until the eighteenth century:

[2] The Queen died on March 24, and shipping and travel were restricted to prevent the possibility of anyone organizing a coup during the transition from one monarch to another (a standard early modern practice).

The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Almoner,[1] and other her chaplains and divines had access to her in her sickness diverse times, to whom she gave good testimony of her faith by word, but specially towards her end by signs when she was speechless, and would not suffer the Archbishop to depart as long as she had sense, but held him twice or thrice when he was going and could no longer endure, both by reason of his own weakness and compassion of hers.

She made no will, nor gave anything away, so that they which come after shall find a well-stored jewel house and a rich wardrobe of more than 2000 gowns with all things else answerable.

The nobility and Council came from Richmond that morning, and before ten o'clock had proclaimed King James at Whitehall, Temple Bar, and so forward in Cheapside and other places. Sir Robert Carey was the first that of his own motion carried news of her death into Scotland.[2] The next day the Lords sent Sir Charles Percy and Thomas Somerset, with the proclamation and letters to the King; and yesterday Master [George] Carew, a Mastery of the Chancery, and Master [Thomas] Lake were dispatched about other business. There is much posting that way and many run thither of their own errand, as if it were nothing else but first come first served, or that preferment were a goal to be got by footmanship....

We attend him here with great devotion and begin to think long till we have him.[3] The Lords have sent to know his pleasure whether he will come by land or sea, for which purpose there be eight or ten ships ready that were going for the coast of Spain but do now tarry to keep the Narrow Seas. Surely the Council dealt very providently and beyond that that was to be expected or hoped for in so sudden an accident; and no doubt but God did direct them, seeing all things passed so quietly and in good order....

The Marriage of Princess Elizabeth and Prince Frederick, Elector Palatine[4]

February 4, 1613, to Alice Carleton in Venice: Here is extraordinary preparation for fireworks and fights upon the water, with three castles built upon eight western barges, and one great castle upon the land over against the Court. One or two of the King's pinnaces are come already from Rochester,[5] and diverse other vessels to the number of six and thirty are provided,...and above five hundred watermen already pressed, and a thousand musketeers of the trained bands in the Shires hereabout made ready for this service, which in all computation cannot stand the king in so little as five thousand pounds...

February 11, 1613, to Sir Dudley Carleton: The marriage draws near and all things are ready. On Sunday was their last time of asking openly in the chapel. The Queen grows every day more favorable, and there is hope she will grace it with her presence. Here is a band of 500 musketeers made ready by the City to guard the Court during these triumphs, and we have extraordinary watches of substantial householders every night, and an alderman in person to oversee them. Many searches are made, and much listening there is, which gives occasion to suspect that there is intelligence of some intended treachery....The preparations for fireworks and fights upon the water are very great, and have already consumed 6000 pounds....

[1] respectively John Whitgift, Richard Bancroft, and Anthony Watson, Bishop of Chichester.

[2] Carey made the almost four-hundred-mile journey to Edinburgh on horse in a remarkable three days; he was knighted for being the first to arrive with the news.

[3] attend look out for, await (OED attend 13).

[4] Elizabeth (1596–1662), eldest daughter of James I and for one year Queen of Bohemia (the brevity of her reign gave rise to the name "the Winter Queen"); Frederick V, Elector Palatine (1596–1632). His acceptance of the crown of Bohemia in 1619 helped initiate the Thirty Years' War. His forces were soon routed, and the couple fled to The Hague, where Elizabeth lived until returning to England after the Restoration. Prince Rupert, Royalist General of Horse during the Civil War, was their son. The Act of Succession (1701) vested the English throne in her descendants (George I was her grandson).

February 18, 1613, to Alice Carleton: On Thursday night the fireworks were reasonably well performed, all save the last castle of five, which bred most expectation and had most devices, but when it came to execution had worst success. On Saturday likewise, the fight upon the water came short of that show and brags had been made of it, but they pretend the best to be behind and left for another day, which was the winning of the castle on land: but the King and indeed all the company took so little delight to see no other activity but shooting and potting of guns that it is quite given over and the navy unrigged and the castle pulled down, the rather for that there were diverse hurt in the former fight (as one lost both his eyes, another both his hands, another one hand, with diverse others maimed and hurt), so that to avoid further harm, it was thought best to let all alone, and this is the conclusion of all the preparation with so much expense of powder and money which amounted to no less than 9000 pounds.

On Sunday I was fetched from Paul's (where I was set at the sermon) to see the bride go to church, and though it were past ten o'clock before we came there, yet we found a whole window reserved in the jewel-house, which was over against her coming down a pair stairs out of the gallery in the preaching place to a long stage or gallery made along the court into the hall,[1] so that we had as much view as a short passage could give. But the excess of bravery and the continued succession of new company did so dazzle me that I could not observe the tenth part of that I wished. The bridegroom and bride were both in a suit of cloth of silver, richly embroidered with silver, her train carried up by thirteen young Ladies (or Lord's daughters at least) besides five or six more that could not come near it; these were all in the same livery with the bride, though not so rich. The bride was married in her hair that hung down long,[2] with an exceeding rich coronet on her head which the King valued the next day at a million of crowns. Her two bridemen were the young Prince and the Earl of Northampton.

The King and Queen both followed, the Queen all in white but not very rich saving in jewels. The King methought was somewhat strangely attired in a cap and a feather, with a Spanish cape and a long stocking. The chapel was very straitly kept,[3] none suffered to enter under the degree of a baron, but the three Lords Chief Justices: in the midst there was a handsome stage or scaffold made, on the one side whereof sat the King, Prince, Count Palatine and Count Henry of Nassau, on the other side the Queen with the bride and one or two more....It was done all in English, and the Prince Palatine had learned as much as concerned his part reasonable perfectly. The French, Venetian and [Dutch] States ambassadors dined that day with the bride. The Spanish ambassador was sick and the Archduke's was invited for the next day but would not come. That night was the Lord's masque whereof I hear no great commendation save only for the riches, their devices being long and tedious and more like a play than a masque.[1]

[2] hair that hung down long as a sign of her virginity.

[3] straitly strictly, rigorously (OED straitly 6).

The next morning the King went to visit these young turtles that were coupled on St. Valentine's day, and did strictly examine him whether he were his true son-in-law, and was sufficiently assured.[2] That afternoon the King, Prince, Count Palatine, with diverse others, ran at the ring, and when that was ended and the King and Prince gone, the Palsgrave mounted upon a high-bounding horse which he managed so like a horseman that he was exceedingly commended and had many shouts and acclamations of the beholders, and indeed I never saw any of his age come near him in that exercise.

It were long and tedious to tell you all the particularities of the excessive bravery both of men and women,[3] but you may conceive the rest by one or two. The Lady Wotton had a gown that cost fifty pound a yard the embroidering...and the Lord Montague (that hath paid reasonably well for recusancy) bestowed fifteen hundred pound in apparel for his two daughters....But this extreme of cost and riches makes us all poor.

On Monday night was the Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn masque,[4] presented in the Hall at Court, whereas the Lord's was in the banqueting room. It went from the Rolls all up Fleet Street and the Strand,[5] and made such a gallant and glorious show that it is highly commended. They had forty gentlemen of best choice out of both houses ride before them in their best array, upon the King's horses. And the twelve maskers with their torchbearers and pages rode likewise upon horses exceedingly well trapped and furnished, besides a dozen little boys dressed like baboons that served for an antimasque (and they say performed it exceedingly well when they came to it), and three open chariots drawn with four horses apiece that carried their musicians and other personages that had parts to speak. All which, together with their trumpeters and other attendants, were so well set out that it is generally held for the best show that hath been seen many a day....

On Tuesday it came to Gray's Inn and the Inner Temple's turn to come with their masque, whereof Sir Francis Bacon was the chief contriver. And because the former came on horseback and open chariots, they made choice to come by water from Winchester Place in Southwark, which suited well enough with their device, which was the marriage of the river of Thames to the Rhine; and their show by water was very gallant by reason of infinite store of lights very curiously set and placed, and many boats and barges with devices of light and lamps, with three peals of ordnance: one at their taking water, another in the Temple garden, and the last at their landing; which passage by water cost them better than three hundred pounds....

One thing I had almost forgotten for haste, that all this time there was a course taken and so notified, that no Lady or gentlewoman should be admitted to any of these sights with a farthingale, which was to gain the more room, and I hope may serve to make them quite left off in time. Any yet there were more scaffolds and more provision made for room than ever I saw, both in the Hall and Banqueting Room, besides a new room built to dine, sup, and dance in.

Lancelot Andrewes' father was a merchant who became master of Trinity House, the corporation responsible for overseeing the lighthouses around the British coast. Andrewes' teachers, seeing his great promise as a pupil, persuaded his parents to give him the opportunity to become a scholar, an opportunity of which he took full advantage. He learned to read many languages, and his interest in the meanings of words is the basis of his style as a writer of sermons. Andrewes was successively Bishop of Chichester, of Ely, and of Winchester; many were surprised that he was not made Archbishop of Canterbury. He was in 1607 appointed as one of the translators of the Authorized (or King James) Version of the Bible, published in 1611.

Andrewes was politically conservative and accepted the view of royalty promulgated by the Tudors and pushed to an extreme by James; but he was a politic rather than a political person. There is a story that James asked Bishop Neale of Durham and Andrewes, then Bishop of Winchester, whether he could not take his subjects' money without "all this formality in Parliament." Neale replied that indeed he could, for "you are the breath of our nostrils." Andrewes replied that he had no skill in Parliamentary cases, but when pressed for a further comment replied, "I think it lawful for you to take my brother Neale's money, because he offers it."

Though he wrote some polemical works against Roman Catholicism, Andrewes is now best remembered for a volume of prayers, first published in 1648 in translation from the Greek and Latin of Andrewes' manuscript, and republished in various formats through the centuries; and for his sermons, ninety-six of which were published in 1628. In his sermons some readers will miss Donne's wonderful rhythms and uninhibited emotionalism. Others will find, in the meticulous and imaginative attention Andrewes brings to his biblical texts, the authentic passion of a great scholar and a genuinely spiritual man. For a seventeenth-century life of Andrewes, see John Aubrey's Brief Lives.

A Sermon Preached Before The King's Majesty at Whitehall,

on the Sixteenth of April, A.D. MDCIX,
Being Easter-Day

JOHN 20:19

Cum ergo sero esset die illo, una sabbatorum, et fores essent clausæ, ubi erant Discipuli congregati propter metum Judæorum, venit Jesus, et stetit in medio, et dixit eis, Pax vobis.

The same day then, at night, which was the first day of the week, and when the doors were shut, where the Disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus and stood in the midst, and said to them, Peace be unto you.

This is the interview of Christ and his Disciples, and this his first speech at his first interview; both this day, the very first day of his rising.

Five sundry times appeared he this day. To Mary Magdalene, to the women coming from the sepulchre, to the two that went to Emmaus, to St. Peter, and here now to the Eleven and those that were with them. The two first to women, the three last to men; so both sexes. To Peter and to Mary Magdalene, so to sinners of both sexes. To the Eleven as the Clergy, to those with them, as the Laity; so, to both estates. Abroad at Emmaus, at home here. Betimes, and now late. When they were scattered severally, and now jointly when they were gathered together. That no sex, sort, estate, place or time excepted, but as visitavit nos oriens ab alto, so visitavit occidens ab imo; "rising from above at his birth, rising from beneath at his resurrection, he visited all." [1]

But of all the five, this is the chief. Those were to one, as Peter; or two, as those of Emmaus; or three, as the women. This to all; the more, the more witnesses, the better for faith. Those when they were scattered; this here when they were all together. The more together, the more meet for this salutation here, Peace be to you.

Which salutation is the very substance of the text, the rest but appendant all.

In it, two things give forth themselves: 1. The persons to whom, vobis. 2. The matter of the wish itself, "peace." The persons are thus set down: Discipuli, congregati, conclusi. 1. His "Disciples" they were, 2. "gathered," 3. and "the doors shut" on them "for fear of the Jews."

There will fall out besides four other points. 1. Christ's site; that he stood, when he wished it. 2. His place; that in the midst he stood. 3. The time; all this, the same day, the first day of the week, Sunday, Easter-day: 4. and the very time of the day, that it was late.

The speech of itself is a salutation; any will so conceive it at the first hearing. And if it were but so, and no more, that were enough. Christ's salutations are not, as ours be, formal, but good matter in them.

But it is more than a salutation, say the Fathers, for this reason. At meeting men use to salute but once: within a verse, he repeateth it again. So it keeps not the law of a salutation, but it is certainly somewhat besides. Votum Christi, they call it. Votum pacis, votum Christi; "Christ's vow, or wish"; his vow, and his first vow.

Now every vow implieth an advice at the least. What Christ wisheth to us, he wisheth us to. Every wish so. But if it be the wish of a superior in his optative, there is an imperative; his wish is a command, if he have wit that hears it. So that these words, rightly understood, are both an advice, and an injunction to it, of the nature of an edict. Pax vobis is as much as Pacem habete in vobis, "be at peace among yourselves."[2]

We are then to join with Christ, to follow him in his wish. To whom he wisheth it; to all Christ's Disciples together, even to his whole Christian Church; and even to them that, it may be, as little deserve it, as these here did. 1. To make it caput voti, "our first vow"; yea, first and second, as Christ here did. 2. Oportet stantem optare, "to wish it standing." 3. And standing where Christ stood, that is material, "in the midst." 4. This day to do it, and think it pertinent to the time; it is votum paschale.[3] As for sero,[4] we shall never need to take thought for it, it is never too soon; late enough always if it be not too late, that is all the fear.

The chief point first: Pax vobis. The words are but two, yet even between them there seemeth to be no peace, but one in a manner opposite to the other. Looking to vobis, the persons, this should not be a salutation for them, pax. Looking to the salutation, "peace," it should not be to those persons, vobis, "to you." So that our first work will be, to make peace between the two words.

Vobis, "to you." Will you know who they be? "To you," Peter, and John, and the rest. "To you," of whom none stood by Me. "To you," of whom some ran away, some denied, yea forsware me. "To you," of whom all, every one shrunk away and forsook me. How evil doth this greeting agree with this vobis! Yet even to these, venit, et stetit, et dixit; "He came, stood, and said, Peace be to you."

[2] Mark 9:50.

[3] "the Easter prayer."

[4] "at a late hour."

Used by them as he had been, no cause he should come, or stand, or speak at all; or if speak, not thus. Not come to them that went from him, nor stand amongst them that had not stood to him, nor speak to them that had renounced him. It is said, "they feared the Jews." All things considered, they had more cause to fear him, and to look for some real revenge at his hands. If not that, some verbal reproof, a salutation of another style or tenor; and well, if they might scape so. Confitemini Domino, quia bonus:[1]—it is not so, no evil deed for all this, no, not so much as an unkind word. Above that they could look for, far above that they deserved it is; Pax vobis. You and I are at peace, you and I are friends; "Peace be unto you." This is his first goodness, his making a peace between pax and vobis.

This speech to these persons is much mended by adding the time in the text, that it was illo die, the day of his rising. Pax vobis is a good speech for Good-Friday; then men grow charitable, when ready to die. But on their Easter-day, at their rising, the day when exultavit Eum Deus, "the day of their exaltation," they use to take other manner spirits, and remember former disgraces, with a far other congé.[2] Haec est lex hominis; men do thus, but not Christ. Neither their indignity, vobis; nor his own dignity changeth him. Rising, exalted, the very day of his exaltation, illo die, he saith, "Peace be unto you."

Another yet: that it was primâ sabbati, the very "first day of the week"; took no long day for it, nay, no day at all, but the very first day. Joseph exalted dealt well with his brethren, but not the first day; it was some time first. He kept them in fear a while, but showed himself at the last. Christ doth not so hold them in suspense: illo die, primo die, "the same day, the first day," he came, and showed himself and said, "Peace be unto you."

Yea, not so much as dixit here but, as it falls out, will bear a note. Even that it is dixit, and not respondit; a speech, not an answer. That he spake it, unspoken to; he to them first, ere they to him. He might well have stayed till then, and reason would they should first have sued for it. Ere they ask it he giveth it, and "prevents them with the blessing of peace." They first in falling out, he first at making friends.

A great comfort for poor sinners, when the many indignities we have offered Christ shall present themselves before us, to think of this vobis. That when the Disciples had done the like, yet he forgat all, and spake thus kindly to them this day; that he will vouchsafe us the like, specially if we seek it he will, and say to us, Pax vobis.

Will ye remember now to extend your wish of peace 1. to them that, it may be, deserve it as evil as these here, even his qui longe.[3] 2. To do it at our rising, at our high day, when it is Easter with us; 3. not to make their hearts to pant, and eyes to fail first, but even primâ sabbati to do it. 4. And not to take state upon us, and be content to answer Peace, and not speak; be moved for it, but not move it; yes, even move it first. If we do, we join with Christ in his first part, the personal part of the wish.

Illis, and illo die, and primo die, what they were we see, and in what sort. Yet not to grate on this point altogether, some smoke yet was there in the flax, some small remainders, illices misericordiae as Tertullian, to move his mercy. In these words, 1. Discipuli, 2. congregati, 3. conclusi, 4. propter ti-

[1] rendered "O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good" in AV (Psalm 106:1).

[2] congé a bow or other formal gesture of salutation or leave-taking; Andrewes' point is that Christ's greeting, even in his exaltation, was humble. See OED congee sb.

[3] "to those [who are] far off." See Ephesians 2:17.

morem Judæorum: that his "Disciples" yet they were; and "together" they were; and "in fear of the Jews" they were "shut up."

Whatsoever, or howsoever they were else, yet they were his Disciples; "unprofitable servants," yet servants; "lost" sons, yet sons; forgetful Disciples, yet Disciples. His Disciples they were, and howsoever they had made a fault, as it seemeth, so meant to hold themselves still, and hereafter to learn their lesson better.

And I like well their fear, that they were afraid of the Jews. It shows there were no good terms betwixt them, and that they shut their doors upon them; therefore they meant not to go out to them, or seek Pax vobis of the Jews. They had no meaning it seemeth to give over Christ. If they had, what need they fear the Jews? The Jews would have done them no harm, they might have set open their doors well enough.

And congregatis, I take it well, is no evil sign. It would have been ex aliâ causâ, for love rather than fear; and again, for fear of God, rather than of the Jews. Yet even thus I mislike it not, and much better this fear, than that at the Passion. That scattered them one from another, every man shift for one. This makes them draw together, and keep together, as if they meant to stand out afresh. Which very congregatis makes them fit for this salutation. It cannot well be said, disgregatis, "to them that are in sunder." Una is a disposition to unity; and gathering, to the binding up in the band of peace. Christ that said, Quoties volui congregare?[1] liked it well, to find them thus together; and his coming was, as to take away their fear, so to continue their gathering still.

And shall we learn this of the Disciples? 1. If a fault fall out, not to give over school, but to continue our discipleship still. 2. And not to go over, to seek our Pax vobis at the hands of his enemies; to shut out both them, and their peace too. 3. And lastly, not to forsake the fellowship, to keep together still. For being so together, we are nearer our peace. This shall make Christ come and say it to us the sooner, and the more willingly.

The real part, voti summa, that which he wisheth, is "peace." First, why peace? then, what peace?

Why peace? Is there nothing more worth the wishing? Nothing more, of itself; nothing more fit for these persons, this place, and this time.

Of itself, votum pacis summa votorum. "It is all wishes in one," nothing more to be wished. For in brevi voce breviarium, "this little word is a breviary of all" that good is.

To show how, a little; quam bonum, "how good," how worth the wishing it is. It is tam bonum, "so good," as without it nothing is good. With it, saith Solomon, "an handful of herbs"; without it, "an house full of sacrifices is not good."[2] With trouble and vexation nothing is good, nothing is to be wished.

And as without it nothing is to be wished, so all that is to be wished, all good, is within it. Evangelizantium pacem, evangelizantium bona, quia in pace omnia bona: "to bring news of peace, is to bring news of all good things," "for all good things are in peace."[3] Bona is the true gloss or exposition of peace.

Quam bonum, you know, and quam jucundum too. But good and pleasant; and pleasant, not only as Aaron's ointment which was only pleasant, but as Hermon dew which brings profit with it.[4] Abundantia pacis, saith the Psalm, "peace and plenty" go together.[5]

[1] quoted from the Vulgate. See Matthew 23:37.

[2] Proverbs 15:16–17.

[3] Romans 10:15.

[4] Hermon dew See Psalm 133.

[5] probably a reference to Psalm 37:11: "But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

And yet, how much it is to be wished, this showeth, pacem te poscimus omnes. All wish it. Angels wish it, Heaven to earth, pax in terris; and men wish it, earth to Heaven, pax in Cælis. God wisheth it, most kindly for him; Deus pacis, pacem Dei; "the God of peace," "the peace of God." Yea the enemy of all peace wisheth it, for he complains, Venisti nos inquietare, "Are ye come to trouble us?" So he would not be troubled that troubles all, but set all together by the ears, and sit quiet himself.

But it is much for the honour of peace, that cum bellum geritur, pax quaeritur. Even military persons, with sword in one hand and fire in the other, give this for their emblem, sic quaerimus pacem, "thus, with sword and fire, seek we peace." As seek it at last they must; we must all. Best primâ sabbati, but sero, "sooner or later," come to it we must: if it be not the first, it must be our last.

But if there were nothing else, this only were enough, and though there be many, this chiefly doth show it; that our Saviour Christ so often, so divers ways, so earnestly wisheth it. Going he did it, Pacem meam do vobis.[1] And now coming, he doth it. Sitting, he did it; and now, standing. Living, when he was born, Pax in terris; Xenium Christi, "it was Christ's New-year's gift." Dying, when he was to suffer, Pacem meam relinquo vobis, it was legatum Christi, "Christ's legacy." And now here rising again, it is his wish still. To show, not only the good of this life, but of the next, to be in peace. Prayed for it, paid for it, wept for it; "O if thou hadst known the things that pertain to thy peace!" Wept for it, and bled for it: therefore immediately, the very next words, he showeth them his hands and his side, as much to say; See what I have suffered to procure your peace. Your peace cost me this, Pax vobis cost Crux mihi;—see you hold it dear. Now sure, if there were any one thing better than other, those hands would not have withheld it, and that heart would wish it. And peace it doth wish, therefore nothing more to be wished. Complete it is, Votum pacis summa votorum.[2]

There need no other sign be given but that of the Prophet Jonas,[3] that Christ wished his wish: so the tempest may cease, and peace as a calm ensue, spare me not, "take me, cast me into the sea,"[4] make me a peace-offering and kill me. This is enough to show it is to be wished, to make it precious in our eyes. For we undervalue it at too low a rate, when that which cost so dear, for every trifling ceremony we are ready to lose it. Our faint persuasion in this point is the cause we are faint in all the rest.

Well, though this be thus good, yet good itself is not good, unless it be in season, come fitly. Doth this so? Every way fitly. 1. For the Persons; 2. For the Place; 3. And for the Time.

The persons; both 1. Christ by whom, and 2. they to whom it is wished. 1. Christ, by whom; decet largitorem pacis haec salutatio, saith Cyril. "It is meet for him to give peace that made peace"; nay, ipse est pax nostra,[5] saith the Apostle, and for peace, what fitter salutation than peace?

2. They to whom, for they needed it. With God they had no peace, whom they had provoked; nor peace with men, nor with the Jews about them; nor peace with themselves, for they were in fear, and night-fear, which is the worst of all others. Fit for them, and they for it, for together they were, and so not unfit to entertain it.

And with the place it suiteth well. For they were shut up, as men environed and beleaguered with their enemies, conclusi et derelicti, "shut up and forsaken"; and to such peace is ever welcome.

[1] "My peace I give unto you."

[2] "The prayer for peace is the highest of prayers."

[3] See Matthew 12:39.

[4] Jonah 1:12.

[5] Ephesians 2:14.

And for the time, seasonable. For after a falling out, peace is so; and after a victory, peace is so. Fit therefore for this day, the day of the Resurrection; for till then it was not in kind. The great battle was not fought, "the last enemy, death," was not overcome.[1] Never till now, but now the last enemy is conquered, now it is in season.

And for the thing itself, peace is a kind of resurrection. When Christ was risen, his Disciples were dead. Those dead affections of sorrow and fear, when they seize thoroughly upon men, what are they but mors ante mortem? Upon good news of Joseph, Jacob is said to "revive," as if before he had been given for dead.[2] It was their case here. The house was to them as their grave, and the door as the gravestone, and they buried in fear. When they saw him, in the next verse, and were thus saluted by him, they gat hope, were glad, that is, revived again. For if those were the pangs of death, peace after a sort is a resurrection; and so a fit wish for the time.

And to say truth, peace is never kindly till then. They define felicity shortly, to be nothing else but pax desiderii. For give the desire perfect peace, and no more needs to make us happy. Desire hath no rest, and will let us have none, till it have what it would, and till the Resurrection that will not be.

1. Pax et pressura, our Saviour opposeth.[3] If we be pinched with any want, desire hath no peace. 2. Let us want nothing if it were possible. No peace yet; pax et scandalum the Psalmist opposeth.[4] When we have what we would, somewhat cometh to us we would not, somewhat thwarts us. Till non est eis scandalum, till that be had away, desire hath no peace. 3. Let that be had away, yet a new war there cometh. Peace and fear are here opposed. We are well; neither pressura nor scandalum, but we fear tolletur a vobis, that it will not hold, or we shall not hold. "The last enemy" will not let us be quiet. Till he "be overcome," our desire hath no perfect peace. That will not be till the Resurrection. But then it is pax plena, pura, perpetua; "full" without want, "pure" without mixture of offensive matter, and "perpetual" without all fear of foregoing, of tolletur a vobis. And that is pax desiderii, and that is perfect felicity; the state of the Resurrection, and the wish of the Resurrection day.

Thus we see good it is, and fit it is. It remains we see what it is, what peace. When we speak of peace, the nature of the word leadeth us to ask, With whom? And they be diverse. But as diverse as they be, it must be understood of all, though of some one more especially than the rest.

There is a peace above us in Heaven with God; that first. They were wrong here, their fear ran all upon the Jews, it should have looked higher. The Jews they kept out with shutting their doors; against God no door can be shut. First, peace with him; and with him they have peace, to whom Christ saith Pax vobis.

There is another peace within us, in sinu, "with our heart." For between our spirit and our flesh there is in manner of a war. "The lusts of the flesh" ever militant, "wage war," saith St. Peter, "against the soul;" and where there is a war, there is a peace too.[5] This is peace with fear, here. Which war is sometime so fearful, as men to rid themselves of it, rid themselves of life and all, conclude a peace there. This followeth of the first; if all be well above, all is well within.

[1] I Corinthians 15:26.

[2] Genesis 45:27.

[3] In the Vulgate, the second part of John 16:33 reads: "In mundo pressuram habebitis: sed confidite, ego vici mundum." AV reads: "In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."

[4] Psalm 119:165.

[5] I Peter 2:11.

There is a peace without us, in earth with men, with all men. The Apostle warrants it; peace with the Jews here and all. I will never fear to make civil peace a part of Christ's wish, nor of his beati pacifici neither.[1] He will be no worse at Easter, than at Christmas he was; at this his second, than at that his first birth. Then Janus was shut, and peace over all the world. Orbem pacatum was ever a clause in the prayers of the Primitive Church, that the world might be quiet.

Yet is not this the peace of Christ's principal intendment, but their peace to whom Christ spake, Pax discipulorum, Pax vobis inter vos; "Peace among them, or between themselves." It was "the ointment on Aaron's head," Aaron that had the care of the Church.[2] It was "the dew" that fell upon Sion, Sion the place where the Temple stood.[3] "The peace of Jerusalem," that it may be once "as a city at unity within itself." The primitive peace, that "the multitude of believers" may be "of one heart and one mind." All the rest depend upon our peace with God, and our peace with him upon this; pacem habete inter vos, and Deus pacis erit vobiscum. "The peace of Jerusalem," "they shall prosper that love it," saith David.[4] "Joy shall be to them that counsel it," saith Solomon.[5] "Blessed" shall they be that make it, saith Christ.[6] How great a reward should he find in Heaven, how glorious a name should he leave on earth, that could bring this to pass!

This is Christ's wish, and what is become of it? If we look upon the Christian world, we see it not, it is gone as if Christ had never wished it. Between Jehu and Jeroboam, Solomon's seed went to rack. Jehu's proceedings, like his chariot-wheels, headlong and violent. But Jehu is but a brunt, too violent to last long. Jeroboam is more dangerous, who makes it his wisdom to keep up a schism in religion; they shall sway both parts more easily. God forbid we should ever think Jeroboam wiser than Solomon! If peace were not a wise thing, the wisest man's name should not have been Solomon. "A greater than Solomon" would never have said Habete salem et pacem; "if you have any salt, you will have peace." Sure, when the Disciples lost their peace, they lost their wisdom; their wisdom and their strength both. They were stronger by congregatis, than by clausis foribus; "more safe by their being together, than any door could make them."

It is as Christ told us (Luke 10, where he prescribes this form of salutation[7]): it speeds or it misses thereafter, as it meets with "the Son of peace"; speeds if it find him, if not, comes back again, and takes no place.

Well, though it do not, we must still hold us to Christ's wish, and when all fails, still there must be Votum pacis in corde; though enmity in the act, yet "peace in the heart still." Still it must hold, amicus et non alter, inimicus ut non idem; "friends as if never otherwise, enemies as if not ever so." Quasi torrens, bellum; "war, like a land-flood," that will be dry again. Quasi fluvius, pax; "peace, as a river," never dry, but to run still and ever.

But yet, many times "we ask and have not, because we ask not aright," saith St. James; "we know not the things that belong to our peace"; we err in the order, manner, site, place, or time.[8]

The order, which helpeth much, first it is; first, primum et ante omnia, caput fidei, "the prime of his wishes." No sooner born, but pax in terris; no sooner risen, but pax vobis. Apertio labiorum, "the very opening of his lips" was with these words; the first words at the first meeting, on the very first day. It is a sign it is so in his heart. That which most grieveth us, we first complain of; and that which most affecteth us, ever soonest speak of. This is the first error. That which was first with Christ, is last with Christians, and I would it were so last; for then it were some, now scarce any at all as it seemeth.

In the manner; for first is but first, that is but once. This is first and second. Here he saith it, and within a verse he is at it again. Nay first, second, and third, 1. in this, 2. the twenty-first, and 3. the twenty-sixth verses; as if like actio in Rhetoric, all in all.[1]

All Christ's vows are to be esteemed, specially his solemn vows; and his speeches, chiefly those he goeth over and over again. That which by him is double and treble said, would not by us be singly regarded. He would have it better marked; therefore he speaketh it the second time. He would have it yet sink deeper; therefore the third also. We faulty in the manner. Once we do it, it may be, but upon any repulse we give over; if it come not at first, we go not to it secundo et tertio, repetitis vicibus.[2] We must not leave at once, that Christ did so oft.

The second error is; we ask it sitting, I fear, and Christ stood; his standing imports something. Standing is the site of them that are ready to go about a matter, as they to take their journey in the twelfth of Exodus. That site is the site of them that wish for peace; oportet stantem optare.[3] A sedentary desire it may be we have, but loath to leave our cushion. We would it were well, but not willing to dis-ease ourselves. Utinam hoc esset laborare,[4] said he, that lay along and stretched himself. So say we; peace we would, but standing is painful. Our wish hath lips, but no legs.

But it could not be said, "beautiful are the feet of them that bring peace," if the feet had nothing to do in this business. With sitting and wishing it will not be had. Peace will hide itself, it must be sought out; it will fly away, it must be pursued. This then is a point wherein we are to conform ourselves to Christ; as well to use our legs, as to open our lips for it. To stand, is situs voventis;[5] to hold up the hands, habitus orantis.[6] The meaning of which ceremony of lifting up the hands with prayer is, ut pro quo quis orat pro eo laboret, "what we pray for we should labour for"; what we wish for, stand for. We see Christ showeth his hands and his feet, to show what must be done with both for it. If we should be put to do the like, I doubt our wish hath never a good leg to stand on.

To stand then, but to stand in a certain place. Every where to stand will not serve the turn. Stetit in medio, that standing place is assigned for it, thus "guiding our feet into the way of peace." And the place is material for peace. All bodies natural never leave moving, are never quiet, till they recover their proper places; and there they find peace. The midst is Christ's place by nature; he is the second person in Divinis, and so the middlemost of the other two. And on earth, follow him if you will, you shall not lightly find him out of it; not according to the letter, speaking of the material place. At his birth, in medio animalium, in the stable. After, a child, in medio doctorum, in the Temple. After, a man, medius vestrûm stetit, saith John Baptist, "in the midst of the people";[1] saith he of himself, Ecce ego in medio vestri, "in the midst of his Apostles."[2] At his death it fell to his turn likewise, that place; even then, he was in the midst. And now rising, there he is, we see. They in the midst of the Jews, and he in the midst of them. After this, in Patmos, St. John saw him in Heaven, "in the midst of the throne";[3] in earth, walking "in the midst of the candlesticks."[4] And at the last day he shall be in the midst of "the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on his left." All which show, the place and he sort very well.

[1] actio in rhetoric is the combination of voice and bodily gesture. Cicero writes, "He had great splendor in his voice, and high dignity in his motion" (Brutus sive de Claris Oratoribus, quoted in Lewis and Short, A Latin Dictionary).

[2] "a second and a third time, repeating it by turns."

[3] See Exodus 12:11.

[4] "If only working were [like] this."

[5] "the manner of making a solemn promise."

[6] "the deportment proper to prayer."

But were it not natural for him, as the case standeth, there he is to stand, being to give peace? No place so fit for that purpose, none so kindly as it. His office being to be "a Mediator," Medius "between God and man," where should a Mediator stand but in Medio?

Besides, the two qualities of good, being to be diffusivum and unitivum, that is the fittest place for both. To distribute, best done from the centre. To unite likewise, soonest meet there. The place itself hath a virtue specially to unite, which is never done but by some middle thing. If we will conclude, we must have a medius terminus; else we shall never get majus and minus extremum to come together. Nor in things natural either combine two elements disagreeing in both qualities, without a middle symbolizing with both; nor flesh and bone, without a cartilage between both. As for things moral, there the middle is all in all. No virtue without it. In justice, incline the balance one way or other, the even poise is lost, et opus justitiae pax, "peace is the very work of justice." And the way to peace is the mid-way; neither to the right hand too much, nor to the left hand too little. In a word, all analogy, symmetry, harmony, in the world, goeth by it.

It cometh all to this; the manner of the place doth teach us what manner of affection is to be in them, that wish for or stand for peace. The place is indifferent, equally distant, alike near to all. There pitch the ark, that is the place for it. Indifferency in carriage preserveth peace; by foregoing that, and leaning to extremities, it is lost. Thither we must get again, and there stand, if ever we shall recover it. Discessit a medio lost it, stetit in medio must restore it.[5]

Therefore, when you hear men talk of peace, mark whether they stand where they should. If with the Pharisee to the corners, either by partiality one way, or prejudice another, no good will be done. When God will have it brought to pass, such minds he will give unto men, and make them meet to wish it, seek it, and find it.

A little now of the time. This was Christ's wish at this time, and Christ never speaks out of season. Therefore a special interest hath this feast in it. It is votum paschale, and this is festum pacis.[6]

And sure, Habemus talem consuetudinem, et Ecclesia Dei; "such a custom we have, and so the Church of God hath used it," to take these words of Christ in the nature of an edict for pacification, ever at this time. That whatsoever become of it all the year beside, this time should be kept a time of peace; we should seek it and offer it—seek it of God, and offer it, each to other.

There hath not, these sixteen hundred years, this day passed without a peace-offering. And the law of a peace-offering is; he that offers it must take his part of it, eat of it, or it doth him no good. This day therefore the Church never fails, but sets forth her peace-offering;—the Body whose hands were here showed, and the side whence issued Sanguis crucis,[7]

[2] Luke 22:27.

[3] Revelation 7:17.

[4] Revelation 1:13.

[5] Discessit a medio "He left the centre"; stetit in medio "He stood in the centre."

[6] votum paschale "the Easter prayer"; festum pacis "the feast of peace."

[7] "the blood of the Cross."

"the Blood that pacifieth all things in earth and Heaven," that we, in and by it, may this day renew the covenant of our peace. Then can it not be but a great grief to a Christian heart, to see many this day give Christ's peace the hearing, and there is all; hear it, and then turn their backs on it; every man go his way, and forsake his peace; instead of seeking it shun it, and of pursuing, turn away from it.

We "have not so learned Christ,"[1] St. Paul hath not so taught us. his rule it is, "Is Christ our Passover offered for us" as now he was? Epulemur itaque—that is his conclusion, "Let us then keep a feast," a feast of sweet bread without any sour leaven, that is, of peace without any malice.[2]

So to do, and even then this day when we have the peace-offering in our hands, then, then, to remember always, but then specially to join with Christ in his wish; to put into our hearts, and the hearts of all that profess his name, theirs specially that are of all others most likely to effect it, that Christ may have his wish, and there may be peace through the Christian world; that we may once all partake together of one peace-offering, and "with one mouth and one mind glorify God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Nicholas Breton

?1555 – 1626

The son of a London merchant, the Oxford-educated Breton was a professional writer who published more than fifty books of poetry and prose in a wide variety of genres, including satires, religious meditations, pastorals, dialogues, essays, letter books, anthologies, and political pamphlets. The following selections are from The Good and the Badde, or Descriptions of the Worthies and Unworthies of this Age (1616), a collection of literary "characters" or descriptions of classes, occupations, or types of people. Breton presents his characters in twenty-five contrasting pairs (e.g. he juxtaposes the selections below with "A Good Man," "A Virgin," "An Unquiet Woman," and "A Worthy Lawyer"). The ostensible point of the genre—a popular one in the period—was didactic. "You will find your description in one place or the other," Breton tells his readers; "if among the Worthies, hold you where you are…if among the other, mend that [which] is amiss and all will be well." But style was equally important: like sonneteering, character-writing provided a forum for virtuoso displays of concision, wit, and rhetorical effect. The rhetorical trope Breton employs so relentlessly in the first three selections is isocolon, the repetition of phrases identical in length and structure. This pattern breaks down in the fourth, the "Unworthy Lawyer," a character much less abstract than the others. For other examples of character-writing, see the selections from the Overburian Character, Owen Felltham, John Earle, and Samuel Butler.

An Atheist or Most Bad Man

An atheist is a figure of desperation, who dare do anything even to his soul's damnation. He is in nature a dog, in wit an ass, in passion a bedlam,[1] and in action a devil. He makes sin a jest, grace a humour, truth a fable, and peace a cowardice. His horse is his pride, his sword is his castle, his apparel his riches, and his punk his paradise.[2] He makes robbery his purchase, lechery his solace, mirth his exercise, and drunkenness his glory. He is the danger of society, the love of vanity, the hate of charity, and the shame of humanity. He is God's enemy, his parents' grief, his country's plague, and his own confusion. He spoils that is necessary and spends that is needless. He spits at the gracious and spurns the godly. The tavern is his palace and his belly is his god; a whore is his mistress and the devil is his master. Oaths are his graces, wounds his badges, shifts are his practices, and beggary his payments. He knows not God, nor thinks of heaven, but walks through the world as a devil towards hell. Virtue knows him not, honesty finds him not, wisdom loves him not, and honour regards him not. He is but the cutler's friend and the chirurgeon's agent,[3] the thief's companion and the hangman's benefactor. He was begotten untimely and born unhappily, lives ungraciously and dies unchristianly. He is of no religion nor good fashion, hardly good complexion, and most vile in condition. In sum, he is a monster among men, a Jew among Christians, a fool among wise men, and a devil among saints.

[1] bedlam madman (OED bedlam 3).

[2] punk prostitute or mistress (OED punk sb^{1}).

[3] since he uses knives (made by cutlers) to create business for the surgeon.

A Wanton Woman

A wanton woman is the figure of imperfection; in nature an ape, in quality a wagtail, in countenance a witch, and in condition a kind of devil. Her beck is a net,[1] her word a charm, her look an illusion, and her company a confusion. Her life is the play of idleness, her diet the excess of dainties, her love the change of vanities, and her exercise the invention of follies. Her pleasures are fancies, her studies fashions, her delight colours, and her wealth her clothes. Her care is to deceive, her comfort her company, her house is vanity, and her bed is ruin. Her discourses are fables, her vows dissimulation, her conceits subtleties, and her contents varieties. She would she knows not what, and spends she cares not what, she spoils she sees not what, and doth she thinks not what. She is youth's plague and age's purgatory, time's abuse and reason's trouble. In sum, she is a spice of madness, a spark of mischief, a touch of poison, and a fear of destruction.

A Quiet Woman

A quiet woman is like a still wind, which neither chills the body, nor blows dust in the face. Her patience is a virtue that wins the heart of love and her wisdom makes her will well worthy regard. She fears God and flyeth sin, showeth kindness and loveth peace. Her tongue is tied to discretion and her heart is the harbour of goodness. She is a comfort of calamity and in prosperity a companion; a physician in sickness and a musician in help. Her ways are the walk toward heaven and her guide is the grace of the Almighty. She is her husband's down-bed where his heart lies at rest, and her children's glass in the notes of her grace; her servants' honour in the keeping of her house and her neighbours' example in the notes of a good nature. She scorns fortune and loves virtue and out of thrift gathereth charity. She is a turtle in her love, a lamb in her meekness, a saint in her heart, and an angel in her soul. In sum, she is a jewel unprizeable and a joy unspeakable, a comfort in nature incomparable and a wife in the world unmatchable.

An Unworthy Lawyer

An unlearned and unworthily called a lawyer is the figure of a foot-post, who carries letters but knows not what is in them, only can read the superscriptions to direct them to their right owners. So trudgeth this simple clerk, that can scarce read a case when it is written, with his handful of papers from one court to another and from one counsellor's chamber to another, when by his good payment for his pains he will be so saucy as to call himself a solicitor. But what a taking are poor clients in when this too much trusted cunning companion, better read in Piers Plowman than in Ploydon and in the play of Richard the Third than in the pleas of Edward the Fourth,[2] persuades them all is sure when he is sure of all! And in what a misery are the poor men when upon a Nihil dicit, because indeed this poor fellow Nihil potest dicere, they are in danger of an execution before they know wherefore they are condemned.[3] But I wish all such, more wicked than witty, unlearned in the Law and abusers of the same, to look a little better into their consciences and to leave their crafty courses, lest when the Law indeed lays them open, instead of carrying their papers in their hands they wear not papers on their heads,[1] and instead of giving ear to their clients' causes, or rather else into their purses, they have ne'er an ear left to hear withal, nor good eye to see withal, or at least honest face to look out withal; but, as the grasshoppers of Egypt, be counted the caterpillars of England,[2] and not the fox that stole the goose but the great fox that stole the farm from the gander.

[1] beck inviting look or signal (OED beck sb^{2} 1).

[2] that is, better read in popular literature (William Langland's fourteenth-century poem Piers Plowman or Shakespeare's Richard the Third) than in legal texts (Edmund Plowden's commentaries or medieval legal precedents).

[3] Nihil dicit "he says nothing": a judgment rendered against a defendant who fails to plead; Nihil potest dicere "lacks the ability to say anything."

[2] caterpillars a common Renaissance metaphor for social parasites.

1561 – 1621

Mary Sidney Herbert was born at Tickenhall near Bewdley, Worcestershire. Her parents were Sir Henry Sidney and Mary Dudley, the daughter of the Duke of Northumberland. Sir Henry Sidney held concurrent positions as Lord President of the Council of Wales (1559–86) and Lord Deputy of Ireland (1565–71, 1575–78). Mary was educated at home, where she read in the Church Fathers, the classics, and Latin, French, and Italian language and literature. She may also have studied Hebrew and Greek. She joined the royal household as Maid of Honour to Elizabeth I at the age of fourteen. Less than two years later, she married Henry Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, by whom she had four children. She assumed the role of hostess at Pembroke's Wiltshire estates and their London home, Baynards Castle. She transformed Wilton House into a sanctuary for poets and became one of the foremost patrons of the age. The Countess's father died in May and her mother in August 1586. In the same year, her brother, Sir Philip Sidney, died from injuries sustained in an attack on a Spanish convoy in the Netherlands.

The Countess undertook to complete her brother's paraphrase of the Psalms and assumed responsibility for publishing his works. She made revisions to Sir Philip's versions of Psalms 1–43, and completed the Psalter herself with paraphrases of Psalms 44 through 150.[1] Although the Sidney-Pembroke Psalter was not printed until the nineteenth century, copies circulated in manuscript, and their version was praised by such writers as John Donne, Ben Jonson and George Herbert. Donne wrote, "They tell us why, and teach us how to sing," and Herbert found in them the archetype of devotional poetry. The Countess's agility with metre, stanza forms and rhyme scheme, and her ability to respond to contemporary commentaries on the Psalms have been admired. Her Psalms might aptly be characterized products of creative paraphrase rather than literal translation.[2] The Countess produced three other translations: Philippe de Mornay's A Discourse of Life and Death, Robert Garnier's tragedy Antonius and Petrarch's Triumph of Death, works concerned with pious living, punishment of worldly desire, and preparation for death. As well as editing and publishing her brother's Arcadia, the Countess wrote a pastoral dialogue and two dedicatory poems addressed to Elizabeth I and Sir Philip Sidney. After she was widowed in 1601, the Countess resided in Houghton House until her death of smallpox.

[1] For the complex textual history of these poems, see the apparatus in the edition on which this selection is based: The Collected Works of Mary Sidney Herbert Countess of Pembroke, eds. Margaret P. Hannay, Noel J. Kinnamon and Michael G. Brennan, Vol. II (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1998).

[2] Pembroke particularly relied on Théodore de Bèze's Latin commentary on the Psalms, and took as her primary literary model the French-Genevan metrical Psalter, The Psalms of David, by Bèze and Clément Marot. Of the English translations of Scripture, she favoured the 1560 Geneva Bible.

The Psalms of David

Psalm 52 Quid Gloriaris?[1]

Tyrant, why swell'st thou thus,
Of mischief vaunting?[2]
Since help from God to us,
Is never wanting?

Lewd lies the tongue contrives,
Loud lies it soundeth:
Sharper than sharpest knives
With lies it woundeth.

Falsehood thy wit approves,
All truth rejected:
Thy will all vices loves,
Virtue neglected.

Not words from cursed thee,
But gulfs are poured.
Gulfs wherein daily be
Good men devoured.

Think'st thou to bear it so?[3]
God shall displace thee
God shall thee overthrow,
Crush thee, deface thee.

The just shall fearing see
These fearful chances:[4]
And laughing shoot at thee
With scornful glances.

Lo, lo the wretched wight,[5]
Who God disdaining,
His mischief made his might,
His guard his gaining.

I as an olive tree,[6]
Still green shall flourish:
God's house the soil shall be
My roots to nourish.

My trust on his true love
Truly attending,
Shall never thence remove,
Never see ending.

Thee will I honour still
Lord, for this justice:
There fix my hopes I will,
Where thy saints' trust is.

Thy saints trust in thy name,
Therein they joy them:
Protected by the same
Nought can annoy them.[7]

[1] Psalm 52 Psalm 52 is prefaced in the Geneva Bible: "1 David describeth the arrogant tyranny of his adversary Doeg: who by false surmises caused Ahimél[e]ch with the rest of the Priests to be slain 5 David prophecieth his destruction, 6 And encourageth the faithful to put their confidence in God, whose judgments are most sharp against his adversaries. 9 And finally he rendreth thanks to God for his deliverance. In this Psalm is lively set forth the kingdom of Antichrist." For the story of Doeg, see I Samuel 22.

[2] vaunting boasting (OED vaunting vb sb).

[3] to bear it to carry by assault; to carry the day (OED bear v^{1} Obs 3f).

[4] fearful chances dreadful events (OED fearful a I.1; OED chance sb A.I.2).

[6] olive tree In biblical literature, the olive tree is often an image of providence or abundance.

Psalm 58 Si Vere Utique [1]

And call ye this to utter what is just,
You that of justice hold the sov'reign throne?
And call ye this to yield, O sons of dust, [2]
To wronged brethren ev'ry man his own?
O no: it is your long malicious will [3]
Now to the world to make by practice known
With whose oppression you the balance fill,
Just to your selves, indiff'rent else to none.

But what could they, who ev'n in birth declined
From truth and right to lies and injuries?
To show the venom of their canc'red mind [4]
The adder's image scarcely can suffice.
Nay scarce the aspic may with them contend,
On whom the charmer all in vain applies
His skillfuls't spells: aye missing of his end, [5]
While she self-deaf, and unaffected lies. [6]

Lord crack their teeth, Lord crush these lions' jaws,
So let them sink as water in the sand:
When deadly bow their aiming fury draws,
Shiver the shaft ere past the shooter's hand.
So make them melt as the dishoused snail
Or as the embryo, whose vital band
Breaks ere it holds, and formless eyes do fail
To see the sun, though brought to lightful land.

O let their brood, a brood of springing thorns,
Be by untimely rooting overthrown
Ere bushes waxed, they push with pricking horns,
As fruits yet green are off by tempest blown. [7]
The good with gladness this revenge shall see,
And bathe his feet in blood of wicked one.
While all shall say: "the just rewarded be,
There is a God that carves to each his own."

[1] Psalm 58 Psalm 58 is prefaced in the Geneva Bible: "1 He [David] describeth the malice of his enemies, the flatterers of Saúl, who both secretly & openly sought his destruction, from whom he appealeth to God's judgment, 10 Showing that the just shall rejoice when they see the punishment of the wicked to the glory of God." In his heading to this Psalm, Bèze describes David's enemies as "a council of the states" gathered by Saul to prosecute David. Calvin labels them "rather a rout of murderers, than a Session of Judges."

[2] sons of dust probably an allusion to Genesis 3:14: "And the Lord God said unto the serpent…upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life"; perhaps also an allusion to Genesis 2:7, the story of man's creation from dust, as suggested by Pembroke's editors (Oxford, 1998).

[3] long malicious will long in duration, yet only now recognized by their actions.

[5] skillfuls't most clever (OED skilful a 4a); aye missing of his end always failing to achieve his purpose (OED ay,aye adv 1a; OED end sb II.14a).

[6] she self-deaf The Geneva notes for Psalm 58:4: "They pass in malice, and subtlety the crafty serpent, which could preserve himself by stopping his ear from the enchanter." The serpent is female in the Psalter, as she is in many medieval and early-modern representations of the Garden of Eden.

[7] waxed have grown (OED wax v^1 I.1 pa.pple); horns pointed or tapering projections (OED horn sb IV.21).

Psalm 74 Ut Quid, Deus[1]

O God, why hast thou thus
Repulsed, and scattered us?
Shall now thy wrath no limits hold?
But ever smoke and burn?
Till it to ashes turn
The chosen flock of thy dear fold?

Ah! think with milder thought
On them, whom thou hast bought,
And purchased from endless days:
Think of thy birthright lot,
Of Sion, on whose plot,
Thy sacred house supported stays.

Come Lord, O come with speed,
This sacrilegious seed
Root quickly out, and headlong cast:
All that thy holy place
Did late adorn and grace,
Their hateful hands have quite defaced.

Their beastly trumpets roar,
Where heavenly notes before
In praises of thy might did flow:
Within thy temple they
Their ensigns eft display
The ensigns, which their conquest show.[2]

As men with axe on arm
To some thick forest swarm,
To lop the trees which stately stand:
They to thy temple flock,
And spoiling, cut and knock
The curious works of carving hand.

Thy most most holy seat
The greedy flames do eat,
And have such ruthless ruins wrought,
That all thy house is 'rased,[3]
So 'rased, and so defaced,
That of that all remaineth nought.

Nay they resolved are,
We all alike shall fare,
All of one cruel cup shall taste.
For not one house doth stand
Of God in all the land,
But they by fire have laid it waste.

We see the signs no more
We wont to see before,[4]
Nor any now with sp'rit divine
Amongst us more is found,
Who can to us expound,
What term these dolours shall define.[5]

How long, O God, how long
Wilt thou wink at the wrong
Of thy reviling railing foe?
Shall he that hates thy name,
And hated paints with shame,[6]
So do, and do for ever so?

Woe us! what is the cause
Thy hand his help withdraws?

That thy right hand far from us keeps?
Ah let it once arise,
To plague thine enemies,
Which now embosomed idly sleeps.

Thou art my God, I know,
My King, who long ago
Didst undertake the charge of me:
And in my hard distress
Didst work me such release,
That all the earth did wond'ring see.

Thou by thy might didst make
That seas in sunder brake,
And dreadful dragons which before
In deep or swam or crawled,
Such mortal strokes appalled, [1]
They floated dead to every shore.

Thou crushed that monster's head
Whom other monsters dread,
And so his fishy flesh didst frame,
To serve as pleasing food
To all the ravening brood,
Who had the desert for their dame.

Thou wondrously didst cause
Repealing nature's laws
From thirsty flint a fountain flow
And of the rivers clear,
The sandy beds appear,
So dry thou mad'st their channels grow.

The day arrayed in light,
The shadow-clothed night,
Were made, and are maintained by thee.
The sun and sun-like rays,
The bounds of nights and days,
Thy workmanship no less they be.

To thee the earth doth owe,
That earth in sea doth grow,
And sea doth earth from drowning spare:
The summer's corny crown,
The winter's frosty gown,
Nought but thy badge, thy livery are.

Thou then still one, the same,
Think how thy glorious name
These brain-sick men's despite have borne, [2]
How abject enemies
The Lord of highest skies,
With cursed taunting tongues have torn.

Ah! give no hawk the power
Thy turtle to devour, [3]
Which sighs to thee with mourning moans:
Nor utterly out-rase
From tables of thy grace
The flock of thy afflicted ones. [4]

But call thy league to mind,
For horror all doth blind,
No light doth in the land remain:
Rape, murder, violence,
Each outrage, each offence,
Each where doth range, and rage and reign.

Enough, enough we mourn:
Let us no more return
Repulsed with blame and shame from thee:
But succour us oppressed,
And give the troubled rest,
That of thy praise their songs may be.

Rise God, plead thine own case,
Forget not what disgrace

Psalm 120 Ad Dominum[1]

As to th'Eternal often in anguishes
Erst have I called, never unanswered,[2]
Again I call, again I calling
Doubt not again to receive an answer.

Lord rid my soul from treasonous eloquence
Of filthy forgers craftily fraudulent:
And from the tongue where lodged resideth
Poisoned abuse, ruin of believers.

Thou that reposeth vainly thy confidence
In wily wronging, say by thy forgery
What good to thee? What gain redoundeth?[3]
What benefit from a tongue deceitful?

Though like an arrow strongly delivered
It deeply pierce, though like to a juniper
It coals do cast which quickly fired,
Flame very hot, very hardly quenching?[4]

Ah God! too long here wander I banished,
Too long abiding barbarous injury:
With Kedar and with Mesech harboured,[5]
How? in a tent, in a houseless harbour.

Too long, alas, too long have I dwelled here
With friendly peace's furious enemies:
Who when to peace I seek to call them,
Faster I find to the war they arm them.

Francis Bacon

1561 – 1626

The younger son of the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, Bacon attended Trinity College, Cambridge, studied law at Gray's Inn, and spent three years in Paris with the English ambassador before completing his law studies in 1582. Despite his legal brilliance and high-ranking connections, Bacon failed to win office under Queen Elizabeth, though he did play a key role in the prosecution of his former friend Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex. His rise began with the accession of James I: between 1603 and 1621, Bacon was successively knighted (1603), made Solicitor-General (1607), Attorney-General (1613), Lord Keeper (1617), Lord High Chancellor and Baron Verulam (1618), and Viscount St. Albans (1621). In 1621 Bacon was brought before Parliament for accepting bribes; he pleaded guilty, was deprived of office, and retired to private life. Bacon appears to have been no more corrupt than any other office holder of the period: the real cause of his fall from power was Parliament's hostility to the King and the royal favourite, the Duke of Buckingham. They were untouchable, but Bacon, a leading royal minister, was not. According to John Aubrey, Bacon died of pneumonia contracted while experimenting with the refrigerating qualities of snow.

Throughout his busy political and legal career, Bacon actively pursued his literary and philosophical interests. In 1597 he published the first version of his Essays, containing ten short, aphoristic pieces. Bacon revised and expanded the collection for the remainder of his life, publishing enlarged versions in 1612 and 1625; eventually, the collection grew to 58 essays (the 1597 and 1625 versions of "Of Studies" are both printed here for comparison). The Essays provided seventeenth-century writers with an important model of both genre and prose style. But the bulk of Bacon's work was in the philosophy of science. Bacon sought to provide science with a new method, one based on evidence and observation, and he thought big: "I have taken all knowledge to be my province," he wrote in a letter to Lord Burghley. The following excerpts from Novum Organum (published in Latin in 1620) include Bacon's influential discussion of scientific method and of the intellectual, psychological, and linguistic obstacles we continue to face in the pursuit of knowledge. Bacon has been criticized for downplaying the real scientific achievements of his time, such as Copernican astronomy and William Gilbert's work on magnetism. More recently, he has been read unfavourably (and not always fairly) as a founding voice in the discourses of scientific progress and of humanity's domination over nature. But he was also a writer of immense intellectual achievement whose perception, originality, and style would prove quite influential, particularly in the Restoration (see the selection from Thomas Sprat's History of the Royal Society). In addition to pamphlets on legal, religious, and political issues, Bacon's other works include The Advancement of Learning (1605); De sapientia veterum (1609), which discusses classical myths as symbolic expressions of scientific truths; a biography, The Historie of the Raigne of King Henry the Seventh (1622); The New Atlantis (1627), a utopian tale of a futuristic community devoted to science; Sylva Sylvarum (1627), an encyclopedic natural history; as well as court masques, a translation of the Psalms, apophthegms, and other studies of natural history.

"What is Truth?" said jesting Pilate, and would not stay for an answer.[1] Certainly there be that delight in giddiness, and count it a bondage to fix a belief; affecting free-will in thinking, as well as in acting. And though the sects of philosophers of that kind be gone,[2] yet there remain certain discoursing wits which are of the same veins, though there be not so much blood in them as was in those of the ancients. But it is not only the difficulty and labour which men take in finding out of truth, nor again that when it is found it imposeth upon men's thoughts, that doth bring lies in favour; but a natural though corrupt love of the lie itself. One of the latter school of the Grecians examineth the matter,[3] and is at a stand to think what should be in it, that men should love lies, where neither they make for pleasure, as with poets, nor for advantage, as with the merchant; but for the lie's sake. But I cannot tell: this same truth is a naked and open daylight, that doth not show the masks and mummeries and triumphs of the world half so stately and daintily as candle-lights. Truth may perhaps come to the price of a pearl, that showeth best by day; but it will not rise to the price of a diamond or carbuncle, that showeth best in varied lights. A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure.

Doth any man doubt, that if there were taken out of men's minds vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like, but it would leave the minds of a number of men poor shrunken things, full of melancholy and indisposition, and unpleasing to themselves? One of the Fathers, in great severity, called poesy vinum daemonum [wine of devils] because it filleth the imagination;[4] and yet it is but with the shadow of a lie. But it is not the lie that passeth through the mind, but the lie that sinketh in and settleth in it, that doth the hurt; such as we spake of before. But howsoever these things are thus in men's depraved judgements and affections, yet truth, which only doth judge itself, teacheth that the inquiry of truth, which is the love-making or wooing of it, the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it, and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature.

The first creature of God, in the works of the days, was the light of the sense; the last was the light of reason; and his sabbath work ever since, is the illumination of his Spirit. First he breathed light upon the face of the matter or chaos; then he breathed light into the face of man; and still he breatheth and inspireth light into the face of his chosen. The poet that beautified the sect that was otherwise inferior to the rest saith yet excellently well: "It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore, and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle, and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below: but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of Truth" (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), "and to see the errors, and wanderings, and mists, and tempests, in the vale below";[5] so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling or pride. Certainly, it is heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.

To pass from theological and philosophical truth to the truth of civil business; it will be acknowledged even by those that practise it not that clear and round dealing is the honour of man's nature; and that mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it embaseth it. For these winding and crooked courses are the goings of the serpent, which goeth basely upon the belly, and not upon the feet. There is no vice that doth so cover a man with shame as to be found false and perfidious. And therefore Montaigne saith prettily, when he inquired the reason, why the word of the lie should be such a disgrace and such an odious charge? Saith he, "If it be well weighed, to say that a man lieth, is as much to say, as that he is brave towards God and a coward towards men."[1] For a lie faces God, and shrinks from man. Surely the wickedness of falsehood and breach of faith cannot possibly be so highly expressed, as in that it shall be the last peal to call the judgements of God upon the generations of men; it being foretold, that when Christ cometh, "he shall not find faith upon the earth."[2]

OF SIMULATION AND DISSIMULATION

Dissimulation is but a faint kind of policy or wisdom; for it asketh a strong wit and a strong heart to know when to tell truth, and to do it. Therefore it is the weaker sort of politiques that are the great dissemblers.[3]

Tacitus saith, "Livia sorted well with the arts of her husband and dissimulation of her son"; attributing arts or policy to Augustus, and dissimulation to Tiberius. And again, when Mucianus encourageth Vespasian to take arms against Vitellius, he saith, "We rise not against the piercing judgment of Augustus, nor the extreme caution or closeness of Tiberius." These properties, of arts or policy and dissimulation or closeness, are indeed habits and faculties several, and to be distinguished. For if a man have that penetration of judgment as he can discern what things are to be laid open, and what to be secreted, and what to be showed at half lights, and to whom and when (which indeed are arts of state and arts of life, as Tacitus well calleth them), to him a habit of dissimulation is a hindrance and a poorness. But if a man cannot obtain to that judgment, then it is left to him generally to be close, and a dissembler. For where a man cannot choose or vary in particulars, there it is good to take the safest and wariest way in general; like the going softly, by one that cannot well see. Certainly the ablest men that ever were have had all an openness and frankness of dealing; and a name of certainty and veracity;[4] but then they were like horses well managed; for they could tell passing well when to stop or turn; and at such times when they thought the case indeed required dissimulation, if then they used it, it came to pass that the former opinion spread abroad of their good faith and clearness of dealing made them almost invisible.

There be three degrees of this hiding and veiling of a man's self. The first, closeness, reservation, and secrecy; when a man leaveth himself without observation, or without hold to be taken, what he is. The second, dissimulation, in the negative; when a man lets fall signs and arguments, that he is not that he is. And the third, simulation, in the affirmative; when a man industriously and expressly feigns and pretends to be that he is not.

For the first of these, secrecy; it is indeed the virtue of a confessor. And assuredly the secret man heareth many confessions. For who will open himself to a blab or babbler? But if a man be thought secret, it inviteth discovery; as the more close air sucketh in the more open; and as in confession the revealing is not for worldly use, but for the ease of a man's heart, so secret men come to the knowledge of many things in that kind; while men rather discharge their minds than impart their minds. In few words, mysteries are due to secrecy. Besides (to say truth) nakedness is uncomely, as well in mind as body; and it addeth no small reverence to men's manners and actions, if they be not altogether open. As for talkers and futile persons,[1] they are commonly vain and credulous withal. For he that talketh what he knoweth, will also talk what he knoweth not. Therefore set it down, that an habit of secrecy is both politic and moral. And in this part, it is good that a man's face give his tongue leave to speak. For the discovery of a man's self by the tracts of his countenance is a great weakness and betraying; by how much it is many times more marked and believed than a man's words.

[2] Luke 18:8.

[3] politiques men of public life; politicians.

[4] name of certainty reputation for reliability.

For the second, which is dissimulation; it followeth many times upon secrecy by a necessity; so that he that will be secret must be a dissembler in some degree. For men are too cunning to suffer a man to keep an indifferent carriage between both, and to be secret, without swaying the balance on either side. They will so beset a man with questions, and draw him on, and pick it out of him, that, without an absurd silence, he must show an inclination one way; or if he do not, they will gather as much by his silence as by his speech. As for equivocations, or oraculous speeches, they cannot hold out long. So that no man can be secret, except he give himself a little scope of dissimulation; which is, as it were, but the skirts or train of secrecy.

But for the third degree, which is simulation and false profession; that I hold more culpable, and less politic; except it be in great and rare matters. And therefore a general custom of simulation (which is this last degree) is a vice, rising either of a natural falseness or fearfulness, or of a mind that hath some main faults, which because a man must needs disguise, it maketh him practice simulation in other things, lest his hand should be out of ure.[2]

The great advantages of simulation and dissimulation are three. First, to lay asleep opposition, and to surprise. For where a man's intentions are published, it is an alarum to call up all that are against them. The second is, to reserve to a man's self a fair retreat. For if a man engage himself by a manifest declaration, he must go through or take a fall. The third is, the better to discover the mind of another. For to him that opens himself men will hardly show themselves adverse; but will (fair) let him go on, and turn their freedom of speech to freedom of thought. And therefore it is a good shrewd proverb of the Spaniard, "Tell a lie and find a truth." As if there were no way of discovery but by simulation. There be also three disadvantages, to set it even. The first, that simulation and dissimulation commonly carry with them a show of fearfulness, which in any business doth spoil the feathers of round flying up to the mark.[3] The second, that it puzzleth and perplexeth the conceits of many, that perhaps would otherwise cooperate with him; and makes a man walk almost alone to his own ends. The third and greatest, is, that it depriveth a man of one of the most principal instruments for action; which is trust and belief. The best composition and temperature is to have openness in fame and opinion;[4] secrecy in habit; dissimulation in seasonable use; and a power to feign, if there be no remedy.

OF MARRIAGE AND SINGLE LIFE

He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief. Certainly the best works, and of greatest merit for the public, have proceeded from the unmarried or childless men; which both in affection and means have married and endowed the public. Yet it were great reason that those that have children should have greatest care of future times; unto which they know they must transmit their dearest pledges. Some there are, who though they lead a single life, yet their thoughts do end with themselves, and account future times impertinences. Nay, there are some other that account wife and children but as bills of charges. Nay more, there are some foolish rich covetous men, that take a pride in having no children, because they may be thought so much the richer. For perhaps they have heard some talk, "Such an one is a great rich man," and another except to it, "Yea, but he hath a great charge of children"; as if it were an abatement to his riches. But the most ordinary cause of a single life is liberty, especially in certain self-pleasing and humorous minds,[1] which are so sensible of every restraint, as they will go near to think their girdles and garters to be bonds and shackles.

Unmarried men are best friends, best masters, best servants; but not always best subjects; for they are light to run away; and almost all fugitives are of that condition. A single life doth well with churchmen; for charity will hardly water the ground where it must first fill a pool. It is indifferent for judges and magistrates; for if they be facile and corrupt,[2] you shall have a servant five times worse than a wife. For soldiers, I find the generals commonly in their hortatives put men in mind of their wives and children; and I think the despising of marriage amongst the Turks maketh the vulgar soldier more base. Certainly wife and children are a kind of discipline of humanity; and single men, though they may be many times more charitable, because their means are less exhaust, yet, on the other side, they are more cruel and hardhearted (good to make severe inquisitors), because their tenderness is not so oft called upon. Grave natures, led by custom, and therefore constant, are commonly loving husbands; as was said of Ulysses, vetulam suam praetulit immortalitati.[3] Chaste women are often proud and froward, as presuming upon the merit of their chastity. It is one of the best bonds both of chastity and obedience in the wife, if she think her husband wise; which she will never do if she find him jealous. Wives are young men's mistresses; companions for middle age; and old men's nurses. So as a man may have a quarrel to marry when he will. But yet he was reputed one of the wise men, that made answer to the question, when a man should marry?—"A young man not yet, an elder man not at all."[4] It is often seen that bad husbands have very good wives; whether it be that it raiseth the price of their husband's kindness when it comes; or that the wives take a pride in their patience. But this never fails, if the bad husbands were of their own choosing, against their friends' consent; for then they will be sure to make good their own folly.

OF LOVE

The stage is more beholding to Love, than the life of man. For as to the stage, love is ever matter of comedies, and now and then of tragedies; but in life it doth much mischief; sometimes like a siren, sometimes like a fury. You may observe, that amongst all the great and worthy persons whereof the memory remaineth, either ancient or recent, there is not one that hath been transported to the mad degree of love: which shows that great spirits and great business do keep out this weak passion. You must except nevertheless Marcus Antonius, the half-partner of the empire of Rome,[1] and Appius Claudius, the decemvir and lawgiver;[2] whereof the former was indeed a voluptuous man, and inordinate; but the latter was an austere and wise man: and therefore it seems (though rarely) that love can find entrance not only into an open heart, but also into a heart well fortified, if watch be not well kept. It is a poor saying of Epicurus, Satis magnum alter alteri theatrum sumus;[3] as if man, made for the contemplation of heaven and all noble objects, should do nothing but kneel before a little idol, and make himself a subject, though not of the mouth (as beasts are), yet of the eye; which was given him for higher purposes.

[1] humorous whimsical.

[2] facile easily swayed, compliant (OED facile a 5).

[3] a Latin version of Odyssey v.135: "He preferred his old wife to immortality."

[4] Thales (b. seventh century B.C.E.), one of the Seven Sages of ancient Greece; the story is told in several classical sources.

It is a strange thing to note the excess of this passion, and how it braves the nature and value of things, by this: that the speaking in a perpetual hyperbole is comely in nothing but in love. Neither is it merely in the phrase; for whereas it hath been well said that the arch-flatterer, with whom all the petty flatterers have intelligence, is a man's self; certainly the lover is more. For there was never proud man thought so absurdly well of himself as the lover doth of the person loved; and therefore it was well said, that "it is impossible to love and to be wise."[4] Neither doth this weakness appear to others only, and not to the party loved; but to the loved most of all, except the love be reciproque. For it is a true rule, that love is ever rewarded either with the reciproque or with an inward and secret contempt. By how much the more men ought to beware of this passion, which loseth not only other things, but itself. As for the other losses, the poet's relation doth well figure them; that he that preferred Helena, quitted the gifts of Juno and Pallas.[5] For whosoever esteemeth too much of amorous affection quitteth both riches and wisdom.

This passion hath his floods in the very times of weakness, which are great prosperity and great adversity, though this latter hath been less observed: both which times kindle love, and make it more fervent, and therefore show it to be the child of folly. They do best, who if they cannot but admit love, yet make it keep quarter, and sever it wholly from their serious affairs and actions of life; for if it check once with business, it troubleth men's fortunes, and maketh men that they can no ways be true to their own ends. I know not how, but martial men are given to love: I think it is but as they are given to wine; for perils commonly ask to be paid in pleasures. There is in man's nature a secret inclination and motion towards love of others, which if it be not spent upon some one or a few, doth naturally spread itself towards many, and maketh men become humane and charitable; as it is seen sometime in friars. Nuptial love maketh mankind; friendly love perfecteth it; but wanton love corrupteth and embaseth it.

OF SEDITIONS AND TROUBLES

Shepherds of people had need know the calendars of tempests in state;[1] which are commonly greatest when things grow to equality; as natural tempests are greatest about the Equinoctia.[2] And as there are certain hollow blasts of wind and secret swellings of seas before a tempest, so are there in states:

> ———— Ille etiam caecos instare tumultus
> Saepe monet, fraudesque et operta tumescere bella.[3]

Libels and licentious discourses against the state, when they are frequent and open; and in like sort, false news often running up and down to the disadvantage of the state and hastily embraced; are amongst the signs of troubles. Virgil giving the pedigree of fame, saith she was sister to the Giants:

> Illam Terra parens, ira irritata Deorum,
> Extremam (ut perhibent) Coeo Enceladoque sororem
> Progenuit.[4]

As if fames were the relics of seditions past; but they are no less indeed the preludes of seditions to come. Howsoever he noteth it right, that seditious tumults and seditious fames differ no more but as brother and sister, masculine and feminine; especially if it come to that, that the best actions of a state, and the most plausible, and which ought to give greatest contentment, are taken in ill sense, and traduced: for that shows the envy great, as Tacitus saith, conflata magna invidia, seu bene seu male gesta premunt.[5] Neither doth it follow, that because these fames are a sign of troubles, that the suppressing of them with too much severity should be a remedy of troubles. For the despising of them many times checks them best; and the going about to stop them doth but make a wonder long-lived. Also that kind of obedience which Tacitus speaketh of, is to be held suspected: Erant in officio, sed tamen qui mallent mandata imperantium interpretari quam exequi;[6] disputing, excusing, cavilling upon mandates and directions, is a kind of shaking off the yoke, and assay of disobedience; especially if in those disputings they which are for the direction speak fearfully and tenderly, and those that are against it audaciously.

Also, as Machiavel noteth well, when princes, that ought to be common parents, make themselves as a party, and lean to a side, it is as a boat that is overthrown by uneven weight on the one side; as was well seen in the time of Henry the Third of France; for first himself entered league for the extirpation of the Protestants; and presently after the same league was turned upon himself. For when the authority of princes is made but an accessary to a cause, and that there be other bands that tie faster than the band of sovereignty, kings begin to be put almost out of possession.

Also, when discords, and quarrels, and factions, are carried openly and audaciously, it is a sign the reverence of government is lost. For the motions of the greatest persons in a government ought to be as the motions of the planets under primum mobile (according to the old opinion),[7] which is, that every of them is carried swiftly by the highest motion, and softly in their own motion. And therefore, when great ones in their own particular motion move violently, and, as Tacitus expresseth it well, liberius quam ut imperantium meminissent,[1] it is a sign the orbs are out of frame. For reverence is that wherewith princes are girt from God; who threateneth the dissolving thereof: Solvam cingula regum.[2]

[1] calendars predictable times.

[2] Equinoctia spring and autumn equinoxes.

[3] Virgil, Georgics, i.464–65: the sun "often warns us that dark tumults threaten, and deceits and hidden wars are swelling."

[4] Aeneid, iv.178–80: "Mother earth (as they relate), irritated by anger against the gods, brought forth [Rumour] last as sister to Coeus and Enceladus."

[5] Histories, i.7: "when envy is once roused, good actions are as much assailed as bad."

[6] Histories, ii.39: "they were on duty, but none the less preferred to interpret the orders of their generals rather than follow them."

[7] primum mobile the prime or first mover; in Ptolemaic astronomy, the outermost of the heavenly spheres, from which the other spheres all derived their motion.

So when any of the four pillars of government are mainly shaken or weakened (which are Religion, Justice, Counsel, and Treasure), men had need to pray for fair weather. But let us pass from this part of predictions (concerning which, nevertheless, more light may be taken from that which followeth); and let us speak first of the materials of seditions; then of the motives of them; and thirdly of the remedies.

Concerning the materials of seditions. It is a thing well to be considered; for the surest way to prevent seditions (if the times do bear it) is to take away the matter of them. For if there be fuel prepared, it is hard to tell whence the spark shall come that shall set it on fire. The matter of seditions is of two kinds; much poverty and much discontentment. It is certain, so many overthrown estates, so many votes for troubles. Lucan noteth well the state of Rome before the civil war,

> Hinc usura vorax, rapidumque in tempore foenus,
> Hinc concussa fides, et multis utile bellum.[3]

This same multis utile bellum, is an assured and infallible sign of a state disposed to seditions and troubles. And if this poverty and broken estate in the better sort be joined with a want and necessity in the mean people, the danger is imminent and great. For the rebellions of the belly are the worst. As for discontentments, they are in the politic body like to humours in the natural, which are apt to gather a preternatural heat and to inflame. And let no prince measure the danger of them by this, whether they be just or unjust: for that were to imagine people to be too reasonable; who do often spurn at their own good: nor yet by this, whether the griefs whereupon they rise be in fact great or small: for they are the most dangerous discontentments where the fear is greater than the feeling: Dolendi modus, timendi non item.[4] Besides, in great oppressions, the same things that provoke the patience, do withal mate the courage;[5] but in fears it is not so. Neither let any prince or state be secure concerning discontentments, because they have been often, or have been long, and yet no peril hath ensued: for as it is true that every vapour or fume doth not turn into a storm; so it is nevertheless true that storms, though they blow over divers times, yet may fall at last; and, as the Spanish proverb noteth well, "The cord breaketh at the last by the weakest pull."

The causes and motives of seditions are, innovation in religion; taxes; alteration of laws and customs; breaking of privileges; general oppression; advancement of unworthy persons; strangers; dearths; disbanded soldiers; factions grown desperate; and whatsoever, in offending people, joineth and knitteth them in a common cause.

For the remedies; there may be some general preservatives, whereof we will speak: as for the just cure, it must answer to the particular disease; and so be left to counsel rather than rule.

The first remedy or prevention is to remove by all means possible that material cause of sedition whereof we spake; which is, want and poverty in the estate. To which purpose serveth, the opening and well-balancing of trade; the cherishing of manufactures; the banishing of idleness; the repressing of waste and excess by sumptuary laws; the improvement and husbanding of the soil; the regulating of prices of things vendible; the moderating of taxes and tributes, and the like. Generally, it is to be foreseen that the population of a kingdom (especially if it be not mown down by wars) do not exceed the stock of the kingdom which should maintain them. Neither is the population to be reckoned only by number; for a smaller number that spend more and earn less, do wear out an estate sooner than a greater number that live lower and gather more. Therefore the multiplying of nobility and other degrees of quality in an over-proportion to the common people, doth speedily bring a state to necessity; and so doth likewise an overgrown clergy; for they bring nothing to the stock; and in like manner, when more are bred scholars than preferments can take off.

[2] "I will loosen the girdles of kings," a combination of Job 12:18 and Isaiah 45:1. That is, loss of reverence is the first stage in a king's loss of authority.

[3] Pharsalia, i.181–82: "Hence devouring usury and interest rapidly compounded, hence shaken credit, and war profitable to many."

[4] Pliny, Epistles, viii.17: "There is an end to suffering, but not to fearing."

[5] mate abate, daunt, subdue (OED mate v^1 2–5).

It is likewise to be remembered, that forasmuch as the increase of any estate must be upon the foreigner (for whatsoever is somewhere gotten is somewhere lost), there be but three things which one nation selleth unto another: the commodity as nature yieldeth it; the manufacture; and the vecture, or carriage. So that if these three wheels go, wealth will flow as in a spring tide. And it cometh many times to pass, that materiam superabit opus;[1] that the work and carriage is more worth than the material, and enricheth a state more; as is notably seen in Low-Countrymen, who have the best mines above ground in the world.[2]

Above all things, good policy is to be used that the treasure and monies in a state be not gathered into few hands. For otherwise a state may have a great stock, and yet starve. And money is like muck, not good except it be spread. This is done chiefly by suppressing, or at least keeping a straight hand upon the devouring trades of usury, engrossing,[3] great pasturages,[4] and the like.

For removing discontentments, or at least the danger of them; there is in every state (as we know) two portions of subjects; the nobility and the commonality. When one of these is discontent, the danger is not great; for common people are of slow motion, if they be not excited by the greater sort; and the greater sort are of small strength, except the multitude be apt and ready to move of themselves. Then is the danger, when the greater sort do but wait for the troubling of the waters amongst the meaner, that then they may declare themselves. The poets feign, that the rest of the gods would have bound Jupiter; which he hearing of, by the counsel of Pallas, sent for Briareus, with his hundred hands, to come in to his aid. An emblem, no doubt, to show how safe it is for monarchs to make sure of the good will of common people.

To give moderate liberty for griefs and discontentments to evaporate (so it be without too great insolency or bravery), is a safe way. For he that turneth the humours back, and maketh the wound bleed inwards, endangereth malign ulcers and pernicious imposthumations.[5]

The part of Epimetheus might well become Prometheus, in the case of discontentments; for there is not a better provision against them.[6] Epimetheus, when griefs and evils flew abroad, at last shut the lid, and kept hope in the bottom of the vessel. Certainly, the politic and artificial nourishing and entertaining of hopes,[1] and carrying men from hopes to hopes, is one of the best antidotes against the poison of discontentments. And it is a certain sign of a wise government and proceeding, when it can hold men's hearts by hopes, when it cannot by satisfaction; and when it can handle things in such manner, as no evil shall appear so peremptory but that it hath some outlet of hope: which is the less hard to do, because both particular persons and factions are apt enough to flatter themselves, or at least to brave that, which they believe not.

[2] mines above ground figurative: despite a lack of natural resources, the Dutch built a commercial empire on their skills in manufacturing and transportation.

[3] engrossing buying in bulk to create a monopoly.

[4] great pasturages enclosures, which denied small landowners access to lands once used in common.

[5] imposthumations tumours.

[6] Epimetheus the name means "afterthought"; his use of hope would be an appropriate precaution or "forethought" (the meaning of Prometheus's name) in dealing with discontentments.

Also the foresight and prevention, that there be no likely or fit head whereunto discontented persons may resort, and under whom they may join, is a known, but an excellent point of caution. I understand a fit head to be one that hath greatness and reputation; that hath confidence with the discontented party, and upon whom they turn their eyes; and that is thought discontented in his own particular: which kind of persons are either to be won and reconciled to the state, and that in a fast and true manner; or to be fronted with some other of the same party, that may oppose them, and so divide the reputation. Generally, the dividing and breaking of all factions and combinations that are adverse to the state, and setting them at distance, or at least distrust, amongst themselves, is not one of the worst remedies. For it is a desperate case, if those that hold with the proceeding of the state be full of discord and faction, and those that are against it be entire and united.

I have noted that some witty and sharp speeches which have fallen from princes have given fire to seditions. Caesar did himself infinite hurt in that speech, Sulla nescivit literas, non potuit dictare;[2] for it did utterly cut off that hope which men had entertained, that he would at one time or other give over his dictatorship. Galba undid himself by that speech, legi a se militem, non emi; for it put the soldiers out of hope of the donative.[3] Probus likewise, by that speech, si vixero, non opus erit amplius Romano imperio militibus;[4] a speech of great despair for the soldiers. And many the like. Surely princes had need, in tender matters and ticklish times, to beware what they say; especially in these short speeches, which fly abroad like darts, and are thought to be shot out of their secret intentions. For as for large discourses, they are flat things, and not so much noted.

Lastly, let princes, against all events, not be without some great person, one or rather more, of military valour, near unto them, for the repressing of seditions in their beginnings. For without that, there useth to be more trepidation in court upon the first breaking out of troubles than were fit. And the state runneth the danger of that which Tacitus saith: Atque is habitus animorum fuit, ut pessimum facinus auderent pauci, plures vellent, omnes paterentur.[5] But let such military persons be assured, and well reputed of, rather than factious and popular; holding also good correspondence with the other great men in the state; or else the remedy is worse than the disease.

OF TRAVEL

Travel, in the younger sort, is a part of education; in the elder, a part of experience. He that travelleth into a country before he hath some entrance into the language, goeth to school,[1] and not to travel. That young men travel under some tutor, or grave servant, I allow well; so he be such a one that hath the language, and hath been in the country before; whereby he may be able to tell them what things are worthy to be seen in the country where they go; what acquaintances they are to seek; what exercises or discipline the place yieldeth. For else young men shall go hooded, and look abroad little. It is a strange thing, that in sea voyages, where there is nothing to be seen but sky and sea, men should make diaries; but in land-travel, wherein so much is to be observed, for the most part they omit it; as if chance were fitter to be registered than observation. Let diaries therefore be brought in use.

[1] artificial skillful.

[2] "Sulla did not know his letters, he could not dictate" [punning on "act the dictator"].

[3] "He selected his soldiers, and did not buy them"; donative bonus payment.

[4] "If I live, the Roman empire shall have no more need of soldiers."

[5] Tacitus, Histories, I:28: "And such was the condition of their minds, that a few dared the most evil deeds, more desired them, all permitted them."

The things to be seen and observed are: the courts of princes, specially when they give audience to ambassadors; the courts of justice, while they sit and hear causes; and so of consistories ecclesiastic; the churches and monasteries, with the monuments which are therein extant; the walls and fortifications of cities and towns, and so the havens and harbours; antiquities and ruins; libraries; colleges, disputations, and lectures, where any are; shipping and navies; houses and gardens of state and pleasure, near great cities; armories; arsenals; magazines; exchanges; bourses; warehouses; exercises of horsemanship, fencing, training of soldiers, and the like; comedies, such whereunto the better sort of persons do resort; treasuries of jewels and robes; cabinets and rarities; and, to conclude, whatsoever is memorable in the places where they go. After all which the tutors or servants ought to make diligent inquiry. As for triumphs, masques, feasts, weddings, funerals, capital executions, and such shows, men need not to be put in mind of them; yet are they not to be neglected.

If you will have a young man to put his travel into a little room, and in short time to gather much, this you must do. First as was said, he must have some entrance into the language before he goeth. Then he must have such a servant or tutor as knoweth the country, as was likewise said. Let him carry with him also some card or book describing the country where he travelleth;[2] which will be a good key to his inquiry. Let him keep also a diary. Let him not stay long in one city or town; more or less as the place deserveth, but not long; nay, when he stayeth in one city or town, let him change his lodging from one end and part of the town to another; which is a great adamant of acquaintance.[3] Let him sequester himself from the company of his countrymen, and diet in such places where there is good company of the nation where he travelleth. Let him upon his removes from one place to another, procure recommendation to some person of quality residing in the place whither he removeth; that he may use his favour in those things he desireth to see or know. Thus he may abridge his travel with much profit.

As for the acquaintance which is to be sought in travel; that which is most of all profitable, is acquaintance with the secretaries and employed men of ambassadors: for so in travelling in one country, he shall suck the experience of many. Let him also see and visit eminent persons in all kinds, which are of great name abroad; that he may be able to tell how the life agreeth with the fame. For quarrels, they are with care and discretion to be avoided. They are commonly for mistresses, healths, place, and words. And let a man beware how he keepeth company with choleric and quarrelsome persons; for they will engage him into their own quarrels. When a traveller returneth home, let him not leave the countries where he hath travelled altogether behind him; but maintain a correspondence by letters with those of his acquaintance which are of most worth. And let his travel appear rather in his discourse than in his apparel or gesture; and in his discourse let him be rather advised in his answers, than forward to tell stories; and let it appear that he doth not change his country manners for those of foreign parts; but only prick in some flowers of that he hath learned abroad into the customs of his own country.[1]

OF EMPIRE

It is a miserable state of mind to have few things to desire, and many things to fear: and yet that commonly is the case of kings; who, being at the highest, want matter of desire, which makes their minds more languishing; and have many representations of perils and shadows, which makes their minds the less clear. And this is one reason also of that effect which the Scripture speaketh of, that "the king's heart is inscrutable" [Proverbs 25:3]. For multitude of jealousies, and lack of some predominant desire that should marshal and put in order all the rest, maketh any man's heart hard to find or sound. Hence it comes likewise, that princes many times make themselves desires, and set their hearts upon toys; sometimes upon a building; sometimes upon erecting of an order; sometimes upon the advancing of a person; sometimes upon obtaining excellency in some art or feat of the hand; as Nero for playing on the harp, Domitian for certainty of the hand with the arrow, Commodus for playing at fence, Caracalla for driving chariots, and the like.[2] This seemeth incredible unto those that know not the principle, that the mind of man is more cheered and refreshed by profiting in small things, than by standing at a stay in great. We see also that kings that have been fortunate conquerors in their first years, it being not possible for them to go forward infinitely, but that they must have some check or arrest in their fortunes, turn in their latter years to be superstitious and melancholy; as did Alexander the Great; Diocletian; and in our memory, Charles the Fifth;[3] and others. For he that is used to go forward, and findeth a stop, falleth out of his own favour, and is not the thing he was.

To speak now of the true temper of empire; it is a thing rare and hard to keep; for both temper and distemper consist of contraries. But it is one thing to mingle contraries, another to interchange them. The answer of Apollonius to Vespasian is full of excellent instruction. Vespasian asked him, "what was Nero's overthrow?" He answered, "Nero could touch and tune the harp well; but in government sometimes he used to wind the pins too high, sometimes to let them down too low." And certain it is that nothing destroyeth authority so much as the unequal and untimely interchange of power pressed too far, and relaxed too much.

This is true, that the wisdom of all these latter times in princes' affairs is rather fine deliveries and shiftings of dangers and mischiefs when they are near, than solid and grounded courses to keep them aloof. But this is but to try masteries with fortune. And let men beware how they neglect and suffer matter of trouble to be prepared; for no man can forbid the spark, nor tell whence it may come. The difficulties in princes' business are many and great; but the greatest difficulty is often in their own mind. For it is common with princes (saith Tacitus) to will contradictories: Sunt plerumque regum voluntates vehementes, et inter se contrariae.[4] For it is the solecism of power, to think to command the end, and yet not to endure the mean.

[2] Nero, Domitian, Commodus, and Caracalla were all Roman emperors; playing at fence fencing or swordplay: Commodus (emperor 180–192 C.E.) performed frequently as a gladiator.

[3] Charles the Fifth (Holy Roman Emperor 1519–1558) abdicated after a long and successful reign, though more likely because of illness and old age than melancholy.

[4] Not Tacitus, but Sallust, Bellum Jugurthinum, cxiii.1: "The desires of kings are commonly vehement and contradictory."

Kings have to deal with their neighbours, their wives, their children, their prelates or clergy, their nobles, their second-nobles or gentlemen, their merchants, their commons, and their men of war; and from all these arise dangers, if care and circumspection be not used.

First for their neighbours: there can no general rule be given (the occasions are so variable), save one, which ever holdeth; which is, that princes do keep due sentinel, that none of their neighbours do overgrow so (by increase of territory, by embracing of trade, by approaches, or the like), as they become more able to annoy them than they were. And this is generally the work of standing counsels to foresee and to hinder it. During that triumvirate of kings, King Henry the Eighth of England, Francis the First King of France, and Charles the Fifth Emperor, there was such a watch kept, that none of the three could win a palm of ground, but the other two would straightways balance it, either by confederation, or, if need were, by a war; and would not in any wise take up peace at interest.[1] And the like was done by that league (which Guicciardine saith was the security of Italy) made between Ferdinando King of Naples, Lorenzius Medices, and Ludovicus Sforza, potentates, the one of Florence, the other of Milan.[2] Neither is the opinion of some of the schoolmen to be received, that a war cannot justly be made but upon a precedent injury or provocation.[3] For there is no question but a just fear of an imminent danger, though there be no blow given, is a lawful cause of a war.

For their wives: there are cruel examples of them. Livia is infamed for the poisoning of her husband;[4] Roxalana, Solyman's wife, was the destruction of that renowned prince Sultan Mustapha, and otherwise troubled his house and succession;[5] Edward the Second of England his queen had the principal hand in the deposing and murder of her husband.[6] This kind of danger is then to be feared chiefly, when the wives have plots for the raising of their own children; or else that they be advoutresses.[7]

For their children: the tragedies likewise of dangers from them have been many. And generally, the entering of fathers into suspicion of their children hath been ever unfortunate. The destruction of Mustapha (that we named before) was so fatal to Solyman's line, as the succession of the Turks from Solyman until this day is suspected to be untrue, and of strange blood; for that Selymus the Second was thought to be suppositious.[8] The destruction of Crispus, a young prince of rare towardness, by Constantinus the Great, his father, was in like manner fatal to his house; for both Constantinus and Constance, his sons, died violent deaths; and Constantius, his other son, did little better; who died indeed of sickness, but after that Julianus had taken arms against him. The destruction of Demetrius, son to Philip the Second of Macedon, turned upon the father, who died of repentance. And many like examples there are; but few or none where the fathers had good by such distrust; except it were where the sons were up in open arms against them; as was Selymus the First against Bajazet;[1] and the three sons of Henry the Second, King of England.[2]

[1] Henry (ruled 1509–1547), Francis (ruled 1515–1547), and Charles (ruled 1519–1558) maintained a balance of power for much of the first half of the sixteenth century; would not...take up peace at interest would not buy peace if it could cost them in the future.

[2] The league was made in 1480; discussed by Italian historian Francesco Guicciardini (1483–1540) in his Storia d'Italia, I.i.

[3] Bacon elsewhere cites Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, II.ii.40.i in a similar context, though the idea was commonplace.

[4] her husband the Roman Emperor Augustus (63 B.C.E.–14 C.E.).

[5] his house the ruling house in mid sixteenth-century Turkey. Bacon is drawing on Richard Knolles' The Generall Historie of the Turkes (1603), a book that had a great deal of influence on the British literary imagination in the seventeenth and later centuries.

[6] his queen Isabel of France (1292–1358).

[7] advoutresses adulteresses (OED avouter).

[8] suppositious illegitimate (OED suppositious 1b).

For their prelates: when they are proud and great, there is also danger from them; as it was in the time of Anselmus and Thomas Becket, Archbishops of Canterbury; who with their crosiers did almost try it with the king's sword;[3] and yet they had to deal with stout and haughty kings: William Rufus, Henry the First, and Henry the Second. The danger is not from that state, but where it hath a dependence of foreign authority; or where the churchmen come in and are elected, not by the collation of the king, or particular patrons, but by the people.[4]

For their nobles: to keep them at a distance, it is not amiss; but to depress them, may make a king more absolute, but less safe; and less able to perform any thing that he desires. I have noted it in my History of King Henry the Seventh of England, who depressed his nobility; whereupon it came to pass that his times were full of difficulties and troubles; for the nobility, though they continued loyal unto him, yet did they not co-operate with him in his business. So that in effect he was fain to do all things himself.

For their second nobles: there is not much danger from them, being a body dispersed. They may sometimes discourse high, but that doth little hurt; besides, they are a counterpoise to the higher nobility, that they grow not too potent; and, lastly, being the most immediate in authority with the common people, they do best temper popular commotions.

For their merchants: they are vena porta;[5] and if they flourish not, a kingdom may have good limbs, but will have empty veins, and nourish little. Taxes and imposts upon them do seldom good to the king's revenue;[6] for that that he wins in the hundred he leaseth in the shire;[7] the particular rates being increased, but the total bulk of trading rather decreased.

For their commons: there is little danger from them, except it be where they have great and potent heads; or where you meddle with the point of religion, or their customs, or means of life.

For their men of war: it is a dangerous state where they live and remain in a body, and are used to donatives;[8] whereof we see examples in the janizaries,[9] and praetorian bands of Rome; but trainings of men, and arming them in several places, and under several commanders, and without donatives, are things of defence, and no danger.

Princes are like to heavenly bodies, which cause good or evil times; and which have much veneration, but no rest. All precepts concerning kings are in effect comprehended in those two remembrances: memento quod es homo; and momento quod es Deus, or vice Dei;[10] the one bridleth their power, and the other their will.

OF THE TRUE GREATNESS OF KINGDOMS AND ESTATES

The speech of Themistocles the Athenian, which was haughty and arrogant in taking so much to himself, had been a grave and wise observation and censure, applied at large to others. Desired at a feast to touch a lute, he said, "He could not fiddle, but yet he could make a small town a great city." These words (holpen a little with a metaphor) may express two differing abilities in those that deal in business of estate.[1] For if a true survey be taken of counsellors and statesmen, there may be found (though rarely) those which can make a small state great, and yet cannot fiddle:[2] as on the other side, there will be found a great many that can fiddle very cunningly, but yet are so far from being able to make a small state great, as their gift lieth the other way; to bring a great and flourishing estate to ruin and decay. And, certainly those degenerate arts and shifts, whereby many counsellors and governors gain both favour with their masters and estimation with the vulgar, deserve no better name than fiddling; being things rather pleasing for the time, and graceful to themselves only, than tending to the weal and advancement of the state which they serve. There are also (no doubt) counsellors and governors which may be held sufficient (negotiis pares [equal to the business]), able to manage affairs, and to keep them from precipices and manifest inconveniences; which nevertheless are far from the ability to raise and amplify an estate in power, means, and fortune. But be the workmen what they may be, let us speak of the work; that is, the true greatness of Kingdoms and Estates, and the means thereof. An argument fit for great and mighty princes to have in their hand; to the end that neither by over-measuring their forces, they lease themselves in vain enterprises; nor on the other side, by undervaluing them, they descend to fearful and pusillanimous counsels.

The greatness of an estate in bulk and territory, doth fall under measure; and the greatness of finances and revenue doth fall under computation. The population may appear by musters; and the number and greatness of cities and towns by cards and maps. But yet there is not anything amongst civil affairs more subject to error, than the right valuation and true judgment concerning the power and forces of an estate. The kingdom of heaven is compared, not to any great kernel or nut, but to a grain of mustard-seed; which is one of the least grains, but hath in it a property and spirit hastily to get up and spread. So are there states great in territory, and yet not apt to enlarge or command; and some that have but a small dimension of stem, and yet apt to be the foundations of great monarchies.[3]

Walled towns, stored arsenals and armories, goodly races of horse, chariots of war, elephants, ordnance, artillery, and the like; all this is but a sheep in a lion's skin, except the breed and disposition of the people be stout and warlike. Nay, number (itself) in armies importeth not much, where the people is of weak courage; for (as Virgil saith) "It never troubles a wolf how many the sheep be." The army of the Persians in the plains of Arbela was such a vast sea of people, as it did somewhat astonish the commanders in Alexander's army; who came to him therefore, and wished him to set upon them by night; but he answered, "He would not pilfer the victory." And the defeat was easy. When Tigranes the Armenian, being encamped upon a hill with four hundred thousand men, discovered the army of the Romans, being not above fourteen thousand, marching towards him, he made himself merry with it, and said, "Yonder men are too many for an ambassage, and too few for a fight." But, before the sun set, he found them enough to give him the chase with infinite slaughter. Many are the examples of the great odds between number and courage: so that a man may truly make a judgment, that the principal point of greatness in any state is to have a race of military men. Neither is money the sinews of war (as it is trivially said), where the sinews of men's arms, in base and effeminate people, are failing. For Solon said well to Croesus (when in ostentation he showed him his gold), "Sir, if any other come that hath better iron than you, he will be master of all this gold." Therefore let any prince or state think soberly of his forces, except his militia of natives be of good and valiant soldiers. And let princes, on the other side, that have subjects of martial disposition, know their own strength; unless they be otherwise wanting unto themselves. As for mercenary forces (which is the help in this case), all examples show that whatsoever estate or prince doth rest upon them, he may spread his feathers for a time, but he will mew them soon after.[1]

[3] a small dimension of stem one of many analogies Bacon draws between states and plants in this essay.

The blessing of Judah and Issachar will never meet; that "the same people or nation should be both the lion's whelp and the ass between burthens" [Genesis 49:9, 14]; neither will it be, that a people overlaid with taxes should ever become valiant and martial. It is true that taxes levied by consent of the estate do abate men's courage less: as it hath been seen notably in the excises of the Low Countries; and, in some degree, in the subsidies of England. For you must note that we speak now of the heart and not of the purse. So that although the same tribute and tax, laid by consent or by imposing, be all one to the purse, yet it works diversely upon the courage. So that you may conclude, that no people over-charged with tribute is fit for empire.

Let states that aim at greatness, take heed how their nobility and gentlemen do multiply too fast. For that maketh the common subject grow to be a peasant and base swain, driven out of heart, and in effect but the gentleman's labourer. Even as you may see in coppice woods; if you leave your staddles too thick, you shall never have clean underwood, but shrubs and bushes.[2] So in countries, if the gentlemen be too many, the commons will be base; and you will bring it to that, that not the hundred poll will be fit for an helmet;[3] especially as to the infantry, which is the nerve of an army; and so there will be great population and little strength. This which I speak of hath been no where better seen than by comparing of England and France; whereof England, though far less in territory and population, hath been (nevertheless) an over-match; in regard the middle people of England make good soldiers, which the peasants of France do not. And herein the device of king Henry the Seventh (whereof I have spoken largely in the history of his life) was profound and admirable; in making farms and houses of husbandry of a standard; that is, maintained with such a proportion of land unto them, as may breed a subject to live in convenient plenty and no servile condition; and to keep the plough in the hands of the owners, and not mere hirelings. And thus indeed you shall attain to Virgil's character which he gives to ancient Italy:

> Terra potens armis atque ubere glebae.[4]

Neither is that state (which, for anything I know, is almost peculiar to England, and hardly to be found anywhere else, except it be perhaps in Poland) to be passed over; I mean the state of free servants and attendants upon noblemen and gentlemen; which are no ways inferior unto the yeomanry for arms. And therefore out of all question, the splendour and magnificence and great retinues and hospitality of noblemen and gentlemen, received into custom, doth much conduce unto martial greatness. Whereas, contrariwise, the close and reserved living of noblemen and gentlemen causeth a penury of military forces.

By all means it is to be procured, that the trunk of Nebuchadnezzar's tree of monarchy be great enough to bear the branches and the boughs [Daniel 4:10-26]; that is, that the natural subjects of the crown or state bear a sufficient proportion to the stranger subjects that they govern.[1] Therefore all states that are liberal of naturalisation towards strangers are fit for empire. For to think that an handful of people can, with the greatest courage and policy in the world, embrace too large extent of dominion, it may hold for a time, but it will fail suddenly. The Spartans were a nice people in point of naturalisation;[2] whereby, while they kept their compass, they stood firm; but when they did spread, and their boughs were becoming too great for their stem, they became a windfall upon the sudden. Never any state was in this point so open to receive strangers into their body as were the Romans. Therefore it sorted with them accordingly; for they grew to the greatest monarchy. Their manner was to grant naturalisation (which they called jus civitatis), and to grant it in the highest degree; that is, not only jus commercii, jus connubii, jus haereditatis; but also jus suffragii, and jus honorum.[3] And this not to singular persons alone, but likewise to whole families; yea to cities, and sometimes to nations. Add to this their custom of plantation of colonies; whereby the Roman plant was removed into the soil of other nations. And putting both constitutions together, you will say that it was not the Romans that spread upon the world, but it was the world that spread upon the Romans; and that was the sure way of greatness. I have marvelled sometimes at Spain, how they clasp and contain so large dominions with so few natural Spaniards; but sure the whole compass of Spain is a very great body of a tree; far above Rome and Sparta at the first. And besides, though they have not had that usage to naturalise liberally, yet they have that which is next to it; that is, to employ almost indifferently all nations in their militia of ordinary soldiers; yea and sometimes in their highest commands. Nay it seemeth at this instant they are sensible of this want of natives; as by the Pragmatical Sanction, now published, appeareth.[4]

It is certain, that sedentary and within-door arts, and delicate manufactures (that require rather the finger than the arm), have in their nature a contrariety to a military disposition. And generally, all warlike people are a little idle, and love danger better than travail.[5] Neither must they be too much broken of it, if they shall be preserved in vigour. Therefore it was great advantage in the ancient states of Sparta, Athens, Rome, and others, that they had the use of slaves, which commonly did rid those manufactures. But that is abolished, in greatest part, by the Christian law. That which cometh nearest to it, is to leave those arts chiefly to strangers (which for that purpose are the more easily to be received), and to contain the principal bulk of the vulgar natives within those three kinds,—tillers of the ground; free servants; and handicraftsmen of strong and manly arts, as smiths, masons, carpenters, &c: not reckoning professed soldiers.

But above all, for empire and greatness, it importeth most that a nation do profess arms as their principal honour, study, and occupation. For the things which we formerly have spoken of are but habilitations towards arms;[1] and what is habilitation without intention and act? Romulus, after his death (as they report or feign), sent a present to the Romans, that above all they should intend arms; and then they should prove the greatest empire of the world. The fabric of the state of Sparta was wholly (though not wisely) framed and composed to that scope and end. The Persians and Macedonians had it for a flash. The Gauls, Germans, Goths, Saxons, Normans, and others, had it for a time. The Turks have it at this day, though in great declination. Of Christian Europe, they that have it are, in effect, only the Spaniards. But it is so plain that every man profiteth in that he most intendeth, that it needeth not to be stood upon. It is enough to point at it; that no nation which doth not directly profess arms, may look to have greatness fall into their mouths. And on the other side, it is a most certain oracle of time, that those states that continue long in that profession (as the Romans and Turks principally have done) do wonders. And those that have professed arms but for an age, have notwithstanding commonly attained that greatness in that age which maintained them long after, when their profession and exercise of arms hath grown to decay.

Incident to this point is, for a state to have those laws or customs which may reach forth unto them just occasions (as may be pretended) of war. For there is that justice imprinted in the nature of men, that they enter not upon wars (whereof so many calamities do ensue) but upon some, at the least specious,[2] grounds and quarrels. The Turk hath at hand, for cause of war, the propagation of his law or sect;[3] a quarrel that he may always command. The Romans, though they esteemed the extending the limits of their empire to be great honour to their generals when it was done, yet they never rested upon that alone to begin a war. First therefore, let nations that pretend to greatness have this; that they be sensible of wrongs, either upon borderers, merchants, or politique ministers; and that they sit not too long upon a provocation. Secondly, let them be prest and ready to give aids and succours to their confederates;[4] as it ever was with the Romans; insomuch as, if the confederates had leagues defensive with divers other states, and, upon invasion offered, did implore their aids severally, yet the Romans would ever be the foremost, and leave it to none other to have the honour. As for the wars which were anciently made on the behalf of a kind of party, or tacit conformity of estate, I do not see how they may be well justified: as when the Romans made a war for the liberty of Graecia; or when the Lacedaemonians and Athenians made wars to set up or pull down democracies and oligarchies; or when wars were made by foreigners, under the pretence of justice or protection, to deliver the subjects of others from tyranny and oppression; and the like. Let it suffice, that no estate expect to be great, that is not awake upon any just occasion of arming.

No body can be healthful without exercise, neither natural body nor politic; and certainly to a kingdom or estate, a just and honourable war is the true exercise. A civil war indeed is like the heat of a fever; but a foreign war is like the heat of exercise, and serveth to keep the body in health; for in a slothful peace, both courages will effeminate and manners corrupt. But howsoever it be for happiness, without all question, for greatness it maketh, to be still for the most part in arms; and the strength of a veteran army (though it be a chargeable business) always on foot, is that which commonly giveth the law, or at least the reputation, amongst all neighbour states; as may well be seen in Spain, which hath had, in one part or other, a veteran army almost continually, now by the space of six score years.

To be master of the sea is an abridgment of a monarchy.[1] Cicero, writing to Atticus of Pompey his preparation against Caesar, saith, Consilium Pompeii plane Themistocleum est; putat enim, qui mari potitur, eum rerum potiri.[2] And, without doubt, Pompey had tired out Caesar, if upon vain confidence he had not left that way. We see the great effects of battles by sea. The battle of Actium decided the empire of the world.[3] The battle of Lepanto arrested the greatness of the Turk.[4] There be many examples where sea-fights have been final to the war; but this is when princes or states have set up their rest upon the battles. But thus much is certain, that he that commands the sea is at great liberty, and may take as much and as little of the war as he will. Whereas those that be strongest by land are many times nevertheless in great straits. Surely, at this day, with us of Europe, the vantage of strength at sea (which is one of the principal dowries of the kingdom of Great Britain) is great; both because most of the kingdoms of Europe are not merely inland, but girt with the sea most part of their compass; and because the wealth of both Indies seems in great part but an accessary to the command of the seas.

The wars of latter ages seem to be made in the dark, in respect of the glory and honour which reflected upon men from the wars in ancient time. There be now, for martial encouragement, some degrees and orders of chivalry; which nevertheless are conferred promiscuously upon soldiers and no soldiers; and some remembrance perhaps upon the scutcheon;[5] and some hospitals for maimed soldiers; and such like things. But in ancient times, the trophies erected upon the place of the victory; the funeral laudatives and monuments for those that died in the wars; the crown and garlands personal; the style of Emperor, which the great kings of the world after borrowed; the triumphs of the generals upon their return; the great donatives and largesses upon the disbanding of the armies; were things able to inflame all men's courages. But above all, that of the Triumph, amongst the Romans, was not pageants or gaudery, but one of the wisest and noblest institutions that ever was. For it contained three things; honour to the general; riches to the treasury out of the spoils; and donatives to the army. But that honour perhaps were not fit for monarchies; except it be in the person of the monarch himself, or his sons, as it came to pass in the times of the Roman emperors, who did impropriate the actual triumphs to themselves and their sons, for such wars as they did achieve in person; and left only, for wars achieved by subjects, some triumphal garments and ensigns to the general.

To conclude: no man can "by care taking" (as the Scripture saith) "add a cubit to his stature" [Matthew 6:27, Luke 12:25], in this little model of a man's body; but in the great frame of kingdoms and commonwealths, it is in the power of princes or estates to add amplitude and greatness to their kingdoms; for by introducing such ordinances, constitutions, and customs, as we have now touched, they may sow greatness to their posterity and succession. But these things are commonly not observed, but left to take their chance.

OF PLANTATIONS [1]

Plantations are amongst ancient, primitive, and heroical works. When the world was young it begat more children; but now it is old it begets fewer: for I may justly account new plantations to be the children of former kingdoms. I like a plantation in a pure soil; that is, where people are not displanted to the end to plant in others. For else it is rather an extirpation than a plantation. Planting of countries is like planting of woods; for you must make account to lease almost twenty years' profit, and expect your recompense in the end. For the principal thing that hath been the destruction of most plantations, hath been the base and hasty drawing of profit in the first years. It is true, speedy profit is not to be neglected, as far as may stand with the good of the plantation, but no further.

It is a shameful and unblessed thing to take the scum of people, and wicked condemned men, to be the people with whom you plant; and not only so, but it spoileth the plantation; for they will ever live like rogues, and not fall to work, but be lazy, and do mischief, and spend victuals, and be quickly weary, and then certify over to their country to the discredit of the plantation.[2] The people wherewith you plant ought to be gardeners, ploughmen, labourers, smiths, carpenters, joiners, fishermen, fowlers, with some few apothecaries, surgeons, cooks, and bakers.

In a country of plantation, first look about what kind of victual the country yields of itself to hand; as chestnuts, walnuts, pine-apples,[3] olives, dates, plums, cherries, wild honey, and the like; and make use of them. Then consider what victual or esculent things there are,[4] which grow speedily, and within the year; as parsnips, carrots, turnips, onions, radish, artichokes of Jerusalem, maize, and the like. For wheat, barley, and oats, they ask too much labour; but with peas and beans you may begin, both because they ask less labour, and because they serve for meat as well as for bread. And of rice likewise cometh a great increase, and it is a kind of meat. Above all, there ought to be brought store of biscuit, oatmeal, flour, meal, and the like, in the beginning, till bread may be had. For beasts, or birds, take chiefly such as are least subject to diseases, and multiply fastest; as swine, goats, cocks, hens, turkeys, geese, housedoves, and the like. The victual in plantations ought to be expended almost as in a besieged town; that is, with certain allowance. And let the main part of the ground employed to gardens or corn, be to a common stock; and to be laid in, and stored up, and then delivered out in proportion; besides some spots of ground that any particular person will manure for his own private [use].

Consider likewise what commodities the soil where the plantation is doth naturally yield, that they may some way help to defray the charge of the plantation (so it be not, as was said, to the untimely prejudice of the main business), as it hath fared with tobacco in Virginia. Wood commonly aboundeth but too much; and therefore timber is fit to be one. If there be iron ore, and streams whereupon to set the mills, iron is a brave commodity where wood aboundeth. Making of bay-salt,[5] if the climate be proper for it, would be put in experience. Growing silk likewise, if any be, is a likely commodity. Pitch and tar, where store of firs and pines are, will not fail. So drugs and sweet woods, where they are, cannot but yield great profit. Soap-ashes likewise, and other things that may be thought of. But moil not too much under ground; for the hope of mines is very uncertain, and useth to make the planters lazy in other things.

[1] Plantations colonies.

[2] certify over send reports.

[3] pine-apples pine-cones, here particularly the edible kernel or pine-nut.

[5] bay-salt coarse salt extracted from salt-water ponds.

For government, let it be in the hands of one, assisted with some counsel; and let them have commission to exercise martial laws, with some limitation. And above all, let men make that profit of being in the wilderness, as they have God always, and his service, before their eyes. Let not the government of the plantation depend upon too many counsellors and undertakers in the country that planteth,[1] but upon a temperate number; and let those be rather noblemen and gentlemen, than merchants; for they look ever to the present gain. Let there be freedoms from custom till the plantation be of strength;[2] and not only freedom from custom, but freedom to carry their commodities where they may make their best of them, except there be some special cause of caution.

Cram not in people, by sending too fast company after company; but rather hearken how they waste and send supplies proportionably; but so as the number may live well in the plantation, and not by surcharge be in penury.

It hath been a great endangering to the health of some plantations, that they have built along the sea and rivers, in marish and unwholesome grounds.[3] Therefore, though you begin there, to avoid carriage and other like discommodities, yet build still rather upwards from the streams, than along. It concerneth likewise the health of the plantation that they have good store of salt with them, that they may use it in their victuals when it shall be necessary.

If you plant where savages are, do not only entertain them with trifles and gingles; but use them justly and graciously, with sufficient guard nevertheless; and do not win their favour by helping them to invade their enemies, but for their defence it is not amiss; and send oft of them over to the country that plants, that they may see a better condition than their own, and commend it when they return. When the plantation grows to strength, then it is time to plant with women as well as with men; that the plantation may spread into generations, and not be ever pieced from without. It is the sinfullest thing in the world to forsake or destitute a plantation once in forwardness; for besides the dishonour, it is the guiltiness of blood of many commiserable persons.

OF MASQUES AND TRIUMPHS

These things are but toys, to come amongst such serious observations.[4] But yet, since princes will have such things, it is better they should be graced with elegancy than daubed with cost.

Dancing to song is a thing of great state and pleasure. I understand it, that the song be in choir, placed aloft, and accompanied with some broken music,[5] and the ditty fitted to the device. Acting in song, especially in dialogues, hath an extreme good grace; I say acting, not dancing (for that is a mean and vulgar thing);[6] and the voices of the dialogue would be strong and manly (a bass and a tenor, no treble); and the ditty high and tragical, not nice or dainty. Several choirs, placed one over against another and taking the voice by catches, anthem-wise, give great pleasure. Turning dances into figure is a childish curiosity. And generally let it be noted, that those things which I here set down are such as do naturally take the sense, and not respect petty wonderments. It is true, the alterations of scenes, so it be quietly and without noise, are things of great beauty and pleasure; for they feed and relieve the eye, before it be full of the same object.[1]

[1] undertakers shareholders.

[2] custom custom duties.

[3] marish marshy.

[4] While Bacon appears to dismiss these court entertainments (which combined theatrical spectacle, music, song, and dance), the essay reveals his first-hand knowledge of the genre: Bacon wrote several masque-like "devices" in the 1590s, and organized two magnificently expensive entertainments in 1613–14 (see the letters of John Chamberlain for a description of one).

[5] broken music a small consort containing both wind and string instruments.

[6] acting, not dancing singing recitative, as in opera, as opposed to dancing in song, as in a jig; the "dancing to song" with which Bacon begins the paragraph refers to the graceful dancing to music of the main masque.

Let the scenes abound with light, specially coloured and varied; and let the masquers, or any other, that are to come down from the scene,[2] have some motions upon the scene itself before their coming down; for it draws the eye strangely, and makes it with great pleasure to desire to see that [which] it cannot perfectly discern. Let the songs be loud and cheerful, and not chirpings or pulings. Let the music likewise be sharp and loud, and well placed. The colours that show best by candlelight are white, carnation, and a kind of sea-water-green; and oes, or spangs, as they are of no great cost, so they are of most glory.[3] As for rich embroidery, it is lost and not discerned. Let the suits of the masquers be graceful, and such as become the person when the vizards are off;[4] not after examples of known attires, Turks, soldiers, mariners, and the like.

Let anti-masques not be long;[5] they have been commonly of fools, satyrs, baboons, wild-men, antics, beasts, sprites, witches, Ethiops, pygmies, turquets,[6] nymphs, rustics, cupids, statues moving, and the like. As for angels, it is not comical enough to put them in anti-masques; and any thing that is hideous, as devils, giants, is on the other side as unfit. But chiefly, let the music of them be recreative, and with some strange changes. Some sweet odours suddenly coming forth, without any drops falling, are, in such a company as there is steam and heat, things of great pleasure and refreshment. Double masques, one of men, another of ladies, addeth state and variety. But all is nothing except the room be kept clear and neat.

For jousts, and tourneys, and barriers:[7] the glories of them are chiefly in the chariots, wherein the challengers make their entry; especially if they be drawn with strange beasts, as lions, bears, camels, and the like; or in the devices of their entrance;[8] or in the bravery of their liveries; or in the goodly furniture of their horses and armour. But enough of these toys.

(1597 version, not modernized)

Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments and for abilities. Their chiefe use for pastime is in privateness and retiring; for ornamente is in discourse, and for abilitie is in judgement. For expert men can execute, but learned men are fittest to judge or censure.

¶ To spend too much time in them is slouth, to use them too much for ornament is affectation: to make judgement wholly by their rules, is the humour of a Scholler. ¶ They perfect Nature, and are perfected by experience. ¶ Craftie men contemn them, simple men admire them, wise men use them:

[1] alterations of scenes scene or set changes, possible only in private halls fitted with custom-built stage machinery; the public theatre did not use sets.

[2] come down from the scene descend from the stage to the hall, for a dance that could include leading members of the audience.

[3] oes, or spangs sequins ("oes" is the plural of the letter "o").

[4] vizards masks.

[5] anti-masques comic or grotesque episodes that contrasted with the main masque; they often represented the forces of disorder over which the qualities celebrated in the main masque triumph.

[6] turquets little Turks.

[8] devices Each knight created a persona and an elaborate fiction to explain his presence at a tournament; "device" refers collectively to the various means through which this narrative was conveyed (costume, emblematic shield, cryptic mottoes, songs).

For they teach not their owne use, but that is a wisedome without them: and above them wonne by observation. ¶ Reade not to contradict, nor to believe, but to waigh and consider. ¶ Some bookes are to bee tasted, others to bee swallowed, and some few to bee chewed and disgested: That is, some bookes are to be read only in partes; others to be read, but cursorily, and some few to be read wholly and with diligence and attention. ¶ Reading maketh a full man, conference a readye man, and writing an exacte man. And therefore if a man write little, he had neede have a great memorie, if he conferre little, he had neede have a present wit, and if he reade little, hee had neede have much cunning, to seeme to know that he doth not. ¶ Histories make men wise, Poets wittie: the Mathematickes subtle, naturall Phylosophie deepe: Morall grave, Logicke and Rhetoricke able to contend.

(1625 version, modernized)

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. Their chief use for delight, is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business. For expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one; but the general counsels, and the plots and marshalling of affairs, come best from those that are learned. To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to use them too much for ornament, is affectation; to make judgment wholly by their rules, is the humour of a scholar. They perfect nature, and are perfected by experience: for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study; and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crafty men contemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute; nor to believe and take for granted; nor to find talk and discourse; but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read but not curiously;[1] and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention. Some books also may be read by deputy, and extracts made of them by others; but that would be only in the less important arguments, and the meaner sort of books; else distilled books are like common distilled waters, flashy things.[2] Reading maketh a full man; conference a ready man; and writing an exact man. And therefore, if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer little, he had need have a present wit: and if he read little, he had need have much cunning, to seem to know that he doth not. Histories make men wise; poets witty; the mathematics subtle; natural philosophy deep; moral grave; logic and rhetoric able to contend. Abeunt studia in mores.[3] Nay there is no stond or impediment in the wit,[4] but may be wrought out by fit studies; like as diseases of the body may have appropriate exercises. Bowling is good for the stone and reins;[5] shooting for the lungs and breast; gentle walking for the stomach; riding for the head; and the like. So if a man's wit be wandering, let him study the mathematics; for in demonstrations, if his wit be called away never so little, he must begin again. If his wit be not apt to distinguish or find differences, let him study the schoolmen; for they are cymini sectores

[2] distilled waters juices made from distilled plants and vegetables for medicinal purposes; flashy insipid, tasteless (OED flashy a 2b; this place cited).

[3] Ovid, Heroides, xv.83: "Studies shape our behaviour."

[4] stond obstacle (OED stond 2; this place cited).

[5] stone and reins kidney or gall-bladder stones, and kidney disorders.

[splitters of hairs]. If he be not apt to beat over matters, and to call up one thing to prove and illustrate another, let him study the lawyers' cases. So every defect of the mind may have a special receipt.[1]

Aphorisms Concerning the Interpretation of Nature and the Kingdom of Man

(excerpts)

(from Novum Organum)

I

Man, being the servant and interpreter of Nature, can do and understand so much and so much only as he has observed in fact or in thought of the course of nature: beyond this he neither knows anything nor can do anything.

II

Neither the naked hand nor the understanding left to itself can effect much. It is by instruments and helps that the work is done, which are as much wanted for the understanding as for the hand. And as the instruments of the hand either give motion or guide it, so the instruments of the mind supply either suggestions for the understanding or cautions.

III

Human knowledge and human power meet in one; for where the cause is not known the effect cannot be produced. Nature to be commanded must be obeyed; and that which in contemplation is as the cause is in operation as the rule.

IV

Towards the effecting of works, all that man can do is to put together or put asunder natural bodies. The rest is done by nature working within.

V

The study of nature with a view to works is engaged in by the mechanic, the mathematician, the physician, the alchemist, and the magician; but by all (as things now are) with slight endeavour and scanty success.

VI

It would be an unsound fancy and self-contradictory to expect that things which have never yet been done can be done except by means which have never yet been tried.

VII

The productions of the mind and hand seem very numerous in books and manufactures. But all this variety lies in an exquisite subtlety and derivations from a few things already known; not in the number of axioms.

VIII

Moreover the works already known are due to chance and experiment rather than to sciences; for the sciences we now possess are merely systems for the nice ordering and setting forth of things already invented; not methods of invention or directions for new works.

IX

The cause and root of nearly all evils in the sciences is this—that while we falsely admire and extol the powers of the human mind we neglect to seek for its true helps.

X

The subtlety of nature is greater many times over than the subtlety of the senses and understanding; so that all those specious meditations, speculations, and glosses in which men indulge are quite from the purpose, only there is no one by to observe it.

[1] receipt recipe.

XI

As the sciences which we now have do not help us in finding out new works, so neither does the logic which we now have help us in finding out new sciences.

XII

The logic now in use serves rather to fix and give stability to the errors which have their foundation in commonly received notions than to help the search after truth. So it does more harm than good.

XIII

The syllogism is not applied to the first principles of sciences, and is applied in vain to intermediate axioms; being no match for the subtlety of nature. It commands assent therefore to the proposition, but does not take hold of the thing.

XIV

The syllogism consists of propositions, propositions consist of words, words are symbols of notions. Therefore if the notions themselves (which is the root of the matter) are confused and over-hastily abstracted from the facts, there can be no firmness in the superstructure. Our only hope therefore lies in a true induction.[1]

XV

There is no soundness in our notions whether logical or physical. Substance, quality, action, passion, essence itself, are not sound notions: much less are heavy, light, dense, rare, moist, dry, generation, corruption, attraction, repulsion, element, matter, form, and the like; but all are fantastical and ill defined.

XVIII

The discoveries which have hitherto been made in the sciences are such as lie close to vulgar notions, scarcely beneath the surface. In order to penetrate into the inner and further recesses of nature, it is necessary that both notions and axioms be derived from things by a more sure and guarded way; and that a method of intellectual operation be introduced altogether better and more certain.

XIX

There are and can be only two ways of searching into and discovering truth. The one flies from the senses and particulars to the most general axioms, and from these principles, the truth of which it takes for settled and immoveable, proceeds to judgment and to the discovery of middle axioms. And this way is now in fashion. The other derives axioms from the senses and particulars, rising by a gradual and unbroken ascent, so that it arrives at the most general axioms last of all. This is the true way, but as yet untried.

XX

The understanding left to itself takes the same course (namely, the former) which it takes in accordance with logical order. For the mind longs to spring up to positions of higher generality, that it may find rest there; and so after a little while wearies of experiment. But this evil is increased by logic, because of the order and solemnity of its disputations.

XXII

Both ways set out from the sense and particulars, and rest in the highest generalities; but the difference between them is infinite. For the one just glances at experiment and particulars in passing, the other dwells duly and orderly among them. The one, again, begins at once by establishing certain abstract and useless generalities, the other rises by gradual steps to that which is prior and better known in the order of nature.

[1] induction the building up of arguments based on the collection and observation of particulars. Bacon was arguing against deduction, which begins with general principles and proceeds to particulars; in modern usage "deduction" tends to be used for both processes. See aphorisms XIX forward.

XXIII

There is a great difference between the idols of the human mind and the ideas of the divine. That is to say, between certain empty dogmas, and the true signatures and marks set upon the works of creation as they are found in nature.

XXVI

The conclusions of human reason as ordinarily applied in matter of nature, I call for the sake of distinction Anticipations of Nature (as a thing rash or premature). That reason which is elicited from facts by a just and methodical process, I call Interpretation of Nature.

XXXI

It is idle to expect any great advancement in science from the superinducing and engrafting of new things upon old. We must begin anew from the very foundations, unless we would revolve for ever in a circle with mean and contemptible progress.

XXXII

The honour of the ancient authors, and indeed of all, remains untouched; since the comparison I challenge is not of wits or faculties, but of ways and methods, and the part I take upon myself is not that of a judge, but of a guide.

XXXIII

This must be plainly avowed: no judgment can be rightly formed either of my method or of the discoveries to which it leads, by means of anticipations (that is to say, of the reasoning which is now in use); since I cannot be called on to abide by the sentence of a tribunal which is itself on its trial.

XXXVI

One method of delivery alone remains to us; which is simply this: we must lead men to the particulars themselves, and their series and order; while men on their side must force themselves for awhile to lay their notions by and begin to familiarise themselves with facts.

XXXVII

The doctrine of those who have denied that certainty could be attained at all, has some agreement with my way of proceeding at the first setting out; but they end in being infinitely separated and opposed. For the holders of that doctrine assert simply that nothing can be known; I also assert that not much can be known in nature by the way which is now in use. But then they go on to destroy the authority of the senses and understanding; whereas I proceed to devise and supply helps for the same.

THE IDOLS

XXXVIII

The idols and false notions that are now in possession of the human understanding, and have taken deep root therein, not only so beset men's minds that truth can hardly find entrance, but even after entrance obtained, they will again in the very instauration of the sciences meet and trouble us,[1] unless men being forewarned of the danger fortify themselves as far as may be against their assaults.

XXXIX

There are four classes of idols which beset men's minds. To these for distinction's sake I have assigned names,—calling the first class Idols of the Tribe; the second, Idols of the Cave; the third, Idols of the Market-place; the fourth, Idols of the Theatre.

[1] instauration restoration, renewal, renovation (OED).

XL

The formation of ideas and axioms by true induction is no doubt the proper remedy to be applied for the keeping off and clearing away of idols. To point them out, however, is of great use; for the doctrine of idols is to the interpretation of nature what the doctrine of the refutation of sophisms is to common logic.

XLI

The Idols of the Tribe have their foundation in human nature itself, and in the tribe or race of men. For it is a false assertion that the sense of man is the measure of things. On the contrary, all perceptions as well of the sense as of the mind are according to the measure of the individual and not according to the measure of the universe. And the human understanding is like a false mirror, which, receiving rays irregularly, distorts and discolours the nature of things by mingling its own nature with it.

XLII

The Idols of the Cave are the idols of the individual man. For every one (besides the errors common to human nature in general) has a cave or den of his own, which refracts and discolours the light of nature; owing either to his own proper and peculiar nature; or to his education and conversation with others; or to the reading of books, and the authority of those whom he esteems and admires; or the differences of impressions, accordingly as they take place in a mind preoccupied and predisposed or in a mind indifferent and settled; or the like. So that the spirit of man (according as it is meted out to different individuals) is in fact a thing variable and full of perturbation, and governed as it were by chance. Whence it was well observed by Heraclitus that men look for sciences in their own lesser worlds, and not in the greater or common world.

XLIII

There are also idols formed by the intercourse and association of men with each other, which I call Idols of the Market-place, on account of the commerce and consort of men there. For it is by discourse that men associate; and words are imposed according to the apprehension of the vulgar. And therefore the ill and unfit choice of words wonderfully obstructs the understanding. Nor do the definitions or explanations wherewith in some things learned men are wont to guard and defend themselves, by any means set the matter right. But words plainly force and overrule the understanding, and throw all into confusion, and lead men away into numberless empty controversies and idle fancies.

XLIV

Lastly, there are idols which have immigrated into men's minds from the various dogmas of philosophies, and also from wrong laws of demonstration. These I call Idols of the Theatre; because in my judgment all the received systems are but so many stage-plays, representing worlds of their own creation after an unreal and scenic fashion. Nor is it only of the systems now in vogue, or only of the ancient sects and philosophies, that I speak; for many more plays of the same kind may yet be composed and in like artificial manner set forth; seeing that errors the most widely different have nevertheless causes for the most part alike. Neither again do I mean this only of entire systems, but also of many principles and axioms in science, which by tradition, credulity, and negligence have come to be received.

But of these several kinds of idols I must speak more largely and exactly, that the understanding may be duly cautioned.

IDOLS OF THE TRIBE

XLV

The human understanding is of its own nature prone to suppose the existence of more order and regularity in the world than it finds. And though there be many things in nature which are singular and unmatched, yet it devises for them parallels and conjugates and relatives which do not exist. Hence the fiction that all celestial bodies move in perfect circles; spirals and dragons being (except in name) utterly rejected. Hence too the element of fire with its orb is brought in, to make up the square with the other three which the sense perceives. Hence also the ratio of density of the so-called elements is arbitrarily fixed at ten to one. And so on of other dreams. And these fancies affect not dogmas only, but simple notions also.

XLVI

The human understanding when it has once adopted an opinion (either as being the received opinion or as being agreeable to itself) draws all things else to support and agree with it. And though there be a greater number and weight of instances to be found on the other side, yet these it either neglects and despises, or else by some distinction sets aside and rejects; in order that by this great and pernicious predetermination the authority of its former conclusions may remain inviolate. And therefore it was a good answer that was made by one who when they showed him hanging in a temple a picture of those who had paid their vows as having escaped shipwreck, and would have him say whether he did not now acknowledge the power of the gods, "Aye," asked he again, "but where are they painted that were drowned after their vows?" And such is the way of all superstition, whether in astrology, dreams, omens, divine judgments, or the like; wherein men, having a delight in such vanities, mark the events where they are fulfilled, but where they fail, though this happen much oftener, neglect and pass them by. But with far more subtlety does this mischief insinuate itself into philosophy and the sciences; in which the first conclusion colours and brings into conformity with itself all that come after, though far sounder and better. Besides, independently of that delight and vanity which I have described, it is the peculiar and perpetual error of the human intellect to be more moved and excited by affirmatives than by negatives; whereas it ought properly to hold itself indifferently disposed towards both alike. Indeed in the establishment of any true axiom, the negative instance is the more forcible of the two.

XLVII

The human understanding is moved by those things most which strike and enter the mind simultaneously and suddenly, and so fill the imagination; and then it feigns and supposes all other things to be somehow, though it cannot see how, similar to those few things by which it is surrounded. But for that going to and fro to remote and heterogeneous instances, by which axioms are tried as in the fire, the intellect is altogether slow and unfit, unless it be forced thereto by severe laws and overruling authority.

XLIX

The human understanding is no dry light, but receives an infusion from the will and affections;[1] whence proceed sciences which may be called "sciences as one would." For what a man had rather were true he more readily believes. Therefore he rejects difficult things from impatience of research; sober things, because they narrow hope; the deeper things of nature, from superstition; the light of experience, from arrogance and pride, lest his mind should seem to be occupied with things mean and transitory; things not commonly believed, out of deference to the opinion of the vulgar. Numberless in short are the ways, and sometimes imperceptible, in which the affections colour and infect the understanding.

[1] dry light reason or intellect untinged by personal predilection or fancy.

L

But by far the greatest hindrance and aberration of the human understanding proceeds from the dullness, incompetency, and deceptions of the senses; in that things which strike the sense outweigh things which do not immediately strike it, though they be more important. Hence it is that speculation commonly ceases where sight ceases; insomuch that of things invisible there is little or no observation. Hence all the working of the spirits inclosed in tangible bodies lies hid and unobserved of men. So also all the more subtle changes of form in the parts of coarser substances (which they commonly call alteration, though it is in truth local motion through exceedingly small spaces) is in like manner unobserved. And yet unless these two things just mentioned be searched out and brought to light, nothing great can be achieved in nature, as far as the production of works is concerned. So again the essential nature of our common air, and of all bodies less dense than air (which are very many), is almost unknown. For the sense by itself is a thing infirm and erring; neither can instruments for enlarging or sharpening the senses do much; but all the truer kind of interpretation of nature is effected by instances and experiments fit and apposite; wherein the sense decides touching the experiment only, and the experiment touching the point in nature and the thing itself.

LI

The human understanding is of its own nature prone to abstractions and gives a substance and reality to things which are fleeting. But to resolve nature into abstractions is less to our purpose than to dissect her into parts; as did the school of Democritus, which went further into nature than the rest.[1] Matter rather than forms should be the object of our attention, its configurations and changes of configuration, and simple action, and law of action or motion; for forms are figments of the human mind, unless you will call those laws of action forms.

LII

Such then are the idols which I call Idols of the Tribe; and which take their rise either from the homogeneity of the substance of the human spirit, or from its preoccupation, or from its narrowness, or from its restless motion, or from an infusion of the affections, or from the incompetency of the senses, or from the mode of impression.

IDOLS OF THE CAVE

LIII

The Idols of the Cave take their rise in the peculiar constitution, mental or bodily, of each individual; and also in education, habit, and accident. Of this kind there is a great number and variety; but I will instance those the pointing out of which contains the most important caution, and which have most effect in disturbing the clearness of the understanding.

LIV

Men become attached to certain particular sciences and speculations, either because they fancy themselves the authors and inventors thereof, or because they have bestowed the greatest pains upon them and become most habituated to them. But men of this kind, if they betake themselves to philosophy and contemplations of a general character, distort and colour them in obedience to their former fancies; a thing especially to be noticed in Aristotle, who made his natural philosophy a mere bond-servant to his logic, thereby rendering it contentious and well nigh useless. The race of chemists again out of a few experiments of the furnace have built up a fantastic philosophy, framed with reference to a few things; and Gilbert also, after he had employed himself most laboriously in the study and observation of the loadstone, proceeded at once to construct an entire system in accordance with his favourite subject.[1]

[1] the school of Democritus They held that matter was composed of atoms.

LV

There is one principal and as it were radical distinction between different minds, in respect of philosophy and the sciences; which is this: that some minds are stronger and apter to mark the differences of things, others to mark their resemblances. The steady and acute mind can fix its contemplations and dwell and fasten on the subtlest distinctions: the lofty and discursive mind recognises and puts together the finest and most general resemblances. Both kinds however easily err in excess, by catching the one at gradations, the other at shadows.

LVII

Contemplations of nature and of bodies in their simple form break up and distract the understanding, while contemplations of nature and bodies in their composition and configuration overpower and dissolve the understanding: a distinction well seen in the school of Leucippus and Democritus as compared with the other philosophies. For that school is so busied with the particles that it hardly attends to the structure; while the others are so lost in admiration of the structure that they do not penetrate to the simplicity of nature. These kinds of contemplation should therefore be alternated and taken by turns; that so the understanding may be rendered at once penetrating and comprehensive, and the inconveniences above mentioned, with the idols which proceed from them, may be avoided.

LVIII

Let such then be our provision and contemplative prudence for keeping off and dislodging the Idols of the Cave, which grow for the most part either out of the predominance of a favourite subject, or out of an excessive tendency to compare or to distinguish, or out of partiality for particular ages, or out of the largeness or minuteness of the objects contemplated. And generally let every student of nature take this as a rule,— that whatever his mind seizes and dwells upon with peculiar satisfaction is to be held in suspicion, and that so much the more care is to be taken in dealing with such questions to keep the understanding even and clear.

IDOLS OF THE MARKET-PLACE

LIX

But the Idols of the Market-place are the most troublesome of all: idols which have crept into the understanding through the alliances of words and names.[2] For men believe that their reason governs words; but it is also true that words react on the understanding; and this it is that has rendered philosophy and the sciences sophistical and inactive. Now words, being commonly framed and applied according to the capacity of the vulgar, follow those lines of division which are most obvious to the vulgar understanding. And whenever an understanding of greater acuteness or a more diligent observation would alter those lines to suit the true divisions of nature, words stand in the way and resist the change. Whence it comes to pass that the high and formal discussions of learned men end oftentimes in disputes about words and names; with which (according to the use and wisdom of the mathematicians) it would be more prudent to begin, and so by means of definitions reduce them to order. Yet even definitions cannot cure this evil in dealing with natural and material things; since the definitions themselves consist of words, and those words beget others: so that it is necessary to recur to individual instances, and those in due series and order; as I shall say presently when I come to the method and scheme for the formation of notions and axioms.

[1] Gilbert William Gilbert (1540–1603), physician to Elizabeth and James I. His book on magnetism, De Magnete (1600), was in fact one of the great scientific achievements of the era.

[2] alliances of words and names For a Restoration elaboration of this idea, see the selection from Thomas Sprat's History of the Royal Society (1667).

LX

The idols imposed by words on the understanding are of two kinds. They are either names of things which do not exist (for as there are things left unnamed through lack of observation, so likewise are there names which result from fantastic suppositions and to which nothing in reality corresponds), or they are names of things which exist, but yet confused and ill-defined, and hastily and irregularly derived from realities. Of the former kind are fortune, the prime mover,[1] planetary orbits,[2] element of fire, and like fictions which owe their origin to false and idle theories. And this class of idols is more easily expelled, because to get rid of them it is only necessary that all theories should be steadily rejected and dismissed as obsolete.

But the other class, which springs out of a faulty and unskilful abstraction, is intricate and deeply rooted. Let us take for example such a word as humid; and see how far the several things which the word is used to signify agree with each other; and we shall find the word humid to be nothing else than a mark loosely and confusedly applied to denote a variety of actions which will not bear to be reduced to any constant meaning. For it both signifies that which easily spreads itself round any other body; and that which in itself is indeterminate and cannot solidise; and that which readily yields in every direction; and that which easily divides and scatters itself; and that which easily unites and collects itself; and that which readily flows and is put in motion; and that which readily clings to another body and wets it; and that which is easily reduced to a liquid, or being solid easily melts. Accordingly when you come to apply the word—if you take it in one sense, flame is humid; if in another, air is not humid; if in another, fine dust is humid; if in another, glass is humid. So that it is easy to see that the notion is taken by abstraction only from water and common and ordinary liquids, without any due verification.

There are however in words certain degrees of distortion and error. One of the least faulty kinds is that of names of substances, especially of lowest species and well-deduced (for the notion of chalk and of mud is good, of earth bad); a more faulty kind is that of actions, as to generate, to corrupt, to alter; the most faulty is of qualities (except such as are the immediate objects of the sense) as heavy, light, rare, dense, and the like. Yet in all these cases some notions are of necessity a little better than others, in proportion to the greater variety of subjects that fall within the range of the human sense.

IDOLS OF THE THEATRE

LXI

But the Idols of the Theatre are not innate, nor do they steal into the understanding secretly, but are plainly impressed and received into the mind from the play-books of philosophical systems and the perverted rules of demonstration. To attempt refutations in this case would be merely inconsistent with what I have already said: for since we agree neither upon principles nor upon demonstrations there is no place for argument. And this is so far well, inasmuch as it leaves the honour of the ancients untouched. For they are no wise disparaged—the question between them and me being only as to the way. For as the saying is, the lame man who keeps the right road outstrips the runner who takes a wrong one. Nay it is obvious that when a man runs the wrong way, the more active and swift he is the further he will go astray.

[1] prime mover the primum mobile, in Ptolemaic astronomy the outermost of the planetary spheres, from which the other spheres all derived their motion.

[2] planetary orbits Bacon may be referring to the Ptolemaic theory of planetary spheres.

But the course I propose for the discovery of sciences is such as leaves but little to the acuteness and strength of wits, but places all wits and understandings nearly on a level. For as in the drawing of a straight line or a perfect circle, much depends on the steadiness and practice of the hand, if it be done by aim of hand only, but if with the aid of rule or compass, little or nothing; so is it exactly with my plan. But though particular confutations would be of no avail, yet touching the sects and general divisions of such systems I must say something; something also touching the external signs which show that they are unsound; and finally something touching the causes of such great infelicity and of such lasting and general agreement in error; that so the access to truth may be made less difficult, and the human understanding may the more willingly submit to its purgation and dismiss its idols.

LXII

Idols of the Theatre, or of Systems, are many, and there can be and perhaps will be yet many more. For were it not that now for many ages men's minds have been busied with religion and theology; and were it not that civil governments, especially monarchies, have been averse to such novelties, even in matters speculative; so that men labour therein to the peril and harming of their fortunes,—not only unrewarded, but exposed also to contempt and envy; doubtless there would have arisen many other philosophical sects like to those which in great variety flourished once among the Greeks. For as on the phenomena of the heavens many hypotheses may be constructed, so likewise (and more also) many various dogmas may be set up and established on the phenomena of philosophy. And in the plays of this philosophical theatre you may observe the same thing which is found in the theatre of the poets, that stories invented for the stage are more compact and elegant, and more as one would wish them to be, than true stories out of history.

In general however there is taken for the material of philosophy either a great deal out of a few things, or a very little out of many things; so that on both sides philosophy is based on too narrow a foundation of experiment and natural history, and decides on the authority of too few cases. For the Rational School of philosophers snatches from experience a variety of common instances, neither duly ascertained nor diligently examined and weighed, and leaves all the rest to meditation and agitation of wit.[1]

There is also another class of philosophers, who having bestowed much diligent and careful labour on a few experiments, have thence made bold to educe and construct systems; wresting all other facts in a strange fashion to conformity therewith.

And there is yet a third class, consisting of those who out of faith and veneration mix their philosophy with theology and traditions; among whom the vanity of some has gone so far aside as to seek the origin of sciences among spirits and genii. So that this parent stock of errors—this false philosophy—is of three kinds: the sophistical, the empirical, and the superstitious.

LXIII

The most conspicuous example of the first class was Aristotle, who corrupted natural philosophy by his logic: fashioning the world out of categories;

[1] Bacon's target here is scholastic philosophy, with its confidence in logical reasoning unsupported by empirical experiment.

assigning to the human soul, the noblest of substances, a genus from words of the second intention;[1] doing the business of density and rarity (which is to make bodies of greater or less dimensions, that is, occupy greater or less spaces), by the frigid distinction of act and power; asserting that single bodies have each a single and proper motion, and that if they participate in any other, then this results from an external cause; and imposing countless other arbitrary restrictions on the nature of things; being always more solicitous to provide an answer to the question and affirm something positive in words, than about the inner truth of things; a failing best shown when his philosophy is compared with other systems of note among the Greeks. For the Homœomera of Anaxagoras; the atoms of Leucippus and Democritus; the Heaven and Earth of Parmenides; the strife and friendship of Empedocles; Heraclitus's doctrine how bodies are resolved into the indifferent nature of fire, and remoulded into solids; have all of them some taste of the natural philosopher—some savour of the nature of things, and experience, and bodies; whereas in the physics of Aristotle you hear hardly anything but the words of logic; which in his metaphysics also, under a more imposing name, and more forsooth as a realist than a nominalist, he has handled over again. Nor let any weight be given to the fact, that in his books on animals and his problems, and other of his treatises, there is frequent dealing with experiments. For he had come to his conclusion before; he did not consult experience, as he should have done, in order to the framing of his decisions and axioms; but having first determined the question according to his will, he then resorts to experience, and bending her into conformity with his placets leads her about like a captive in a procession;[2] so that even on this count he is more guilty than his modern followers, the schoolmen, who have abandoned experience altogether.

LXIV

But the Empirical school of philosophy gives birth to dogmas more deformed and more monstrous than the Sophistical or Rational school. For it has its foundations not in the light of common notions (which though it be a faint and superficial light, is yet in a manner universal, and has reference to many things), but in the narrowness and darkness of a few experiments. To those therefore who are daily busied with these experiments, and have infected their imagination with them, such a philosophy seems probable and all but certain; to all men else incredible and vain. Of this there is a notable instance in the alchemists and their dogmas; though it is hardly to be found elsewhere in these times, except perhaps in the philosophy of [William] Gilbert. Nevertheless with regard to philosophies of this kind there is one caution not to be omitted; for I foresee that if ever men are roused by my admonitions to betake themselves seriously to experiment and bid farewell to sophistical doctrines, then indeed through the premature hurry of the understanding to leap or fly to universals and principles of things, great danger may be apprehended from philosophies of this kind; against which evil we ought even now to prepare.

LXV

But the corruption of philosophy by superstition and an admixture of theology is far more widely spread, and does the greatest harm, whether to entire systems or to their parts. For the human understanding is obnoxious to the influence of the imagination no less than to the influence of common notions. For the contentious and sophistical kind of philosophy ensnares the understanding; but this kind, being fanciful and tumid and half poetical, misleads it more by flattery. For there is in man an ambition of the understanding, no less than of the will, especially in high and lofty spirits.

[1] words of the second intention secondary conceptions (e.g. genus, species, variety) formed by application of thought to first intentions, or primary conceptions (e.g. tree).

[2] placets expressions of assent (OED placet 2).

Of this kind we have among the Greeks a striking example in Pythagoras, though he united with it a coarser and more cumbrous superstition; another in Plato and his school, more dangerous and subtle. It shows itself likewise in parts of other philosophies, in the introduction of abstract forms and final causes and first causes, with the omission in most cases of causes intermediate, and the like. Upon this point the greatest caution should be used. For nothing is so mischievous as the apotheosis of error; and it is a very plague of the understanding for vanity to become the object of veneration. Yet in this vanity some of the moderns have with extreme levity indulged so far as to attempt to found a system of natural philosophy on the first chapter of Genesis, on the book of Job, and other parts of the sacred writings; seeking for the dead among the living: which also makes the inhibition and repression of it the more important, because from this unwholesome mixture of things human and divine there arises not only a fantastic philosophy but also an heretical religion. Very meet it is therefore that we be sober-minded, and give to faith that only which is faith's.

LXVIII

So much concerning the several classes of idols, and their equipage: all of which must be renounced and put away with a fixed and solemn determination, and the understanding thoroughly freed and cleansed; the entrance into the kingdom of man, founded on the sciences, being not much other than the entrance into the kingdom of heaven, whereinto none may enter except as a little child [Mark 10:15, Luke 18:17].

Application of the Method

LXIX

But vicious demonstrations are as the strongholds and defences of idols; and those we have in logic do little else than make the world the bond-slave of human thought, and human thought the bond-slave of words. Demonstrations truly are in effect the philosophies themselves and the sciences. For such as they are, well or ill established, such are the systems of philosophy and the contemplations which follow. Now in the whole of the process which leads from the sense and objects to axioms and conclusions, the demonstrations which we use are deceptive and incompetent. This process consists of four parts, and has as many faults. In the first place, the impressions of the sense itself are faulty; for the sense both fails us and deceives us. But its shortcomings are to be supplied, and its deceptions to be corrected. Secondly, notions are ill drawn from the impressions of the senses, and are indefinite and confused, whereas they should be definite and distinctly bounded. Thirdly, the induction is amiss which infers the principles of sciences by simple enumeration, and does not, as it ought, employ exclusions and solutions (or separations) of nature. Lastly, that method of discovery and proof according to which the most general principles are first established, and then intermediate axioms are tried and proved by them, is the parent of error and the curse of all science. Of these things however, which now I do but touch upon, I will speak more largely, when, having performed these expiations and purgings of the mind, I come to set forth the true way for the interpretation of nature.

LXX

But the best demonstration by far is experience, if it go not beyond the actual experiment. For if it be transferred to other cases which are deemed similar, unless such transfer be made by a just and orderly process, it is a fallacious thing. But the manner of making experiments which men now use is blind and stupid. And therefore, wandering and straying as they do with no settled course, and taking counsel only from things as they fall out, they fetch a wide circuit and meet with many matters, but make little progress; and sometimes are full of hope, sometimes are distracted; and always find that there is something beyond to be sought. For it generally happens that men make their trials carelessly, and as it were in play; slightly varying experiments already known, and, if the thing does not answer, growing weary and abandoning the attempt. And even if they apply themselves to experiments more seriously and earnestly and laboriously, still they spend their labour in working out some one experiment, as Gilbert with the magnet, and the chemists with gold; a course of proceeding not less unskilful in the design than small in the attempt. For no one successfully investigates the nature of a thing in the thing itself; the inquiry must be enlarged, so as to become more general.

And even when they seek to educe some science or theory from their experiments, they nevertheless almost always turn aside with overhasty and unseasonable eagerness to practice; not only for the sake of the uses and fruits of the practice, but from impatience to obtain in the shape of some new work an assurance for themselves that it is worth their while to go on; and also to show themselves off to the world, and so raise the credit of the business in which they are engaged. Thus, like Atalanta, they go aside to pick up the golden apple, but meanwhile they interrupt their course, and let the victory escape them.[1] But in the true course of experience, and in carrying it on to the effecting of new works, the divine wisdom and order must be our pattern. Now God on the first day of creation created light only, giving to that work an entire day, in which no material substance was created. So must we likewise from experience of every kind first endeavour to discover true causes and axioms; and seek for experiments of light, not for experiments of fruit. For axioms rightly discovered and established supply practice with its instruments, not one by one, but in clusters, and draw after them trains and troops of works. Of the paths however of experience, which no less than the paths of judgment are impeded and beset, I will speak hereafter; here I have only mentioned ordinary experimental research as a bad kind of demonstration. But now the order of the matter in hand leads me to add something both as to those signs which I lately mentioned,—(signs that the systems of philosophy and contemplation in use are in a bad condition)—and also as to the causes of what seems at first so strange and incredible. For a knowledge of the signs prepares assent; an explanation of the causes removes the marvel: which two things will do much to render the extirpation of idols from the understanding more easy and gentle.

LXXXIX

Neither is it to be forgotten that in every age Natural Philosophy has had a troublesome adversary and hard to deal with; namely, superstition, and the blind and immoderate zeal of religion. For we see among the Greeks that those who first proposed to men's then uninitiated ears the natural causes for thunder and for storms, were thereupon found guilty of impiety. Nor was much more forbearance shown by some of the ancient fathers of the Christian church to those who on most convincing grounds (such as no one in his senses would now think of contradicting) maintained that the earth was round, and of consequence asserted the existence of the antipodes.

[1] In mythology, Atalanta vowed to marry only if a suitor could defeat her in a footrace; Hippomenes won her hand by dropping three golden apples during the race, distracting Atalanta, who stopped to pick them up.

Moreover, as things now are, to discourse of nature is made harder and more perilous by the summaries and systems of the schoolmen; who having reduced theology into regular order as well as they were able, and fashioned it into the shape of an art, ended in incorporating the contentious and thorny philosophy of Aristotle, more than was fit, with the body of religion.

To the same result, though in a different way, tend the speculations of those who have taken upon them to deduce the truth of the Christian religion from the principles of philosophers, and to confirm it by their authority; pompously solemnising this union of the sense and faith as a lawful marriage, and entertaining men's minds with a pleasing variety of matter, but all the while disparaging things divine by mingling them with things human. Now in such mixtures of theology with philosophy only the received doctrines of philosophy are included; while new ones, albeit changes for the better, are all but expelled and exterminated.

Lastly, you will find that by the simpleness of certain divines, access to any philosophy, however pure, is well nigh closed. Some are weakly afraid lest a deeper search into nature should transgress the permitted limits of sobermindedness; wrongfully wresting and transferring what is said in holy writ against those who pry into sacred mysteries, to the hidden things of nature, which are barred by no prohibition. Others with more subtlety surmise and reflect that if second causes are unknown everything can more readily be referred to the divine hand and rod; a point in which they think religion greatly concerned; which is in fact nothing else but to seek to gratify God with a lie. Others fear from past example that movements and changes in philosophy will end in assaults on religion. And others again appear apprehensive that in the investigation of nature something may be found to subvert or at least shake the authority of religion, especially with the unlearned. But these two last fears seem to me to savour utterly of carnal wisdom; as if men in the recesses and secret thoughts of their hearts doubted and distrusted the strength of religion and the empire of faith over the sense, and therefore feared that the investigation of truth in nature might be dangerous to them. But if the matter be truly considered, natural philosophy is after the word of God at once the surest medicine against superstition, and the most approved nourishment for faith, and therefore she is rightly given to religion as her most faithful handmaid, since the one displays the will of God, the other his power. For he did not err who said "Ye err in that ye know not the Scriptures and the power of God" [Matthew 22:29, Mark 12:24], thus coupling and blending in an indissoluble bond information concerning his will and meditation concerning his power. Meanwhile it is not surprising if the growth of Natural Philosophy is checked, when religion, the thing which has most power over men's minds, has by the simpleness and incautious zeal of certain persons been drawn to take part against her.

XC

Again, in the customs and institutions of schools, academies, colleges, and similar bodies destined for the abode of learned men and the cultivation of learning, everything is found adverse to the progress of science. For the lectures and exercises there are so ordered, that to think or speculate on anything out of the common way can hardly occur to any man. And if one or two have the boldness to use any liberty of judgment, they must undertake the task all by themselves; they can have no advantage from the company of others. And if they can endure this also, they will find their industry and largeness of mind no slight hindrance to their fortune. For the studies of men in these places are confined and as it were imprisoned in the writings of certain authors, from whom if any man dissent he is straightway arraigned as a turbulent person and an innovator. But surely there is a great distinction between matters of state and the arts; for the danger from new motion and from new light is not the same. In matters of state a change even for the better is distrusted, because it unsettles what is established; these things resting on authority, consent, fame and opinion, not on demonstration. But arts and sciences should be like mines, where the noise of new works and further advances is heard on every side. But though the matter be so according to right reason, it is not so acted on in practice; and the points above mentioned in the administration and government of learning put a severe restraint upon the advancement of the sciences.

XCII

But by far the greatest obstacle to the progress of science and to the undertaking of new tasks and provinces therein, is found in this—that men despair and think things impossible. For wise and serious men are wont in these matters to be altogether distrustful; considering with themselves the obscurity of nature, the shortness of life, the deceitfulness of the senses, the weakness of the judgment, the difficulty of experiment and the like; and so supposing that in the revolution of time and of the ages of the world the sciences have their ebbs and flows; that at one season they grow and flourish, at another wither and decay, yet in such sort that when they have reached a certain point and condition they can advance no further. If therefore any one believes or promises more, they think this comes of an ungoverned and unripened mind, and that such attempts have prosperous beginnings, become difficult as they go on, and end in confusion. Now since these are thoughts which naturally present themselves to grave men and of great judgment, we must take good heed that we be not led away by our love for a most fair and excellent object to relax or diminish the severity of our judgment; we must observe diligently what encouragement dawns upon us and from what quarter; and, putting aside the lighter breezes of hope, we must thoroughly sift and examine those which promise greater steadiness and constancy. Nay, and we must take state-prudence too into our counsels, whose rule is to distrust, and to take the less favourable view of human affairs. I am now therefore to speak touching Hope; especially as I am not a dealer in promises, and wish neither to force nor to ensnare men's judgments, but to lead them by the hand with their good will. And though the strongest means of inspiring hope will be to bring men to particulars; especially to particulars digested and arranged in my Tables of Discovery (the subject partly of the second, but much more of the fourth part of my Instauration),[1] since this is not merely the promise of the thing but the thing itself; nevertheless that everything may be done with gentleness, I will proceed with my plan of preparing men's minds; of which preparation to give hope is no unimportant part. For without it the rest tends rather to make men sad (by giving them a worse and a meaner opinion of things as they are than they now have, and making them more fully to feel and know the unhappiness of their own condition) than to induce any alacrity or to whet their industry in making trial. And therefore it is fit that I publish and set forth those conjectures of mine which make hope in this matter reasonable; just as Columbus did, before that wonderful voyage of his across the Atlantic, when he gave the reasons for his conviction that new lands and continents might be discovered besides those which were known before; which reasons, though rejected at first, were afterwards made good by experience, and were the causes and beginnings of great events.

[1] Tables of Discovery Bacon's proposed method for organizing data, described in more detail in aphorism CV. His example later in Novum Organum (the incomplete second part of his Instauratio magna) is heat: he compiles a list of objects that display the quality of heat, another of related objects that do not, and a third in which heat is associated in varying degrees within the same object, as a prelude to inductive reasoning. The planned fourth part of the Instauratio was to offer more examples of his experimental method in action.

CV

In establishing axioms, another form of induction must be devised than has hitherto been employed; and it must be used for proving and discovering not first principles (as they are called) only, but also the lesser axioms, and the middle, and indeed all. For the induction which proceeds by simple enumeration is childish; its conclusions are precarious, and exposed to peril from a contradictory instance; and it generally decides on too small a number of facts, and on those only which are at hand. But the induction which is to be available for the discovery and demonstration of sciences and arts, must analyze nature by proper rejections and exclusions; and then, after a sufficient number of negatives, come to a conclusion on the affirmative instances: which has not yet been done or even attempted, save only by Plato, who does indeed employ this form of induction to a certain extent for the purpose of discussing definitions and ideas. But in order to furnish this induction or demonstration well and duly for its work, very many things are to be provided which no mortal has yet thought of; insomuch that greater labour will have to be spent in it than has hitherto been spent on the syllogism. And this induction must be used not only to discover axioms, but also in the formation of notions. And it is in this induction that our chief hope lies.

CXIII

Moreover I think that men may take some hope from my own example. And this I say not by way of boasting, but because it is useful to say it. If there be any that despond, let them look at me, that being of all men of my time the most busied in affairs of state, and a man of health not very strong (whereby much time is lost), and in this course altogether a pioneer, following in no man's track, nor sharing these counsels with any one, have nevertheless by resolutely entering on the true road, and submitting my mind to things, advanced these matters, as I suppose, some little way. And then let them consider what may be expected (after the way has been thus indicated) from men abounding in leisure, and from association of labours, and from successions of ages: the rather because it is not a way over which only one man can pass at a time (as is the case with that of reasoning), but one in which the labours and industries of men (especially as regards the collecting of experience) may with the best effect be first distributed and then combined. For then only will men begin to know their strength, when instead of great numbers doing all the same things, one shall take charge of one thing and another of another.

CXIV

Lastly, even if the breath of hope which blows on us from the New Continent were fainter than it is and harder to perceive; yet the trial (if we would not bear a spirit altogether abject) must by all means be made. For there is no comparison between that which we may lose by not trying and by not succeeding; since by not trying we throw away the chance of an immense good; by not succeeding we only incur the loss of a little human labour. But as it is, it appears to me from what has been said, and also from what has been left unsaid, that there is hope enough and to spare, not only to make a bold man try, but also to make a sober-minded and wise man believe.

CXXX

And now it is time for me to propound the art itself of interpreting nature; in which, although I conceive that I have given true and most useful precepts, yet I do not say either that it is absolutely necessary (as if nothing could be done without it) or that it is perfect. For I am of opinion that if men had ready at hand a just history of nature and experience, and laboured diligently thereon; and if they could bind themselves to two rules,—the first, to lay aside received opinions and notions; and the second, to refrain the mind for a time from the highest generalisations, and those next to them,—they would be able by the native and genuine force of the mind, without any other art, to fall into my form of interpretation. For interpretation is the true and natural work of the mind when freed from impediments. It is true however that by my precepts everything will be in more readiness, and much more sure.

Nor again do I mean to say that no improvement can be made upon these. On the contrary, regard the mind not only in its own faculties, but in its connection with things, must needs hold that the art of discovery may advance as discoveries advance.

Michael Drayton

1563 – 1631

Not much is known of Drayton's early life or education; he may have been a page in the household of Sir Henry Goodere, to whom he said he was indebted for "the most part" of his education. There is no record of a university education. If his verse is to be taken as indicative, he loved the same woman for thirty years, but never married. "Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part" is one of the finest love-sonnets in the language, indicating that Drayton learned well from Spenser and from Shakespeare. His early verse is imitative of Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender (1579), and much of his verse represents a continuation of the high strain of English patriotism which was fostered in the reign of Elizabeth both by the deliberate propaganda of the ruling elite and by such events as the defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588. Drayton shared the historical, antiquarian, and topographical enthusiasms which were manifestations of this patriotism; his major poem is the Poly-Olbion, the subtitle of which characterizes it as "a description of all the tracts, rivers, mountains, forests and other parts…of Great Britain." He seems to have had a wide acquaintance among his literary contemporaries, and there is a story to the effect that Shakespeare's death was the result of a drinking bout with Drayton and Ben Jonson. Drayton was buried in Westminster Abbey, and the verses on his monument have been ascribed to Ben Jonson.

To the Virginian Voyage [1]

You brave heroic minds,
Worthy your country's name,
That honour still pursue,
Go, and subdue,
Whilst loit'ring hinds [2]
Lurk here at home, with shame.

Britons, you stay too long,
Quickly aboard bestow you,
And with a merry gale
Swell your stretch'd sail,
With vows as strong,
As the winds that blow you.

Your course securely steer,
West and by south forth keep,
Rocks, lee shores, nor shoals,
When Aeolus scowls, [3]
You need not fear,
So absolute the deep. [4]

And cheerfully at sea,
Success you still entice,
To get the pearl and gold,
And ours to hold,
Virginia,
Earth's only paradise.

Where nature hath in store,
Fowl, venison, and fish,
And the fruitfull'st soil,
Without your toil,
Three harvests more,
All greater then you wish.

And the ambitious vine
Crowns with his purple mass,
The Cedar reaching high
To kiss the sky,
The Cypress, pine
And useful Sassafras.[1]

To whose, the golden age
Still nature's laws doth give,
No other cares that tend,
But them to defend
From winter's age,
That long there doth not live.

When as the luscious smell
Of that delicious land,
Above the seas that flows,
The clear wind throws,
Your hearts to swell
Approaching the dear strand.

In kenning of the shore[2]
(Thanks to God first given,)
O you the happy'st men,
Be frolic then,
Let cannons roar,
Frighting the wide heaven.

And in regions far
Such heroes bring ye forth,
As those from whom we came,
And plant our name,
Under that star
Not known unto our north.

And as there plenty grows
Of laurel everywhere,
Apollo's sacred tree,[3]
You it may see,
A poet's brows
To crown, that may sing there.

Thy voyages attend,
Industrious Hakluyt,[4]
Whose reading shall inflame
Men to seek fame,
And much commend
To after-times thy wit.

Quoth our brave Henry then,
Though they to one be ten,
Be not amazed.
Yet have we well begun,
Battles so bravely won,
Have ever to the sun,
By fame been raised.

And for my self (quoth he,)
This me full rest shall be,
England ne'r mourn for me,
Nor more esteem me.
Victor I will remain,
Or on this earth lie slain,
Never shall she sustain,
Loss to redeem me.

Poiters and Cressy tell, [1]
When most their pride did swell,
Under our swords they fell,
No less our skill is,
Then when our grandsire great,
Claiming the regal seat,
By many a warlike feat,
Lopped the French lilies.

The Duke of York so dread,
The eager vaward led; [2]
With the main, Henry sped,
Amongst his hench-men. [3]
Excester had the rear,
A braver man not there,
O Lord, how hot they were,
On the false French-men!

They now to fight are gone,
Armour on armour shone,
Drum now to drum did groan,
To hear, was wonder;
That with cries they make,
The very earth did shake,
Trumpet to trumpet spake,
Thunder to thunder.

Well it thine age became,
O noble Erpingham,
Which didst the signal aim,[4]
To our hid forces;
When from a meadow by,
Like a storm suddenly,
The English archery
Stuck the French horses,

Stuck close together.

When down their bows they threw,
And forth their bilboes drew, [1]
And on the French they flew,
Not one was tardy;
Arms were from shoulders sent,
Scalps to the teeth were rent,
Down the French peasants went,
Our men were hardy.

This while our noble King,
His broad sword brandishing,
Down the French host did ding, [2]
As to o'r-whelm it;
And many a deep wound lent,
His arms with blood besprent,
And many a cruel dent
Bruised his helmet.

Gloster, that Duke so good,
Next of the royal blood,
For famous England stood,
With his brave brother;
Clarence, in steel so bright,
Though but a maiden knight,
Yet in that furious fight,
Scarce such another.

Warwick in blood did wade,
Oxford the foe invade,
And cruel slaughter made,
Still as they ran up;
Suffolk his axe did ply,
Beaumont and Willoughby
Bare them right doughtily, [3]
Ferrers and Fanhope,

Upon Saint Crispin's day [4]
Fought was this noble fray,
Which fame did not delay,
To England to carry;
O, when shall English men
With such acts fill a pen,
Or England breed again,
Such a King Harry?

Sonnet 61

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part,
Nay, I have done: you get no more of me,
And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart,
That thus so cleanly, I myself can free;
Shake hands for ever, cancel all our vows,
And when we meet at any time again,
Be it not seen in either of our brows,
That we one jot of former love retain;
Now at the last gasp, of love's latest breath,
When his pulse failing, passion speechless lies,
When faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
And innocence is closing up his eyes,
Now if thou would'st, when all have given him over
From death to life, thou might'st him yet recover.

King James VI/I

1566 – 1625

James was already an experienced king when he succeeded Elizabeth in 1603: King of Scotland at the age of one, he had been educated for the role since childhood and had successfully ruled his northern kingdom since 1585 (and in some respects even earlier). His ideas about monarchy, however, developed in opposition to those of his tutor, the classicist George Buchanan, who argued that a people had the right to rebel against a wicked ruler. In his political treatise The Trew Law of Free Monarchies (1598) and in Basilicon Doron (1599), an influential book on the art of government addressed to his son Henry, James argued for a monarch's divinely ordained power over his subjects. At the same time, James conceded that a monarch had a duty to rule by law and for the subjects' common good: his was a moderated absolutism.

Both facets of James's political thinking are evident in this extract from a speech he made to Parliament in 1610. The occasion was the negotiation over the "Great Contract," a proposal to establish an annual royal income in exchange for the abandonment of some much-resented royal prerogatives. The plan would eventually founder, but was still an option when this speech was delivered. James's purpose was conciliatory. He argues that monarchs were accountable only to God, and that even to debate the limits of royal power was treason. But he assures his listeners of his reasonableness, of his respect for the common law and for the "ancient form of this State," that is, government through the two Houses of Parliament. The remainder of the speech addresses practical matters—James justifies his spending against complaints of royal extravagance, encourages support for legislation against recusants and on the preservation of forests and game, and even proposes the translation of the common laws from the "law French" in which they were written to English (an idea resurrected in the 1640s, also unsuccessfully, by the Levellers).

Like several of James's other speeches, this one was published soon after it was delivered, and was included in his folio of collected Workes (1616). James was an unusually prolific writer for an early modern monarch. In addition to his widely circulated and often translated political treatises, he wrote theological works; a book on witchcraft, Daemonologie (1598); A Counterblaste to Tobacco (1604); a treatise on writing poetry in Scots; and poetry in Scots, Latin, and English.

A Speech to the Lords and Commons of the Parliament at White-Hall

The state of monarchy is the supremest thing upon earth: For Kings are not only God's lieutenants upon earth, and sit upon God's throne, but even by God himself they are called gods.[1] There be three principal similitudes that illustrate the state of monarchy: One taken out of the word of God; and the two other out of the grounds of policy and philosophy. In the Scriptures kings are called gods, and so their power after a certain relation compared to the divine power. Kings are also compared to fathers of families: for a king is truly parens patriae [the parent of the fatherland], the politic father of his people. And lastly, kings are compared to the head of this microcosm of the body of man.

Kings are justly called gods, for that they exercise a manner or resemblance of divine power upon earth. For if you will consider the attributes to God, you shall see how they agree in the person of a king. God hath power to create, or destroy, make, or unmake at his pleasure, to give life, or send death, to judge all, and to be judged nor accountable to none: To raise low things, and to make high things low at his pleasure, and to God are both soul and body due. And the like power have kings: they make and unmake their subjects; they have power of raising and casting down; of life and of death; judges over all their subjects and in all causes, and yet accountable to none but God only. They have power to exalt low things, and abase high things, and make of their subjects like men at the chess: a pawn to take a bishop or a knight, and to cry up or down any of their subjects, as they do their money. And to the king is due both the affection of the soul, and the service of the body of his subjects....

As for the father of a family, they had of old under the law of nature patriam potestatem [fatherly power], which was potestatem vitae et necis [the power of life and death], over their children or family. I mean such fathers of families as were the lineal heirs of those families whereof kings did originally come: For kings had their first original from them who planted and spread themselves in colonies through the world. Now a father may dispose of his inheritance to his children at his pleasure: yea, even disinherit the eldest upon just occasions, and prefer the youngest, according to his liking; make them beggars, or rich at his pleasure; restrain, or banish out of his presence, as he finds them give cause of offence, or restore them in favour again with the penitent sinner: So may the king deal with his subjects.

And lastly, as for the head of the natural body, the head hath the power of directing all the members of the body to that use which the judgement in the head thinks most convenient. It may apply sharp cures, or cut off corrupt members, let blood in what proportion it thinks fit, and as the body may spare, but yet is all this power ordained by God ad aedificationem, non ad destructionem [for edification, not destruction].[1] For although God have power as well of destruction as of creation or maintenance, yet will it not agree with the wisdom of God to exercise his power in the destruction of nature and overturning the whole frame of things, since his creatures were made that his glory might thereby be the better expressed: So were he a foolish father that would disinherit or destroy his children without a cause, or leave off the careful education of them; And it were an idle head that would in place of physic so poison or phlebotomize the body as might breed a dangerous distemper or destruction thereof.[2]

But now in these our times we are to distinguish between the state of kings in their first original, and between the state of settled kings and monarchs, that do at this time govern in civil kingdoms: For even as God, during the time of the Old Testament, spake by oracles, and wrought by miracles; yet how soon it pleased him to settle a Church which was bought and redeemed by the blood of his only Son, Christ, then was there a cessation of both;[3] He ever after governing his people and Church within the limits of his revealed will. So in the first original of kings, whereof some had their beginning by conquest, and some by election of the people, their wills at that time served for law; Yet how soon kingdoms began to be settled in civility and policy, then did kings set down their minds by laws, which are properly made by the king only, but at the rogation of the people,[4] the king's grant being obtained thereunto. And so the king became to be lex loquens [a speaking law], after a sort, binding himself by a double oath to the observation of the fundamental laws of his kingdom: tacitly, as by being a king, and so bound to protect as well the people as the laws of his kingdom; and expressly, by his oath at his coronation. So as every just king in a settled kingdom is bound to observe that paction made to his people by his laws,[1] in framing his government agreeable thereunto, according to that paction which God made with Noah after the deluge: Hereafter seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease, so long as the earth remains.[2] And therefore a king governing in a settled kingdom leaves to be a king, and degenerates into a tyrant, as soon as he leaves off to rule according to his laws. In which case the king's conscience may speak unto him as the poor widow said to Philip of Macedon: "Either govern according to your law, aut ne rex sis [or may you be no king]." And though no Christian man ought to allow any rebellion of people against their Prince, yet doeth God never leave kings unpunished when they transgress these limits: For in that same psalm where God saith to kings, vos dii estis [you are gods], he immediately thereafter concludes, But ye shall die like men.[3] The higher we are placed, the greater shall our fall be. Ut casus sic dolor [the greater the fall, the greater the pain]: the taller the trees be, the more in danger of the wind; and the tempest beats sorest upon the highest mountains. Therefore all kings that are not tyrants, or perjured, will be glad to bound themselves within the limits of their laws; and they that persuade them the contrary, are vipers and pests, both against them and the commonwealth. For it is a great difference between a king's government in a settled state and what kings in their original power might do in individuo vago [as unrestricted individuals].[4] As for my part, I thank God, I have ever given good proof that I never had intention to the contrary: And I am sure to go to my grave with that reputation and comfort, that never king was in all his time more careful to have his laws duly observed, and himself to govern thereafter, than I.

[2] phlebotomize to let blood (OED).

[3] Milton devotes eight stanzas of his poem "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity" (1629) to the cessation of the oracles.

[4] rogation a formal request (OED rogation 3).

I conclude then this point touching the power of kings, with this axiom of divinity, that as to dispute what God may do is blasphemy, but quid vult deus [what God wants], that divines may lawfully, and do ordinarily, dispute and discuss; for to dispute a posse ad esse [from what may be to what is] is both against logic and divinity: So is it sedition in subjects to dispute what a king may do in the height of his power. But just kings will ever be willing to declare what they will do, if they will not incur the curse of God. I will not be content that my power be disputed upon: but I shall ever be willing to make the reason appear of all my doings, and rule my actions according to my laws.

Thomas Campion

1567 – 1620

Thomas Campion was the second child of John Campion and Lucy Trigg, a widow, who had married in 1564, the year of Shakespeare's birth. Shortly after the marriage, John Campion became an official of the Court of Chancery, perhaps paying for the office with his wife's money. He is likely to have resided in the Cursitors' Office in Chancery Lane, and Thomas was baptized in St. Andrew's, Holborn. John Campion died in 1576; his widow left London, and was remarried soon after to Augustine Steward, of a family from which Oliver Cromwell was descended through his mother, Elizabeth Steward. Steward had considerable estates in Hertfordshire. Lucy did not survive long to enjoy her third marriage, however; she died in 1580. Augustine remarried, again to a widow, Anne Sisley, who had a son about Thomas's age. Thomas Campion and Thomas Sisley were then sent off to Peterhouse, at that time one of the most flourishing colleges in Cambridge. Their names appear in the Buttery Books for 1581, and from Augustine Steward's account books we have a detailed record of the money spent on their education, down to the cost of paper and candles and washing and mending their clothing and shoes. At Cambridge Campion acquired a good knowledge of, and reverence for, classical literature; and he became a close friend of Thomas Nashe. Campion left Cambridge in 1584 and was admitted to Gray's Inn, perhaps with the intention of pursuing law or some related profession. Campion did not find the study of law fascinating, and began at this period to write Latin epigrams and English verse. From internal evidence it seems likely that Campion was a member, as a "Gentleman Adventurer," of the expedition of four thousand men levied by the Queen and commanded by the Earl of Essex, which was sent to the assistance of Henri IV, arriving at Dieppe in August 1591. The English soldiers, nominally sent to oppose the Spanish invaders of Brittany, were in fact used to subdue Henri's Catholic subjects. In 1591 Campion's first printed poems appeared anonymously, and by that time were already appearing in manuscript commonplace books. His first published book, in 1595, was a collection of Latin poems which won him an immediate reputation. His first English book, A Book of Airs, was published in 1601; his Observations in the Art of English Poesy appeared in the following year. His reputation may be suggested by the fact that he was one of ten poets mentioned as "among the most pregnant wits of these our times" in Camden's Remains, 1605; the fact that Sidney, Spenser, Ben Jonson and Shakespeare are listed reminds us that the competition was not feeble. However, after the Observations there was a silence of four years, during which time Campion seems to have studied medicine, probably on the Continent; there are no medical allusions in the Latin poems he published in 1595, and a great many in the one published in 1619. In 1613 he published Songs of Mourning on the death of Prince Henry, and in the same year three other masques and, probably, his Two Books of Airs. One of the masques was for a wedding which became notorious, between Frances Howard and Robert Carr, after the annulment of Frances Howard's marriage. Sir Thomas Overbury, who opposed the match as immoral, was subsequently murdered by the couple. Their intermediaries, who conveyed poison to Overbury, were executed; the couple were imprisoned and subsequently released. History has cleared Campion of any complicity in the murder, and we may enjoy his poems and the Epithalamium which Donne wrote for the occasion with a clear conscience. In 1617 appeared the Third and Fourth Book of Airs; an undated technical work on music, the New Way of Making Four Parts in Counter-point, may also belong to this period. Campion was buried at St. Dunstan's in the West, Fleet Street, and was described in the register as "doctor of Physic." He left his entire estate of £22 to Philip Rosseter, his friend and collaborator in A Book of Airs.

VI

Let him that will be free and keep his heart from care,
Retir'd alone, remain where no discomforts are.
For when the eye doth view his grief, or hapless ear his sorrow hears,
Th' impression still in him abides, and ever in one shape appears.

Forget thy griefs betimes; long sorrow breeds long pain,
For joy far fled from men, will not return again;
O happy is the soul which heaven ordained to live in endless peace;
His life is a pleasing dream, and every hour his joys increase.

You heavy sprites, that love in severed shades to dwell,
That nurse despair, and dream of unrelenting hell,
Come sing this happy song, and learn of me the art of true content,
Load not your guilty souls with wrong, and heaven then will soon relent.

Follow your Saint, follow with accents sweet;
Haste you, sad notes, fall at her flying feet:
There, wrapped in cloud of sorrow pity move,
And tell the ravisher of my soul I perish for her love.
But if she scorns my never-ceasing pain,
Then burst with sighing in her sight and nere return again.
All that I sung still to her praise did tend,
Still she was first; still she my songs did end.
Yet she my love and Music both doeth fly,
The Music that her Echo is and beauties' sympathy;
Then let my Notes pursue her scornful flight:
It shall suffice that they were breath'd and died for her delight.

Sweet, exclude me not, nor be divided
From him that ere long must bed thee:
All thy maiden doubts Law hath decided;
Sure we are, and I must wed thee.
Presume then yet a little more:
Here's the way, bar not the door.

Tenants, to fulfil their landlord's pleasure,
Pay their rent before the quarter:
'Tis my case, if you it rightly measure;
Put me not then off with laughter.
Consider then a little more:
Here's the way to all my store.

Why were doors in love's despite devised?
Are not laws enough restraining?
Women are most apt to be surprised
Sleeping, or sleep wisely feigning.
Then grace me yet a little more:
Here's the way, bar not the door.

XIII [1]

As by the streams of Babylon
Far from our native soil we sat,
Sweet Sion, thee we thought upon,
And ev'ry thought a tear begat.

Aloft the trees, that spring up there,
Our silent harps we pensive hung:
Said they that captived us, Let's hear
Some song, which you in Sion sung.

Is then the song of our God fit
To be profaned in foreign land?
O Salem, thee when I forget,
Forget his skill may my right hand!

Fast to the roof cleave may my tongue,
If mindless I of thee be found:
Or if, when all my joys are sung,
Jerusalem be not the ground.

Remember, Lord, how Edom's race
Cried in Jerusalem's sad day,
Hurl down her walls, her towers deface,
And, stone by stone, all level lay.

Cursed Babel's seed! for Salem's sake
Just ruin yet for thee remains!
Blest shall they be thy babes that take
And 'gainst the stones dash out their brains.

From The Third Book of Airs

XI

If Love loves truth, then women do not love;
Their passions all are but dissembled shows;
Now kind and free of favour if they prove,
Their kindness straight a tempest overthrows.
Then as a seaman the poor lover fares;
The storm drowns him ere he can drown his cares.

But why accuse I women that deceive?
Blame then the foxes for their subtle wile:
They first from Nature did their craft receive:
It is a woman's nature to beguile.
Yet some, I grant, in loving steadfast grow;
But such by use are made, not nature, so.

O why had Nature power at once to frame
Deceit and Beauty, traitors both to Love?
O would Deceit had died when Beauty came
With her divineness ev'ry heart to move!
Yet do we rather wish, what ere befall,
To have fair women false than none at all.

From The Fourth Book of Airs

VII

There is a garden in her face,
Where roses and white lilies grow;
A heav'nly paradise is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits do flow.
There cherries grow, which none may buy
Till cherry ripe themselves do cry.

Those cherries fairly do enclose
Of orient pearl a double row;
Which when her lovely laughter shows,
They look like rose-buds filled with snow.
Yet them nor peer nor prince can buy,
Till cherry ripe themselves do cry.

Her eyes like angels watch them still;
Her brows like bended bows do stand,

[1] This is a rendering of the famous Psalm 137, which begins, in the Book of Common Prayer version, "By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept: when we remembered thee, O Sion."

Threat'ning with piercing frowns to kill
All that attempt with eye or hand
Those sacred cherries to come nigh,
Till cherry ripe themselves do cry.

Henry Wotton

1568 – 1639

Henry Wotton was educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford. He entered the Middle Temple, where he became, and was to remain, a close friend of Donne. In 1595 he became secretary to the Earl of Essex, gathering foreign intelligence. He was not implicated in the conspiracy against Elizabeth which resulted in the execution of Essex for treason in 1601. Wotton was knighted, as were a good many others, when James I came to the throne; but Wotton's knighthood was perhaps more than a royal money-raising device, as he was certainly a man of great ability. He was appointed ambassador to Venice. His epigram, that an ambassador was an honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country, is one of the better puns of the time. After his ambassadorship in Venice, Wotton was engaged in diplomatic missions to Germany and Holland; between 1604 and 1624 he spent most of his time abroad. From 1624 until his death Wotton was Provost of Eton; the letter of introduction he supplied to Milton before his travels to Europe helped Milton to meet well-known Italian scholars and writers. His Elements of Architecture was published in 1624. His poems were published after his death in the volume Reliquiae Wottonianae, 1651.

On his Mistress, the Queen of Bohemia

You meaner beauties of the night,
That poorly satisfy our eyes,
More by your number, than your light,
You common people of the skies;
What are you when the sun shall rise?

You curious chanters of the wood,
That warble forth Dame Natures lays,
Thinking your voices understood;
By your weak accents; what's your praise
When Philomel her voice shall raise? [1]

You violets, that first appear,
By your pure purple mantles known,
Like the proud virgins of the year,
As if the spring were all your own;
What are you when the rose is blown?

So, when my Mistress shall be seen
In form and beauty of her mind,
By virtue first, then choice a Queen,
Tell me, if she were not design'd
Th' eclipse and glory of her kind?

The Character of a Happy Life

How happy is he born and taught,
That serveth not another's will?
Whose armor is his honest thought,
And simple Truth his utmost skill?

Whose passions not his masters are,
Whose soul is still prepared for death,
Untied unto the world by care
Of public fame or private breath.

Who envies none that Chance doth raise,
Nor Vice hath ever understood,
How deepest wounds are given by praise,
Nor rules of state, but rules of good.

[1] Philomel the nightingale.

Who hath his life from rumors freed,
Whose conscience is his strong retreat,
Whose state can neither flatterers feed,
Nor ruin make oppressors great.

Who God doth late and early pray,
More of his grace than gifts to lend,
And entertains the harmless day
With a religious book or friend.

This man is freed from servile bands
Of hope to rise or fear to fall,
Lord of himself, though not of lands,
And having nothing yet hath all.

On a Bank as I Sat a-Fishing: A Description of the Spring

And now all nature seemed in love:
The lusty sap began to move,
New juice did stir th' embracing vines,
And birds had drawn their valentines.
The jealous trout, that low did lie,
Rose at a well-dissembled fly:
There stood my friend, with patient skill
Attending of his trembling quill.
Already were the eaves possessed
With the swift pilgrims' daubed nest.
The groves already did rejoice
In Philomel's triumphing voice.
The showers were short, the weather mild,
The morning fresh, the evening smiled.

Joan takes her neat-rubbed pail, and now
She trips to milk the sand-red cow;
Where for some sturdy football swain,
Joan strokes a sillabub or twain.[1]
The fields and gardens were beset
With tulip, crocus, violet;
And now, though late, the modest rose
Did more than half a blush disclose.
Thus all looked gay, all full of cheer,
To welcome the new-liveried year.

De Morte

Man's life's a tragedy: his mother's womb
(From which he enters) is the tiring room;[2]
This spacious earth the theatre; and the stage
That country which he lives in: passions, rage,
Folly and vice are actors: the first cry
The prologue to th' ensuing tragedy.
The former act consisteth of dumb shows;[3]
The second, he to more perfection grows;
I'th third he is a man, and doth begin
To nurture vice and act the deeds of sin:
I'th fourth declines; i'th fifth diseases clog
And trouble him; then death's his epilogue.

[1] sillabub a drink of sweetened milk or cream, mixed with wine or cider.

[2] tiring room theatre dressing room.

[3] dumb shows shows in pantomime, without speech.

Aemilia Lanyer

1569 – 1645

Aemilia Lanyer was the daughter of Baptist Bassano, an Italian musician at the English court, and his mistress Margaret Johnson. She was baptised in the parish church of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate. It is thought that she was brought up for a time in the household of Lady Susan, Countess Dowager of Kent. Her father, who died in 1576 after some financial difficulties, nevertheless left her £100. Her mother died nine years later. For a time, Lanyer was the mistress of Henry Carey, first Lord Hunsdon, who was forty-five years her senior. When, in 1592, she became pregnant by him, she was hastily married to one of the Queen's musicians, Captain Alfonso Lanyer, with an annuity of £40. Her son, Henry, was born the following year. Most of the details of Lanyer's life come from the diary and casebooks of the astrologer Simon Forman, whom she consulted on several occasions in 1597. Forman notes that Lanyer told him that "her husband hath dealt hardly with her and spent and consumed her goods and she is now...in debt." Lanyer, whose husband had set off on a sea voyage in hopes of being knighted, wished to know about the possibility of financial and social improvement. Forman's assurance of good fortune was not especially accurate. In 1604, Lanyer's husband was granted a patent by King James which provided him with the income from weighing of hay and grain, thereby improving their financial situation. It appears that in or about the same year, Lanyer accompanied Margaret, Countess of Cumberland, and Anne Clifford, her daughter, to Cookeham, the royal country house estate, a visit that may have inspired Lanyer to write Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, published in 1611. While the purported subject of Salve Deus is the Passion of Christ, its broader aim is to praise female spiritual and cognitive virtues within the broader cultural practice of patronage. Diane Purkiss has argued that Salve Deus is "a carefully-structured and organised attempt to put together the discourses of patronage, encomium, religious verse, defences of women, and the evocation of nature," "to create new ways of celebrating the female and to endorse a female (or feminist) interpretation of the biblical text and the material world." The Description of Cooke-ham, published with this work appears to be the first English country house poem, predating Jonson's To Penshurst. When her husband died in 1613, Lanyer engaged in litigation with his relations over the legacy of the patent granted him in 1604. Her legal battles continued after she opened a school in the wealthy district of St. Giles-in-the-Field in 1617, as disputes with her landlord over repairs and rent led to lengthy litigation. In 1633, Lanyer undertook to assist her son's widow and two children financially, petitioning for a patent in 1635. She died ten years later and was buried at St. James, Clerkenwell.

To All Virtuous Ladies in General

Each blessed lady that in virtue spends
Your precious time to beautify your souls;
Come wait on her whom winged fame attends
And in her hand the book where she enrolls
Those high deserts that majesty commends:
Let this fair Queen not unattended be,
When in my glass she deigns herself to see.

Put on your wedding garments every one,
The bridegroom stays to entertain you all;
Let virtue be your guide, for she alone
Can lead you right that you can never fall;
And make no stay for fear he should be gone:

But fill your lamps with oil of burning zeal,
That to your faith he may his truth reveal.[1]

Let all your robes be purple scarlet white,
Those perfect colours purest virtue wore,[2]
Come decked with lilies that did so delight
To be preferred in beauty, far before
Wise Solomon in all his glory dight:
Whose royal robes did no such pleasure yield,
As did the beauteous lily of the field.[3]

Adorn your temples with fair Daphne's crown
The never changing laurel, always green;[4]
Let constant hope all worldly pleasures drown,
In wise Minerva's paths be always seen;
Or with bright Cynthia, though fair Venus
frown:[5]
With hyssop cross the posts of every door,
Where sin would riot, making virtue poor.[6]

And let the Muses your companions be,
Those sacred sisters that on Pallas wait;[7]
Whose virtues with the purest minds agree,
Whose godly labours do avoid the bait
Of worldly pleasure, living always free
From sword, from violence, and from ill report,
To these nine worthies all fair minds resort.[8]

Anoint your hair with Aaron's precious oil,[9]
And bring your palms of vict'ry in your hands,
To overcome all thoughts that would defile
The earthly circuit of your soul's fair lands;
Let no dim shadows your clear eyes beguile:
Sweet odours, myrrh, gum, aloes, frankincense,
Present that King who died for your offence.

Behold, bright Titan's shining chariot stays,
All decked with flowers of the freshest hue,[10]
Attended on by Age, Hours, Nights, and Days,[11]
Which alters not your beauty, but gives you
Much more, and crowns you with eternal praise:
This golden chariot wherein you must ride,
Let simple doves, and subtle serpents guide.

Come swifter than the motion of the sun,
To be transfigured with our loving Lord,

[1] ll.8–14 as the wise virgins did in preparation for the arrival of the bridegroom (Matthew 25:1–13).

[2] Let all…virtue wore "The robes that Christ wore before his death" (original marginalia).

[3] Come decked…the field "And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" (Matthew 6:28–29); dight clothed (OED dight v III.10).

[4] Daphne's crown "In token of constancy" (original marginalia); Daphne fled from the unwanted sexual advances of Apollo and was turned into a laurel tree in response to her prayer for assistance.

[5] Minerva the goddess of wisdom; Cynthia the goddess of the moon and chastity; Venus the goddess of love, beauty and fertility.

[6] hyssop emended from Esop, as proposed by John Ulreich (Lanyer discussion list). Ulreich's argument is that the allusion appears to be to the Hebraic ritual of using twigs of the hyssop plant in purifying ceremonies: "Then Moses called for all the elders of Israel, and said unto them, Draw out and take you a lamb according to your families, and kill the passover. And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the basin, and strike the lintel and the two side posts with the blood that is in the basin" (Exodus 12:21–22).

[7] Muses The Nine Muses are the Greek deities who preside over music, poetry, the arts and sciences; Pallas Pallas Athena, the virgin warrior and goddess of wisdom. In Samuel Daniel's court masque Vision of Twelve Goddesses (presented Jan. 8, 1604), Queen Anne chose the part of Pallas.

[8] nine here, the Nine Muses.

[9] Aaron's precious oil Chosen for official priesthood, Aaron was anointed with holy oil by Moses (Leviticus 8:12); only he could enter into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement to make a sacrifice for the sins of the Israelites.

[10] Titan a name for the sun-god, Sol, or for the sun personified.

[11] Age…Days personifications of the forces which created and represented time.

Let glory end what grace in you begun, [1]
Of heav'nly riches make your greatest hoard,
In Christ all honour, wealth, and beauty's won:
By whose perfections you appear more fair
Than Phoebus, if he seven times brighter were. [2]

God's holy angels will direct your doves,
And bring your serpents to the fields of rest,
Where he doth stay that purchased all your loves
In bloody torments, when he died oppressed,
There shall you find him in those pleasant groves
Of sweet Elysium, by the well of life, [3]
Whose crystal springs do purge from worldly strife.

Thus may you fly from dull and sensual earth,
Whereof at first your bodies formed were,
That new regen'rate in a second birth, [4]
Your blessed souls may live without all fear,
Being immortal, subject to no death:
But in the eye of heaven so highly placed,
That others by your virtues may be graced.

Where worthy ladies I will leave you all,
Desiring you to grace this little book;
Yet some of you methinks I hear to call
Me by my name, and bid me better look,
Lest unawares I in an error fall:
In general terms, to place you with the rest,
Whom fame commends to be the very best.

Tis true, I must confess (O noble fame)
There are a number honoured by thee,
Of which, some few thou didst recite by name,
And willed my Muse they should remembered be;
Wishing some would their glorious trophies frame:
Which if I should presume to undertake,
My tired hand for very fear would quake.

Only by name I will bid some of those,
That in true honour's seat have long been placed,
Yea even such as thou hast chiefly chose,
By whom my Muse may be the better graced;
Therefore, unwilling longer time to lose,
I will invite some ladies that I know,
But chiefly those as thou hast graced so.

The Author's Dream to the Lady Mary, the Countess Dowager of Pembroke [5]

Me thought I passed through th' Idalian groves,
And asked the Graces, if they could direct
Me to a lady whom Minerva chose,
To live with her in height of all respect. [6]

Yet looking back into my thoughts again,
The eye of reason did behold her there
Fast tied unto them in a golden chain,
They stood, but she was set in honor's chair. [7]

And nine fair virgins sat upon the ground,
With harps and viols in their lily hands; [8]

[1] Let glory emended from "Lest" etc., accepting John Ulreich's suggestion (Lanyer discussion list). The meaning is "Allow your glorification to complete what grace has begun in you."

[2] Phoebus Apollo, the Sun-god; the sun personified.

[3] Elysium the state or abode of the blessed after death, (fig.) a place or state of perfect happiness.

[4] second birth spiritual birth; see John 3:3 and I Peter 1:23.

[5] The Author's Dream The dream vision as a form of patronage poetry dates back to medieval times; Lady Mary...Pembroke A brief biography of Mary Sidney Herbert (1561–1621), Countess of Pembroke, introduces a selection of her Psalms in this volume.

[6] Idalian groves in Cyprus where Aphrodite was worshipped; the Graces the sister-goddesses who bestow beauty and charm.

[7] she Lady Mary, the Countess Dowager of Pembroke.

[8] nine fair virgins the Nine Muses.

Whose harmony had all my senses drowned,
But that before mine eyes an object stands,

Whose beauty shined like Titan's clearest rays,
She blew a brazen trumpet, which did sound
Through all the world that worthy lady's praise,[1]
And by eternal fame I saw her crowned.

Yet studying, if I were awake, or no,
God Morphy came and took me by the hand,
And willed me not from slumber's bower to go,
Till I the sum of all did understand.[2]

When presently the welkin that before
Looked bright and clear, methought, was overcast,[3]
And dusky clouds, with boist'rous wind's great store,
Foretold of violent storms which could not last.

And gazing up into the troubled sky,
Methought a chariot did from thence descend,
Where one did sit replete with majesty,
Drawn by four fiery dragons, which did bend

Their course where this most noble lady sat,
Whom all these virgins with due reverence
Did entertain, according to that state
Which did belong unto her excellence.

When bright Bellona, so they did her call,
Whom these fair nymphs so humbly did receive,
A manly maid which was both fair and tall,
Her borrowed charret by a spring did leave.[4]

With spear, and shield, and currat on her breast,[5]
And on her head a helmet wondrous bright,
With myrtle bays, and olive branches dressed,
Wherein methought I took no small delight.

To see how all the Graces sought grace here,
And in what meek, yet princely sort she came;
How this most noble lady did embrace her,
And all humours unto hers did frame.[6]

Now fair Dictina by the break of day,
With all her damsels round about her came,[7]
Ranging the woods to hunt, yet made a stay,
When harkening to the pleasing sound of fame;

Her ivory bow and silver shafts she gave
Unto the fairest nymph of all her train;
And wondering who it was that in so grave,
Yet gallant fashion did her beauty stain:

She decked herself with all the borrowed light
That Phoebus would afford from his fair face,
And made her virgins to appear so bright,
That all the hills and vales received grace.

Then pressing where this beauteous troop did stand,
They all received her most willingly,
And unto her the lady gave her hand,
That she should keep with them continually.

Aurora rising from her rosy bed,
First blushed, then wept, to see fair Phoebe graced,[8]

[1] brazen brass (OED brazen a 1a).

[2] Morphy "The god of dreams" (original marginalia). Morpheus, one of the sons of Sleep, sent visions of human forms.

[3] welkin the sky (OED welkin 2).

[4] Bellona "Goddess of war and wisdom" (original marginalia); charret in classical and biblical use, a war-chariot (OED charet Obs).

[5] currat a piece of armour for the body (OED cuirass 1).

[6] And all humours unto hers did frame This line is out of rhythm; probably a monosyllabic word was dropped before "humours."

[7] Dictina "The moon" (original marginalia).

[8] Aurora "The morning" (original marginalia); the Roman goddess of the dawn; Phoebe the goddess of the moon, or the moon personified.

And unto Lady May these words she said,
"Come, let us go, we will not be out-faced."

"I will unto Apollo's waggoner, [1]
A[nd] bid him bring his master presently,
That his bright beams may all her beauty mar,
Gracing us with the lustre of his eye."

"Come, come, sweet May, and fill their laps with flowers,
And I will give a greater light than she:
So all these ladies' favours shall be ours,
None shall be more esteemed than we shall be."

Thus did Aurora dim fair Phoebus' light,
And was received in bright Cynthia's place,
While Flora all with fragrant flowers dight,
Pressed to show the beauty of her face. [2]

Though these, methought, were very pleasing sights,
Yet now these worthies did agree to go,
Unto a place full of all rare delights,
A place that yet Minerva did not know.

That sacred spring where art and nature strived
Which should remain as sov'reign of the place;
Whose ancient quarrel being new revived,
Added fresh beauty, gave far greater grace.

To which as umpires now these ladies go,
Judging with pleasure their delightful case;
Whose ravished senses made them quickly know,
'Twould be offensive either to displace.

And therefore willed they should forever dwell,
In perfect unity by this matchless spring:
Since 'twas impossible either should excel,
Or her fair fellow in subjection bring.

But here in equal sov'reignty to live,
Equal in state, equal in dignity,
That unto others they might comfort give,
Rejoicing all with their sweet unity.

And now methought I long to hear her name,
Whom wise Minerva honoured so much,
She whom I saw was crowned by noble fame,
Whom envy sought to sting, yet could not touch.

Methought the meagre elf did seek by ways
To come unto her, but it would not be;
Her venom purified by virtue's rays,
She pined and starved like an anatomy: [3]

While beauteous Pallas with this lady fair,
Attended by these nymphs of noble fame,
Beheld those woods, those groves, those bowers rare,
By which Pergusa, for so hight the name

Of that fair spring, his dwelling place and ground; [4]
And through those fields with sundry flowers clad,
Of sev'ral colours, to adorn the ground,
And please the senses ev'n of the most sad:

He trailed along the woods in wanton wise,
With sweet delight to entertain them all;
Inviting them to sit and to devise
On holy hymns; at last to mind they call

Those rare sweet songs which Israel's king did frame

[1] Apollo the god of the sun; the patron of music and poetry.

[2] Flora the goddess of flowers.

[3] anatomy an emaciated creature (OED anatomy I.6).

[4] hight called (OED hight v^{1} arch).

Unto the Father of Eternity;[1]
Before his holy wisdom took the name
Of great Messiah, Lord of unity.

Those holy sonnets they did all agree,
With this most lovely lady here to sing;
That by her noble breast's sweet harmony,
Their music might in ears of angels ring.

While saints like swans about this silver brook
Should hallelujah sing continually,
Writing her praises in th'eternal book
Of endless honour, true fame's memory.

Thus I in sleep the heavenliest music heard,
That ever earthly ears did entertain;
And durst not wake, for fear to be debarred
Of what my senses sought still to retain.

Yet sleeping, prayed dull slumber to unfold
Her noble name, who was of all admired;
When presently in drowsy terms he told
Not only that, but more than I desired.

This nymph, quoth he, great Pembroke hight by name,
Sister to valiant Sidney, whose clear light
Gives light to all that tread true paths of fame,
Who in the globe of heav'n doth shine so bright;[2]

That being dead, his fame doth him survive,
Still living in the hearts of worthy men;
Pale death is dead, but he remains alive,
Whose dying wounds restored him life again.

And this fair earthly goddess which you see,
Bellona and her virgins do attend;
In virtuous studies of divinity,
Her precious time continually doth spend.

So that a sister well she may be deemed,
To him that lived and died so nobly;
And far before him is to be esteemed
For virtue, wisdom, learning, dignity.

Whose beauteous soul hath gained a double life,
Both here on earth, and in the heav'ns above,
Till dissolution end all worldly strife:
Her blessed spirit remains, of holy love,

Directing all by her immortal light,
In this huge sea of sorrows, griefs, and fears;
With contemplation of God's powerful might,
She fills the eyes, the hearts, the tongues, the ears

Of after-coming ages, which shall read
Her love, her zeal, her faith, and piety;
The fair impression of whose worthy deed,
Seals her pure soul unto the Deity.

That both in heav'n and earth it may remain,
Crowned with her maker's glory and his love;
And this did Father Slumber tell with pain,
Whose dulness scarce could suffer him to move.

When I awaking left him and his bower,
Much grieved that I could no longer stay;
Senseless was sleep, not to admit me power,
As I had spent the night to spend the day:[3]

Then had god Morphy showed the end of all,
And what my heart desired, mine eyes had seen;

[2] great Pembroke Mary Sidney Herbert, the Countess Dowager of Pembroke; she was the sister of Sir Philip Sidney; valiant Sidney A courtier in the court of Queen Elizabeth I, Sidney (1554–1586) became a model for the heroic poet after he was fatally injured in an attack on a Spanish convoy in the Low Countries.

[3] Senseless...the day Sleep was powerless to allow her to spend the day as she had the night.

For as I waked methought I heard one call
For that bright charet lent by Jove's fair queen. [1]

But thou, base cunning thief, that robs our sp'rits
Of half that span of life which years doth give;
And yet no praise unto thy self it merits,
To make a seeming death in those that live. [2]

Yea wickedly thou doest consent to death,
Within thy restful bed to rob our souls;
In slumber's bower thou steal'st away our breath,
Yet none there is that thy base stealths controls.

If poor and sickly creatures would embrace thee,
Or they to whom thou giv'st a taste of pleasure,
Thou fliest as if Actaeon's hounds did chase thee, [3]
Or that to stay with them thou hadst no leisure.

But though thou hast deprived me of delight,
By stealing from me ere I was aware;
I know I shall enjoy the selfsame sight,
Thou hast no power my waking sprites to bar. [4]

For to this lady now I will repair,
Presenting her the fruits of idle hours;
Though many books she writes that are more rare,
Yet there is honey in the meanest flowers: [5]

Which is both wholesome, and delights the taste:
Though sugar be more finer, higher prized,
Yet is the painful bee no whit disgraced,
Nor her fair wax, or honey more despised. [6]

And though that learned damsel and the rest,
Have in a higher style her trophy framed;
Yet these unlearned lines being my best,
Of her great wisdom can no whit be blamed.

And therefore, first I here present my dream,
And next, invite her honour to my feast, [7]
For my clear reason sees her by that stream,
Where her rare virtues daily are increased.

So craving pardon for this bold attempt,
I here present my mirror to her view, [8]
Whose noble virtues cannot be exempt,
My glass being steel, declares them to be true. [9]

And madam, if you will vouchsafe that grace,
To grace those flowers that springs from virtue's ground;
Though your fair mind on worthier works is placed,
On works that are more deep, and more profound;

Yet is it no disparagement to you,
To see your Saviour in a shepherd's weed, [10]
Unworthily presented in your view,
Whose worthiness will grace each line you read.

Receive him here by my unworthy hand,
And read his paths of fair humility;
Who though our sins in number pass the sand,
They all are purged by his divinity.

To the Virtuous Reader

Often have I heard, that it is the property of some women, not only to emulate the virtues and perfections of the rest, but also by all their powers of ill speaking, to eclipse the brightness of their deserved fame:[1] now contrary to this custom, which men I hope unjustly lay to their charge, I have written this small volume, or little book, for the general use of all virtuous ladies and gentlewomen of this kingdom; and in commendation of some particular persons of our own sex, such as for the most part, are so well known to myself, and others, that I dare undertake fame dares not to call any better. And this have I done, to make known to the world, that all women deserve not to be blamed though some forgetting they are women themselves, and in danger to be condemned by the words of their own mouths, fall into so great an error, as to speak unadvisedly against the rest of their sex; which if it be true, I am persuaded they can show their own imperfection in nothing more: and therefore could wish (for their own ease, modesties, and credit) they would refer such points of folly, to be practised by evil-disposed men, who forgetting they were born of women, nourished of women, and that if it were not by the means of women, they would be quite extinguished out of the world, and a final end of them all, do like vipers deface the wombs wherein they were bred, only to give way and utterance to their want of discretion and goodness. Such as these, were they that dishonoured Christ, his apostles and prophets, putting them to shameful deaths. Therefore we are not to regard any imputations, that they undeservedly lay upon us, no otherwise than to make use of them to our own benefits, as spurs to virtue, making us fly all occasions that may colour their unjust speeches to pass current.[2] Especially considering that they have tempted even the patience of God himself, who gave power to wise and virtuous women, to bring down their pride and arrogancy. As was cruel Cesarus by the discreet counsel of noble Deborah, judge and prophetess of Israel: and resolution of Jael, wife of Heber the Kenite: wicked Haman, by the divine prayers and prudent proceedings of beautiful Esther: blasphemous Holofernes, by the invincible courage, rare wisdom, and confident carriage of Judith: and the unjust judges, by the innocency of chaste Susanna:[3] with infinite others, which for brevity sake I will omit. As also in respect it pleased our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, without the assistance of man, being free from original and all other sins, from the time of his conception, till the hour of his death, to be begotten of a woman, born of a woman, nourished of a woman, obedient to a woman; and that he healed woman, pardoned women, comforted women: yea, even when he was in his greatest agony and bloody sweat, going to be crucified, and also in the last hour of his death, took care to dispose of a woman: after his resurrection, appeared first to a woman, sent a woman to declare his most glorious resurrection to the rest of his disciples.[1] Many other examples I could allege of divers faithful and virtuous women, who have in all ages, not only been confessors, but also endured most cruel martyrdom for their faith in Jesus Christ. All which is sufficient to enforce all good Christians and honourable minded men to speak reverently of our sex, and especially of all virtuous and good women. To the modest censures of both which, I refer these my imperfect endeavours, knowing that according to their own excellent dispositions, they will rather, cherish, nourish, and increase the least spark of virtue where they find it, by their favourable and best interpretations, than quench it by wrong constructions. To whom I wish all increase of virtue, and desire their best opinions.

[2] pass current pass for authentic currency.

[3] cruel Cesarus…Susanna Deborah called the warriors led by Barak to attack the Canaanite general Cesarus ("Sisera"). Jael lured Sisera into her quarters after the Canaanite defeat and hammered a tent peg through his skull (Judges 4:12–31); Esther, queen consort to King Ahasuerus, persuaded her husband to save the Israelites from the genocide planned by Haman (Esther 5–7); Judith entered the camp of her Assyrian enemies and beheaded Holofernes, their leader, ensuring an Israelite military victory (Judith 8–13). Susanna rejected the advances of two elders who subsequently falsely accused her of adultery. Daniel exposed their false testimony and saved Susanna from stoning (the apocryphal Daniel 13).

Salve Deus Rex Judæorum [2]

Sith Cynthia is ascended to that rest
Of endless joy and true eternity, [3]
That glorious place that cannot be expressed
By any wight clad in mortality, [4]
In her almighty love so highly blest,
And crowned with everlasting sov'reignty;
    Where saints and angels do attend her throne,
    And she gives glory unto God alone.

To thee great Countess now I will apply
My pen, to write thy never dying fame; [5]
That when to heav'n thy blessed soul shall fly,
These lines on earth record thy reverend name:
And to this task I mean my Muse to tie,
Though wanting skill I shall but purchase blame:
    Pardon (dear lady) want of woman's wit
    To pen thy praise, when few can equal it.

And pardon (madam) though I do not write
Those praiseful lines of that delightful place,
As you commanded me in that fair night,
When shining Phoebe gave so great a grace,
Presenting paradise to your sweet sight,
Unfolding all the beauty of her face
    With pleasant groves, hills, walks and stately trees,
    Which pleasures with retired minds agrees.

Whose eagle's eyes behold the glorious sun
Of th'all-creating providence, reflecting
His blessed beams on all by him, begun;
Increasing, strengthening, guiding and directing
All worldly creatures their due course to run,
Unto his powerful pleasure all subjecting:
    And thou (dear lady) by his special grace,
    In these his creatures dost behold his face.

Whose all-reviving beauty, yields such joys
To thy sad soul, plunged in waves of woe,
That worldly pleasures seemed to thee as toys,
Only thou seek'st eternity to know,
Respecting not the infinite annoys
That Satan to thy well-staid mind can show;
    Ne can he quench in thee, the spirit of grace, [6]
    Nor draw thee from beholding heaven's bright face.

Thy mind so perfect by thy Maker framed
No vain delights can harbour in thy heart,
With his sweet love, thou art so much inflamed,
As of the world thou seem'st to have no part;

[1] to be begotten…his disciples For a detailed account of Jesus's interaction with women see Margaret Fell's Women's Speaking Justified (1667) included in this volume.

[2] Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum "Hail God, King of the Jews."

[3] Cynthia Queen Elizabeth I, styled the goddess of the moon.

[4] wight person (OED wight 2).

[5] Countess "The Lady Margaret, Countess Dowager of Cumberland" (original marginalia).

[6] Ne neither (OED ne conj^{1} B.1).

So, love him still, thou need'st not be ashamed,
Tis he that made thee, what thou wert, and art:
Tis he that dries all tears from orphans' eyes,
And hears from heav'n the woeful widows' cries.

Tis he that doth behold thy inward cares,
And will regard the sorrows of thy soul;
Tis he that guides thy feet from Satan's snares,
And in his wisdom, doth thy ways control:
He through afflictions, still thy mind prepares,
And all thy glorious trials will enrol:
That when dark days of terror shall appear,
Thou as the sun shalt shine; or much more clear.

The heav'ns shall perish as a garment old, [1]
Or as a vesture by the Maker changed, [2]
And shall depart, as when a scroll is rolled;
Yet thou from him shalt never be estranged,
When he shall come in glory, that was sold
For all our sins; we happily are changed,
Who for our faults put on his righteousness,
Although full oft his laws we do transgress.

Long may'st thou joy in this almighty love,
Long may thy soul be pleasing in his sight,
Long may'st thou have true comforts from above,
Long may'st thou set on him thy whole delight,
And patiently endure when he doth prove,
Knowing that he will surely do thee right:
Thy patience, faith, long suffering, and thy love,
He will reward with comforts from above.

With majesty and honour is he clad,
And decked with light, as with a garment fair;
He joys the meek, and makes the mighty sad,
Pulls down the proud, and doth the humble rear: [3]
Who sees this Bridegroom, never can be sad;
None lives that can his wondrous works declare:
Yea, look how far the east is from the west,
So far he sets our sins that have transgressed. [4]

He rides upon the wings of all the winds,
And spreads the heav'ns with his all powerful hand;
Oh! who can loose when the Almighty binds?
Or in his angry presence dares to stand?
He searcheth out the secrets of all minds;
All those that fear him, shall possess the land:
He is exceeding glorious to behold,
Ancient of times; so fair, and yet so old.

He of the wat'ry clouds his chariot frames,
And makes his blessed angels powerful spirits,
His ministers are fearful fiery flames,
Rewarding all according to their merits;
The righteous for an heritage he claims,
And registers the wrongs of humble spirits:
Hills melt like wax, in presence of the Lord,
So do all sinners, in his sight abhorred.

He in the waters lays his chamber beams,
And clouds of darkness compass him about,
Consuming fire shall go before in streams,
And burn up all his en'mies round about:
Yet on these judgements worldlings never dreams,
Nor of these dangers never stand in doubt:
While he shall rest within his holy hill,
That lives and dies according to his will.

But woe to them that double-hearted be,
Who with their tongues the righteous souls do slay;

[1] ll.57–144 In this passage, we find echoes of: Psalms 11:6–7; 12:2–3; 15:1; 44:21; 55:6; 64:3; 102:26; 103:11–12; 104:1–4; 113:7; 140:3, as well as Deuteronomy 9:3, II Kings 21:14, Nahum 1:5 and Revelation 6:14.

[2] vesture garment (OED vesture sb I.1).

[3] rear raise (OED rear *v*¹ III.11).

[4] transgressed offended (OED transgress v 1).

Bending their bows to shoot at all they see,
With upright hearts their Maker to obey;
And secretly do let their arrows flee,
To wound true hearted people any way:
The Lord will root them out that speak proud things,
Deceitful tongues are but false slander's wings.

Froward are the ungodly from their birth,
No sooner born, but they do go astray; [1]
The Lord will root them out from off the earth,
And give them to their en'mies for a prey,
As venomous as serpents is their breath,
With poisoned lies to hurt in what they may
The innocent: who as a dove shall fly
Unto the Lord, that he his cause may try.

The righteous Lord doth righteousness allow,
His countenance will behold the thing that's just;
Unto the mean he makes the mighty bow,
And raiseth up the poor out of the dust: [2]
Yet makes no count to us, nor when, nor how,
But pours his grace on all, that puts their trust
In him: that never will their hopes betray,
Nor lets them perish that for mercy pray.

He shall within his tabernacle dwell,
Whose life is uncorrupt before the Lord,
Who no untruths of innocents doth tell,
Nor wrongs his neighbour, nor in deed, nor word,
Nor in his pride with malice seems to swell,
Nor whets his tongue more sharper than a sword,
To wound the reputation of the just; [3]
Nor seeks to lay their glory in the dust.

That great Jehova, King of heav'n and earth,
Will rain down fire and brimstone from above,
Upon the wicked monsters in their berth
That storm and rage at those whom he doth love:
Snares, storms, and tempests he will rain, and dearth,
Because he will himself almighty prove: [4]
And this shall be their portion they shall drink,
That thinks the Lord is blind when he doth wink.

Pardon (good madam) though I have digressed
From what I do intend to write of thee, [5]
To set his glory forth whom thou lov'st best,
Whose wondrous works no mortal eye can see;
His special care on those whom he hath blest
From wicked worldlings, how he sets them free:
And how such people he doth overthrow
In all their ways, that they his power may know.

The meditation of this monarch's love,
Draws thee from caring what this world can yield;
Of joys and griefs both equal thou dost prove,
They have no force, to force thee from the field:
Thy constant faith like to the turtle dove
Continues combat, and will never yield
To base affliction; or proud pomp's desire,
That sets the weakest minds so much on fire.

Thou from the court to the country art retired,
Leaving the world, before the world leaves thee:
That great enchantress of weak minds admired,
Whose all-bewitching charms so pleasing be
To worldly wantons; and too much desired
Of those that care not for eternity: [6]
But yield themselves as preys to lust and sin,
Losing their hopes of heav'n, hell pains to win.

[5] good madam "To the Countess of Cumberland" (original marginalia).

[6] wantons lascivious and lewd people (OED wanton sb B3).

But thou, the wonder of our wanton age
Leav'st all delights to serve a heav'nly King:
Who is more wise? or who can be more sage,
Than she that doth affection subject bring;
Not forcing for the world, or Satan's rage,
But shrouding under the Almighty's wing;
Spending her years, months, days, minutes, hours,
In doing service to the heav'nly powers.

Thou fair example, live without compare,
With honour's triumphs seated in thy breast;
Pale envy never can thy name impair,
When in thy heart thou harbour'st such a guest:
Malice must live forever in despair;
There's no revenge where virtue still doth rest:
All hearts must needs do homage unto thee,
In whom all eyes such rare perfection see.

. . . .

These high deserts invite my lowly Muse
To write of him, and pardon crave of thee, [1]
For time so spent, I need make no excuse,
Knowing it doth with thy fair mind agree
So well, as thou no labour wilt refuse,
That to thy holy love may pleasing be:
His death and passion I desire to write,
And thee to read, the blessed soul's delight.

But my dear Muse, now whither wouldst thou fly,
Above the pitch of thy appointed strain?
With Icarus thou seekest now to try,
Not waxen wings, but thy poor barren brain,
Which far too weak, these silly lines descry; [2]
Yet cannot this thy forward mind restrain,
But thy poor infant verse must soar aloft,
Not fearing threat'ning dangers, happening oft.

Think when the eye of wisdom shall discover
Thy weakling Muse to fly, that scarce could creep,
And in the air above the clouds to hover,
When better 'twere mewed up, and fast asleep; [3]
They'll think with Phaeton, thou canst ne'er recover,
But helpless with that poor young lad to weep: [4]
The little world of thy weak wit on fire,
Where thou wilt perish in thine own desire.

But yet the weaker thou dost seem to be
In sex, or sense, the more his glory shines, [5]
That doth infuse such powerful grace in thee,
To show thy love in these few humble lines;
The widow's mite, with this may well agree,
Her little all more worth than golden mines,
Being more dearer to our loving Lord,
Than all the wealth that kingdoms could afford. [6]

Therefore I humbly for his grace will pray,
That he will give me power and strength to write,
That what I have begun, so end I may,
As his great glory may appear more bright;
Yea in these lines I may no further stray,
Than his most Holy Spirit shall give me light:
That blindest weakness be not over-bold,
The manner of his passion to unfold.

[6] widow's mite...afford In the parable, though a poor widow placed only two mites (small coins) in the treasury, Jesus tells his disciples that she has given "more" than the rich contributors, because she "did cast in all that she had, even all her living" (Mark 12:41–44).

In other phrases than may well agree
With his pure doctrine, and most holy writ,
That heaven's clear eye, and all the world may see,
I seek his glory, rather than to get
The vulgar's breath, the seed of vanity, [1]
Nor fame's loud trumpet care I to admit;
But rather strive in plainest words to show,
The matter which I seek to undergo. [2]

A matter far beyond my barren skill,
To show with any life this map of death,
This story; that whole worlds with books would fill,
In these few lines, will put me out of breath,
To run so swiftly up this mighty hill,
I may behold it with the eye of faith;
But to present this pure unspotted Lamb, [3]
I must confess, I far unworthy am.

Yet if he please t'illuminate my spirit,
And give me wisdom from his holy hill,
That I may write part of his glorious merit,
If he vouchsafe to guide my hand and quill,
To show his death, by which we do inherit
Those endless joys that all our hearts do fill;
Then will I tell of that sad black faced night,
Whose mourning mantle covered heavenly light.

That very night our Saviour was betrayed, [4]
Oh night! exceeding all the nights of sorrow,
When our most blessed Lord, although dismayed,
Yet would not he one minute's respite borrow,
But to Mount Olives went, though sore afraid,
To welcome night, and entertain the morrow; [5]
And as he oft unto that place did go,
So did he now, to meet his long nursed woe.

. . . .

What could thy innocency now expect,
When all the sins that ever were committed,
Were laid to thee, whom no man could detect? [6]
Yet far thou wert of man from being pitied,
The judge so just could yield thee no respect,
Nor would one jot of penance be remitted;
But greater horror to thy soul must rise,
Than heart can think, or any wit devise.

Now draws the hour of thy affliction near,
And ugly death present himself before thee;
Thou now must leave those friends thou held'st so dear,
Yea those disciples, who did most adore thee;
Yet in thy countenance doth no wrath appear,
Although betrayed to those that did abhor thee:
Thou did'st vouchsafe to visit them again,
Who had no apprehension of thy pain. [7]

Their eyes were heavy, and their hearts asleep,
Nor knew they well what answer then to make thee;
Yet thou as Watchman, had'st a care to keep
Those few from sin, that shortly would forsake thee;
But now thou bidst them henceforth rest and sleep,
Thy hour is come, and they at hand to take thee:

[3] unspotted lamb Referred to as the Lamb of God throughout the New Testament, Jesus is symbolically associated with the sacrificial lamb of the Old Testament (e.g. John 1:29–30; I Peter 1:19; Revelation 5:6).

[4] That very night...was betrayed "Here begins the Passion of Christ" (original marginalia).

[5] But to...morrow On the Mount of Olives, Jesus prayed that he might escape his role as sacrificial lamb, but he resolved to do as God wished: "And he went a little farther, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt" (Matthew 26:39).

[6] detect expose (as guilty of sin) (OED detect v 2a).

[7] vouchsafe show a gracious readiness (OED vouchsafe v II.6).

The Son of God to sinners made a prey,
Oh hateful hour! oh blest! oh cursed day!

Lo here thy great humility was found,
Being King of heaven, and Monarch of the earth,
Yet well content to have thy glory drowned,
By being counted of so mean a birth;
Grace, love, and mercy did so much abound,
Thou entertainedst the cross, even to the death: [1]
And nam'dst thyself, the Son of Man to be,
To purge our pride by thy humility.

But now thy friends whom thou didst call to go,
Heavy spectators of thy hapless case,
See thy betrayer, whom too well they know,
One of the twelve, now object of disgrace,
A trothless traitor, and a mortal foe, [2]
With feigned kindness seeks thee to embrace;
And gives a kiss, whereby he may deceive thee,
That in the hands of sinners he might leave thee. [3]

Now muster forth with swords, with staves, with bills,
High priests and scribes, and elders of the land,
Seeking by force to have their wicked wills,
Which thou didst never purpose to withstand; [4]
Now thou mak'st haste unto the worst of ills,
And who they seek, thou gently dost demand;
This didst thou Lord, t'amaze these fools the more,
T'inquire of that, thou knew'st so well before.

When lo these monsters did not shame to tell,
His name they sought, and found, yet could not know
Jesus of Nazareth, at whose feet they fell,
When heavenly wisdom did descend so low
To speak to them: they knew they did not well,
Their great amazement made them backward go:
Nay, though he said unto them, I am he,
They could not know him, whom their eyes did see. [5]

How blind were they could not discern the light!
How dull! if not to understand the truth,
How weak! if meekness overcame their might;
How stony hearted, if not moved to ruth: [6]
How void of pity, and how full of spite,
'Gainst him that was the lord of light and truth:
Here insolent boldness checked by love and grace,
Retires, and falls before our Maker's face.

For when he spake to this accursed crew,
And mildly made them know that it was he:
Presents himself, that they might take a view;
And what they doubted they might clearly see;
Nay more, to reassure that it was true,
He said: "I say unto you, I am he."
If him they sought, he's willing to obey,
Only desires the rest might go their way.

Thus with a heart prepared to endure
The greatest wrongs impiety could devise,
He was content to stoop unto their lure,
Although his greatness might do otherwise:

[6] ruth pity (OED ruth 1).

Here grace was seizèd on with hands impure,
And virtue now must be suppressed by vice.
Pure innocency made a prey to sin,
Thus did his torments and our joys begin.

Here fair obedience shined in his breast,
And did suppress all fear of future pain;
Love was his leader unto this unrest,
Whil'st righteousness doth carry up his train;
Mercy made way to make us highly blest,
When patience beat down sorrow, fear and pain:
Justice sat looking with an angry brow,
On blessed misery appearing now.

More glorious than all the conquerors
That ever lived within this earthly round,
More powerful than all kings, or governors
That ever yet within this world were found;
More valiant than the greatest soldiers
That ever fought, to have their glory crowned:
For which of them, that ever yet took breath,
Sought t'endure the doom of heaven and earth? [1]

. . . .

Now Pontius Pilate is to judge the cause
Of faultless Jesus, who before him stands; [2]
Who neither hath offended prince, nor laws,
Although he now be brought in woeful bands:
O noble governor, make thou yet a pause,
Do not in innocent blood imbrue thy hands;
But hear the words of thy most worthy wife,
Who sends to thee, to beg her Saviour's life. [3]

Let barb'rous cruelty far depart from thee,
And in true justice take affliction's part;
Open thine eyes, that thou the truth may'st see,
Do not the thing that goes against thy heart,
Condemn not him that must thy Saviour be;
But view his holy life, his good desert.
Let not us women glory in men's fall,
Who had power given to over-rule us all.

Till now your indiscretion sets us free,
And makes our former fault much less appear; [4]
Our mother Eve, who tasted of the tree,
Giving to Adam what she held most dear,
Was simply good, and had no power to see,
The after-coming harm did not appear:
The subtle serpent that our sex betrayed,
Before our fall so sure a plot had laid. [5]

That undiscerning ignorance perceived
No guile, or craft that was by him intended;
For had she known, of what we were bereaved,
To his request she had not condescended.
But she (poor soul) by cunning was deceived,
No hurt therein her harmless heart intended:
For she alleged God's word, which he denies,
That they should die, but even as gods, be wise.

But surely Adam cannot be excused,
Her fault though great, yet he was most to blame;
What weakness offered, strength might have refused,
Being lord of all, the greater was his shame:
Although the serpent's craft had her abused,
God's holy word ought all his actions frame,

[1] doom last judgement (OED doom sb 2).

[2] Pontius Pilate fifth Roman governor of Judea, Samaria, and Idumaea, who ruled 26–36 C.E. According to Jewish historians, he demonstrated anti-Jewish prejudice and brutality; cause case.

[3] But hear…worthy wife "When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him" (Matthew 27:19).

[4] Til now…us free "Eve's apology" (original marginalia); our former fault Eve's disobedience to God in eating the fruit from the tree of knowledge of good and evil and in giving that fruit to Adam (Genesis 3).

[5] subtle cunning (OED subtle a 10).

For he was lord and king of all the earth,
Before poor Eve had either life or breath.[1]

Who being framed by God's eternal hand,
The perfect'st man that ever breathed on earth;
And from God's mouth received that strait command,
The breach whereof he knew was present death:
Yea having power to rule both sea and land,
Yet with one apple won to lose that breath
Which God had breathed in his beauteous face,
Bringing us all in danger and disgrace.

And then to lay the fault on Patience' back,
That we (poor women) must endure it all;
We know right well he did discretion lack,
Being not persuaded thereunto at all;
If Eve did err, it was for knowledge sake,
The fruit being fair persuaded him to fall:
No subtle Serpent's falsehood did betray him,
If he would eat it, who had power to stay him?[2]

Not Eve, whose fault was only too much love,
Which made her give this present to her dear,
That what she tasted, he likewise might prove,[3]
Whereby his knowledge might become more clear;
He never sought her weakness to reprove,
With those sharp words, which he of God did hear:
Yet men will boast of knowledge, which he took
From Eve's fair hand, as from a learned book.

If any evil did in her remain,
Being made of him, he was the ground of all;
If one of many worlds could lay a stain
Upon our sex, and work so great a fall
To wretched man, by Satan's subtle train;[4]
What will so foul a fault amongst you all?
Her weakness did the serpent's words obey;
But you in malice God's dear son betray.

Whom, if unjustly you condemn to die,
Her sin was small, to what you do commit;
All mortal sins that do for vengeance cry,
Are not to be compared unto it:
If many worlds would altogether try,
By all their sins the wrath of God to get;
This sin of yours, surmounts them all as far
As doth the sun, another little star.

Then let us have our liberty again,
And challenge to yourselves no sov'reignty;[5]
You came not in the world without our pain,
Make that a bar against your cruelty;
Your fault being greater, why should you disdain
Our being your equals, free from tyranny?
If one weak woman simply did offend,
This sin of yours, hath no excuse, nor end.

To which (poor souls) we never gave consent,
Witness thy wife (O Pilate) speaks for all;
Who did but dream, and yet a message sent,
That thou should'st have nothing to do at all
With that just man; which, if thy heart relent,
Why wilt thou be a reprobate with Saul?[6]
To seek the death of him that is so good,
For thy soul's health to shed his dearest blood.

[1] For he was…or breath Genesis 2:7–23.

[2] stay him stop him (OED stay v^{1} I.2a).

[3] prove test (OED prove v B.I.1a).

[4] train treachery (OED train sb^{2} 1).

[5] challenge to claim for (OED challenge v 6b).

[6] Saul the first Israelite king who conspired to kill his successor, David, a "man after God's own heart" (I Samuel 22–23); or Saul, renamed Paul after his conversion, who, in killing Christians, persecuted Christ (Acts 9:4–5;22:4–8).

And now this long expected hour draws near,
When blessed saints with angels do condole; [1]
His holy march, soft pace, and heavy cheer,
In humble sort to yield his glorious soul,
By his deserts the foulest sins to clear;
And in th'eternal book of heaven to enrol
A satisfaction till the general doom, [2]
Of all sins past, and all that are to come.

They that had seen this pitiful procession,
From Pilate's palace to Mount Calvary, [3]
Might think he answered for some great transgression,
Being in such odious sort condemned to die;
He plainly showed that his own profession
Was virtue, patience, grace, love, piety:
And how by suffering he could conquer more
Than all the kings that ever lived before.

First went the crier with open mouth proclaiming
The heavy sentence of iniquity,
The hangman next, by his base office claiming
His right in hell, where sinners never die,
Carrying the nails, the people still blaspheming
Their maker, using all impiety;
The thieves attending him on either side,
The serjeants watching, while the women cried. [4]

Thrice happy women that obtained such grace
From him whose worth the world could not contain;
Immediately to turn about his face,
As not rememb'ring his great grief and pain,
To comfort you, whose tears poured forth apace
On Flora's banks, like showers of April's rain:
Your cries enforced mercy, grace, and love
From him, whom greatest princes could not move:

To speak one word, nor once to lift his eyes
Unto proud Pilate, no nor Herod, king;
By all the questions that they could devise,
Could make him answer to no manner of thing; [5]
Yet these poor women, by their piteous cries
Did move their Lord, their Lover, and their King,
To take compassion, turn about, and speak
To them whose hearts were ready now to break. [6]

Most blessed daughters of Jerusalem,
Who found such favour in your Saviour's sight,
To turn his face when you did pity him;
Your tearful eyes, beheld his eyes more bright;
Your faith and love unto such grace did climb,
To have reflection from this heav'nly light:
Your eagles' eyes did gaze against this sun,
Your hearts did think, he dead, the world were done.

When spiteful men with torments did oppress
Th'afflicted body of this innocent dove,
Poor women seeing how much they did transgress,
By tears, by sighs, by cries entreat, may prove,
What may be done among the thickest press,
They labour still these tyrants' hearts to move;
In pity and compassion to forbear
Their whipping, spurning, tearing of his hair.

But all in vain, their malice hath no end,
Their hearts more hard than flint, or marble stone;

[3] Mount Calvary the site of Jesus's crucifixion.

And he answered him to never a word; insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly" (Matthew 27:12–14).

[6] ll. 981–1000 In Luke 23:27–31, Jesus addresses the daughters of Jerusalem and foretells monumental disasters.

Now to his grief, his greatness they attend,
When he (God knows) had rather be alone;
They are his guard, yet seek all means to offend:
Well may he grieve, well may he sigh and groan,
  Under the burden of a heavy cross,
  He faintly goes to make their gain his loss.

The Description of Cooke-ham[1]

Farewell (sweet Cooke-ham) where I first obtained
Grace from that grace where perfect grace remained;[2]
And where the Muses gave their full consent,
I should have power the virtuous to content:
Where princely palace willed me to indite,
The sacred story of the soul's delight.[3]
Farewell (sweet place) where virtue then did rest,
And all delights did harbour in her breast:
Never shall my sad eyes again behold
Those pleasures which my thoughts did then unfold:
Yet you (great lady) mistress of that place,
From whose desires did spring this work of grace;[4]
Vouchsafe to think upon those pleasures past,
As fleeting worldly joys that could not last:
Or, as dim shadows of celestial pleasures,
Which are desired above all earthly treasures.
Oh how (methought) against you thither came,
Each part did seem some new delight to frame!
The house received all ornaments to grace it,
And would endure no foulness to deface it.
The walks put on their summer liveries,
And all things else did hold like similes:
The trees with leaves, with fruits, with flowers clad,
Embraced each other, seeming to be glad,
Turning themselves to beauteous canopies,
To shade the bright sun from your brighter eyes:
The crystal streams with silver spangles graced,
While by the glorious sun they were embraced:
The little birds in chirping notes did sing,
To entertain both you and that sweet spring.
And Philomela with her sundry lays,[5]
Both you and that delightful place did praise.
Oh how methought each plant, each flower, each tree
Set forth their beauties then to welcome thee:
The very hills right humbly did descend,
When you to tread upon them did intend.
And as you set your feet, they still did rise,
Glad that they could receive so rich a prize.
The gentle winds did take delight to be
Among those woods that were so graced by thee.
And in sad murmur uttered pleasing sound,
That pleasure in that place might more abound:
The swelling banks delivered all their pride,
When such a Phoenix once they had espied.[6]
Each arbor, bank, each seat, each stately tree,
Thought themselves honoured in supporting thee.
The pretty birds would oft come to attend thee,
Yet fly away for fear they should offend thee:
The little creatures in the burrow by
Would come abroad to sport them in your eye;

[1] The Description of Cooke-ham Written in honour of Margaret Clifford, Countess Dowager of Cumberland, this poem describes the crown manor of Cookeham leased by the Countess's brother, Lord William Russell of Thornhaugh.

[2] Grace from…grace remained Lanyer's pun on "grace" reflects multiple denotations of the word: (1) favourable qualities; (2) the condition of being favoured; (3) the source of divine grace or its recipient; (4) a courtesy title given to those who hold particular titles (OED grace sb I.1; II.7; 11a,d; 16b).

[3] indite compose (OED indite v 3).

[4] this work of grace this poem.

[5] Philomela the nightingale.

[6] Phoenix A mythical bird that lives five or six hundred years; it then burns itself on a funeral pyre of twigs only to emerge from its ashes with renewed youth. The point of the reference here is the uniqueness of the Phoenix.

Yet fearful of the bow in your fair hand,
Would run away when you did make a stand.
Now let me come unto that stately tree,
Wherein such goodly prospects you did see;
That oak that did in height his fellows pass,
As much as lofty trees, low growing grass:
Much like a comely cedar straight and tall,
Whose beauteous stature far exceeded all:
How often did you visit this fair tree,
Which seeming joyful in receiving thee,
Would like a palm tree spread his arms abroad,
Desirous that you there should make abode:
Whose fair green leaves much like a comely veil,
Defended Phoebus when he would assail: [1]
Whose pleasing boughs did yield a cool fresh air,
Joying his happiness when you were there.
Where being seated, you might plainly see,
Hills, vales, and woods, as if on bended knee
They had appeared, your honour to salute,
Or to prefer some strange unlooked for suit: [2]
All interlaced with brooks and crystal springs,
A prospect fit to please the eyes of kings:
And thirteen shires appeared all in your sight,
Europe could not afford much more delight.
What was there then but gave you all content,
While you the time in meditation spent,
Of their Creator's power, which there you saw,
In all his creatures held a perfect law;
And in their beauties did you plain descry,
His beauty, wisdom, grace, love, majesty.
In these sweet woods how often did you walk,
With Christ and his Apostles there to talk;
Placing his holy writ in some fair tree,
To meditate what you therein did see:
With Moses you did mount his holy hill,
To know his pleasure, and perform his will. [3]
With lovely David you did often sing,
His holy hymns to heaven's eternal King. [4]
And in sweet music did your soul delight,
To sound his praises, morning, noon, and night.
With blessed Joseph you did often feed
Your pined brethren, when they stood in need. [5]
And that sweet lady sprung from Clifford's race,
Of noble Bedford's blood, fair stream of grace;
To honourable Dorset now espoused,
In whose fair breast true virtue then was housed: [6]
Oh what delight did my weak spirits find
In those pure parts of her well framed mind:
And yet it grieves me that I cannot be
Near unto her, whose virtues did agree
With those fair ornaments of outward beauty,
Which did enforce from all both love and duty.
Unconstant fortune, thou art most to blame,
Who casts us down into so low a frame:
Where our great friends we cannot daily see,
So great a difference is there in degree. [7]
Many are placed in those orbs of state,
Parters in honour, so ordained by fate; [8]
Nearer in show, yet farther off in love,
In which, the lowest always are above.
But whither am I carried in conceit?
My wit too weak to conster of the great. [9]
Why not? although we are but born of earth,
We may behold the heavens, despising death;

She is "of noble Bedford's blood" because her mother was the daughter of Francis Russell, third Earl of Bedford. On Feb. 25, 1609, Lady Anne married Richard Sackville, third Earl of Dorset.

[9] to conster of to expound on (OED construe v 8,6)

And loving heaven that is so far above,
May in the end vouchsafe us entire love.
Therefore sweet memory do thou retain
Those pleasures past, which will not turn again:
Remember beauteous Dorset's former sports, [1]
So far from being touched by ill reports;
Wherein myself did always bear a part,
While reverend love presented my true heart:
Those recreations let me bear in mind,
Which her sweet youth and noble thoughts did find:
Whereof deprived, I evermore must grieve,
Hating blind fortune, careless to relieve.
And you sweet Cooke-ham, whom these ladies leave,
I now must tell the grief you did conceive
At their departure; when they went away,
How everything retained a sad dismay:
Nay long before, when once an inkling came,
Methought each thing did unto sorrow frame:
The trees that were so glorious in our view,
Forsook both flowers and fruit, when once they knew
Of your depart, their very leaves did wither,
Changing their colours as they grew together.
But when they saw this had no power to stay you,
They often wept, though speechless, could not pray you;
Letting their tears in your fair bosoms fall,
As if they said, "Why will ye leave us all?"
This being vain, they cast their leaves away,
Hoping that pity would have made you stay:
Their frozen tops like Age's hoary hairs,
Shows their disasters, languishing in fears:
A swarthy rivelled ryne all overspread,
Their dying bodies half alive, half dead. [2]
But your occasions called you so away,
That nothing there had power to make you stay:
Yet did I see a noble grateful mind,
Requiting each according to their kind, [3]
Forgetting not to turn and take your leave
Of these sad creatures, powerless to receive
Your favour when with grief you did depart,
Placing their former pleasures in your heart;
Giving great charge to noble memory,
There to preserve their love continually:
But specially the love of that fair tree,
That first and last you did vouchsafe to see:
In which it pleased you oft to take the air,
With noble Dorset, then a virgin fair:
Where many a learned book was read and scanned
To this fair tree, taking me by the hand,
You did repeat the pleasures which had past,
Seeming to grieve they could no longer last.
And with a chaste, yet loving kiss took leave,
Of which sweet kiss I did it soon bereave:
Scorning a senseless creature should possess
So rare a favour, so great happiness.
No other kiss it could receive from me,
For fear to give back what it took of thee:
So I ungrateful creature did deceive it,
Of that which you vouchsafed in love to leave it.
And though it oft had giv'n me much content,
Yet this great wrong I never could repent:
But of the happiest made it most forlorn,
To show that nothing's free from fortune's scorn,
While all the rest with this most beauteous tree,
Made their sad consort sorrow's harmony.
The flowers that on the banks and walks did grow,
Crept in the ground, the grass did weep for woe.
The winds and waters seemed to chide together,
Because you went away they know not whither:
And those sweet brooks that ran so fair and clear,
With grief and trouble wrinkled did appear.
Those pretty birds that wonted were to sing,
Now neither sing, nor chirp, nor use their wing;
But with their tender feet on some bare spray,

[2] rivelled ryne wrinkled or shrivelled bark (OED rivelled a 1c,2; rind).

[3] Requiting rewarding (OED requite v 1).

Warble forth sorrow, and their own dismay.
Faire Philomela leaves her mournful ditty,
Drowned in dead sleep, yet can procure no pity:
Each arbour, bank, each seat, each stately tree,
Looks bare and desolate now for want of thee; [1]
Turning green tresses into frosty grey,
While in cold grief they wither all away.
The sun grew weak, his beams no comfort gave,
While all green things did make the earth their grave:
Each brier, each bramble, when you went away,
Caught fast your clothes, thinking to make you stay:
Delightful Echo wonted to reply
To our last words, did now for sorrow die: [2]
The house cast off each garment that might grace it,
Putting on dust and cobwebs to deface it.
All desolation then there did appear,
When you were going whom they held so dear.
This last farewell to Cooke-ham here I give,
When I am dead thy name in this may live,
Wherein I have performed her noble hest,
Whose virtues lodge in my unworthy breast,
And ever shall, so long as life remains,
Tying my heart to her by those rich chains.

Lady Margaret Hoby

1571 – 1633

Lady Margaret Hoby was the only child of Arthur Dakins, gentleman and Justice of the Peace of Linton in the East Riding of Yorkshire, and his wife Tomasine Gye. As a child, she was educated in the Puritan household of Henry Hastings, third Earl of Huntingdon, where she learned the habits of daily self-examination recorded so often in her Diary. As the heir of Arthur Dakins, a substantial land owner, Margaret was much in demand on the marriage market. Her first two marriages were brief. In 1588, she married Walter, the younger son of Walter Devereux, first Earl of Essex. The manor and parsonage of Hackness were provided for the couple and given to Margaret when her first husband died in 1591 at the siege of Rouen. As her father and Walter Devereux did not pay their entire portion of the purchase price of Hackness, lengthy litigation ensued, but Margaret eventually retained possession of the estate. In 1591, a year before her father's death, Margaret married Thomas Sidney, Sir Philip Sidney's brother. Thomas died four years later. Margaret was only twenty-five years old when she married her third husband Thomas Posthumous Hoby, who had wooed her unsuccessfully in 1591. Margaret had no children from any of her marriages. The Diary of Lady Hoby records her activities from 1599 to 1605. She is the earliest known Englishwomen to write such a diary. We read little of the emotion or sentiment commonly associated with the genre. Margaret Hoby is more concerned to record her daily religious observances, the medical, social and religious duties involved in running a country estate, and the occasional account of significant people and events of her day. She refused to settle her property on her husband and his heirs until one year before her death. She was buried in the chancel of Hackness Church.

The Diary of Lady Margaret Hoby 1599–1605

(excerpts) [1]

1599

[Friday August 17]

After private prayers I went about the house and read of the bible and wrought till dinner time:[2] and after dinner it pleased for a just punishment to correct my sins to send me feebleness of stomach and pain of my head that kept me upon my bed til 5 o'clock: at which time I arose, having release of my sickness, according to the wonted kindness of the Lord who after he had let me see how I had offended, that so I might take better heed to my body and soul hereafter, with a gentle correction let me feel he was reconciled to me: at which time I went to private prayer and praises, examination, and so to work till supper time:[3] which done I heard the Lecture and after I had walked an hour with Mr. Hoby I went to bed.[4]

[1] The extracts from this Diary were chosen and modernized by Holly Nelson, using Dorothy M. Meads' edition, before the 1998 edition of Joanna Moody was available. Alan Rudrum, seeing that neither edition was wholly accurate, subsequently checked the selections against the British Library manuscript (Egerton MS 2614). He corrected some errors, restored some of the diarist's capitals (to give a hint of the flavour of the manuscript), and lightened the punctuation. The reader should imagine a manuscript chaotic in spelling and scarcely punctuated at all. In most cases, dates have been standardized for convenience and do not represent the diarist's own notations.

[2] wrought worked at needlework, or more generally performed tasks (OED work B.I.5a).

[3] examination that is, she examined or tested herself according to the Christian standard or rule (OED examine v 2a).

[4] Lecture either the reading of a passage aloud or a brief exhortation.

[Monday September 10]
After private prayers I went about the house, an[d] then ate my breakfast: then I walked to the church with Mr. Hoby: after that I wrought a little and neglected my custom of prayer for which as for many other sins it pleased the Lord to punish me with an inward assault: But I know the Lord hath pardoned it because he is true of his promise, and if I had not taken this course of examination I think I had forgotten it: after dinner I walked with Mr. Hoby and after he was gone I went to get tithe apples[1]: After I came home, I prayed with Mr. Rhodes,[2] and after that privately by myself and took examination of myself: and so after I had walked a while I went to supper, after that to the Lecture and so to bed.

[The Lord's day September 16]
After I had prayed privately I went to church and from thence returning I praised God both for the enabling the minister so profitably to declare the word as he had, and my self to hear with that Comfort and understanding I did: after dinner I walked with Mr. Hoby till Catechizing was done and then I went to church[3]: after the sermon I looked upon a poor man's Leg and after that I walked and read a sermon of Gifford upon the Song of Solomon:[4] then I examined myself and prayed: after supper I was busy with Mr. Hoby till prayer time after which I went to bed.

[Monday September 17]
After private prayer I saw a man's Leg dressed, took order for things in the house and wrought till dinner time: after dinner I went about the house, and read of the herbal:[5] then I took my Coach and came to Linton, where after I had talked a while with my mother examined myself and prayed I went to supper and then prayed publicly and so to bed.

[Thursday December 20]
After private prayers, I did eat my breakfast then I writ in my sermon book: after I prayed then I dined, and almost I writ in my bible all the afternoon: then I dispatched some business in the house and then prayed and examined myself: then I went about the house and in talk with Mr. Rhodes I understood thus much, that, whereas graces are of 2 sorts some general belonging to every Christian others special as continency and [[6]] for the better prevailing against a temptation, it is not sufficient only to have faith, whereby I know that I shall neither yield unto it, nor be overcome by it:[7] but I must likewise pray especially for that virtue which is opposed to that vice where unto I am then tempted, because, though faith be the Fundamental Cause of overcoming sin, yet the several graces of God work operatively: after, I supped, then I heard the Lecture, and then prayed, and so went to bed.

[1] tithe apples A tenth part of the produce of agriculture was a due or payment for the support of the church or clergy (OED tithe sb¹ B 1).

[2] Mr. Rhodes Lady Hoby's chaplain.

[3] catechizing the oral instruction by which the elements of religion are taught (OED catechizing vbl sb a).

[4] looked upon a poor man's leg The lady of the manor often knew more of surgery and medicine than other members of the village as no doctor was generally available in the country; sermon of Gifford Master George Gifford published Sermons upon the Songe of Salomon in 1598. Gifford was a Puritan divine who had refused to subscribe to the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Established Church and was deprived of his living as a result.

[5] herbal possibly an allusion to the New Herball of the reformer William Turner who indulged in botany. His Herball, first published in 1551, is considered to mark the onset of the study of botany in England. Alternatively, it may be an allusion to John Gerard's Herbal or General History of Plants (1597).

[6] This word is illegible. Dorothy M. Meads thought it might be "pretching" (i.e. preaching), but the final letters appear to be "ie" and the word intended probably refers to an inner quality, analogous to "constancy," dear to Puritan moral theology.

[7] where as graces are of two sorts.... others special General or common grace is so named because its benefits are experienced by the whole human race. Special grace is the grace by which God redeems, sanctifies and glorifies particular individuals, those elected to have eternal life.

[The 5 day of the week February 1]
After I was ready I went about the house and then prayed brake my fast, dressed a poor boy's leg that was hurt, and Jurden's hand:[1] after took a lecture, read of the bible, prayed and so went to dinner: after, I went down a while, then wrought till 4 o'clock and took order for supper, and then talked a while with Mr. Hoby and after went to private prayer and meditation: after to supper then to public prayers and lastly to bed.

[The 4 day after the Lord's Day, April 10]
After private prayers I went to the minister where I heard Mr. Smith defend the truth against the papist: The question being whether the regenerate do sin: after I came home I went to dinner: I went to the church where I heard Mr. Stuart handle this question between the papists and us—whether we were Justified by faith or work:[2] after I came to my lodging and after I had prayed I went and talked with my cousin Bouser: then I went to Mr. Doctor Benets and after supper I prayed publicly with Mr. Rhodes, and so went to bed.

[July 15]
After I was ready and had prayed I went about the house and did eat: after I heard news of the Death of my Sister Elizabeth Russell:[3] after I prayed then dined; and after I talked with a cousin of mine and after a Goldsmith: then I heard Mr. Rhodes read, and so I went to private examination and prayer: after I went to supper and after I went to the Lecture: then I walked and prayed privately, and so went to bed.

[November 29]
After I had prayed I read and went to dinner: In the afternoon I was visited by Mr. Genkins who told me that young Goodericke for his Drawing of his Dagger and striking one before the Readers was fined £200 expulsed the house imprisoned bound to the good behaviour and enjoined to confess his fault and ask pardon in all the Courts: and, furthermore, he told us of the like punishment of another that quarrelled in the street: after he was gone I went to private examination and prayer: after to supper then I prayed some after and so went to bed.

[April I]
This day for praying reading, and working I continued my ordinary exercises,[4] with much Comfort and peace of Conscience, I thank god, having learned some thing from Mr. Rhodes his reading unto me as first that no calling is lawful without a ground for it in God's word:[5] 2. that the title of Lord Archbishops are unlawful: 3. that no minister should be made without a ministry and charge unto which he should be ordained.

[The 5 day of May 1601]
After prayers I went to the church where I heard a sermon: after I came home and heard Mr. Rhodes read: after dinner I went abroad and when I was come home I dressed some sores: after I heard Mr. Rhodes read and wrought with in a while: after I went to see a calf at Munckman's which had 2 great heads, 4 ears, and had to either head a throat pipe besides: the heads had long hairs like bristles about the mouths, such as n' other cow hath: the hinder legs had no parting from the rump, but grew backward, and were no longer but from the first joint: also the back bone was parted about the midest of the back, and a round hole was in the midst in to the body of the Calf: but one would have thought that to have comed of some stroke it might get in the cow's belly: after this I came in to private meditation and prayer.

[August 26]
This day in the afternoon I had had a child brought to see that was born at Silpho, one Talliour son who had no fundament, and had no passage for excrements but at the Mouth: I was earnestly entreated to cut the place to see if any passage could be made, but although I cut deep and searched there was none to be found.

[December 5]
All this week following I was well, I praise god, being visited by divers that came to see Mr. Hoby: by whom we heard some news, as by Mr. Pollard, that the Wednesday fortnight, before which was the 4 of November died of Drunkenness one Sir Hunter Adam, minister of the Betheme of York:[1] we heard also of Mr. Bishop['s] marriage to Mr. Cholmleys' Daughter, being about 14 years old and himself fifty: besides we heard of Woodruff's hurt by young George Dakins with some other things of less moment.

[December 26]
Was young Farley slain by his father's man one that the young man had before threatened to kill and for that end prosecuting him: the man, having a pike staff in his hand, run him into the eye and so into the brain: he never spoke after: this Judgment is worth noting, this young man being extraordinary profane, as once causing a horse to be brought into the church of god and there christening him with a name which horrible blasphemy the Lord did not leave unrevenged, even in this world, for example t'others.

[May 6]
I praise god I had health of body: howsoever justly god hath suffered Satan to afflict my mind, yet my hope is that my redeemer will bring my soul out of troubles, that it may praise his name: and so I will wait with patience for deliverance.

From the 6th unto the 20th I praise god I continued well, and found God's mercy in vouchsafing me comfort every way: and now I beseech thee o Lord give me power to render unto thee the calves of my Lips and with my whole heart to follow righteousness.[2]

[The Lords day June 27]
Until this day I have continued in bodily health notwithstanding Satan hath not ceased to cast his malice upon [me]: but temptations hath exercised me, and it hath pleased my god to deliver me from all: Mrs. Girlington with her daughter and son-in-law came but after the sermon: & so, when the Communion was ended and after dinner, we all heard the afternoon exercises together.

[1] Mr. Pollard Mr. Pollard, High Constable of Pickering Lythe, would have been privy to a wealth of information; he was entitled to be informed by the Constables of each parish, so that he could pass on intelligence to both the central government and the local Court of Quarter Sessions; Betheme that is, Bedlam, a hospital or asylum for the mentally ill (OED bedlam 3a).

[2] calves of my Lips "Take with you words, and turn to the Lord: say unto him, Take away all iniquity and receive us graciously: so we will render the calves of our lips" (Hosea 14:2). The Geneva Bible provides a note for "calves": "Declaring, that this is the true sacrifice, that the faithful can offer, even thanks & praise, Ebr. 13,15."

[The 23 of March: which day the Queen departed this life][1]
Mr. Hoby received Letters which came from the Privy Council to the Lord President and all the Justices of Peace that our Queen was sick which wrought great sorrow and dread in all good subjects' hearts: these Letters were dated the 16 of March.

[March 26]
This day being the Lord's day was the death of the Queen published and our now King James of Scotland proclaimed king to succeed her: god send him a Long and Happy Reign, Amen.

[October 23]
This day I heard the plague was so great at Whitby that those which were clear shut themselves up, and the infected that escaped did go abroad: Likewise it was reported that, at London, the number was taken of the Living and not of the Dead: Lord grant that these Judgments may cause England with speed to turn to the Lord.

John Donne

1572 – 1631

Donne was, as a recent biographer has noted, a Londoner born and bred. He was born in Bread Street, in the City of London, the third of six children; his father was of Welsh descent, his mother a lifelong Catholic, daughter of the writer John Heywood, and great-niece of Sir Thomas More. Her brothers, Ellis and Jasper Heywood, lived in exile as Jesuits. Donne's brother Henry died of plague in Newgate Prison, where he had been held for harbouring a Catholic priest. As he was born and raised in a Catholic family at a time when Catholicism was equated with disloyalty to the English crown, the question of religious allegiance was of paramount spiritual and practical importance to Donne, and one he addressed in several works. From 1591 to 1594 he studied law, and was for most of that time a member of Lincoln's Inn, following a tradition in his mother's family. In 1596, like many other young adventurers wishing to recommend themselves for service, he sailed in the expedition to Cadiz led by Essex and Raleigh, and in 1597 went on another expedition to the Azores. This second expedition was the occasion of two verse letters, "The Storm" and "The Calm," with its famous couplet "No use for lanthorns; and in one place lay / Feathers and dust, today and yesterday." Donne remained fascinated by travel and exploration, as his many metaphors drawn from voyages of discovery attest. After these expeditions he was in the service of Sir Thomas Egerton, the Lord Keeper of England; in 1601 he secretly married Ann More, the daughter of Egerton's brother-in-law, and was dismissed from his post. For some years thereafter, as his wife produced child after child, he sought employment. The precise date of Donne's conversion to Protestantism is unknown, but towards the end of the first decade of the new century he was interesting himself in the work of the Dean of Gloucester, Thomas Morton, who was writing anti-Catholic propaganda. However, in spite of many well-placed friends, he did not find regular employment until he was ordained deacon and priest at St. Paul's Cathedral in 1615. King James is said to have declared that he would get no employment from him, except in the church. Donne became perhaps the most famous preacher of his age; his sermons have dramatic intensity and, as one realizes when reading them aloud, are very skilfully written for the human voice. He was also the most celebrated poet of his time, copied into commonplace books and circulated more frequently in manuscript collections than any other poet of the age. He seems to have been ambivalent about print culture, writing for educated coteries and the social elite, and little of his work was published in his lifetime. In 1617 his wife died after giving birth to a stillborn child. In the years that followed he went as chaplain on Doncaster's embassy to Germany and Bohemia; he preached at the most prestigious venues available: at Court, in the House of Lords, at the Inns of Court, before the Countess of Bedford, and so on. In 1621 he was elected Dean of St. Paul's. In 1625 he preached to Charles I, a few days after the death of James, and again shortly after Charles's coronation. Self-dramatization is an essential part of his literary persona, as preacher and as poet; in 1631 he posed for a portrait of himself in his shroud, a few weeks before his death.

Songs and Sonnets

The Apparition

When by thy scorn, O murdress, I am dead,
And that thou thinkst thee free
From all solicitation from me,
Then shall my ghost come to thy bed,
And thee, fain'd vestal, in worse arms shall see; [1]
Then thy sick taper will begin to wink,
And he, whose thou art then, being tir'd before,
Will, if thou stir, or pinch to wake him, think
Thou call'st for more,
And in false sleep will from thee shrink,
And then poor aspen wretch, neglected thou [2]
Bath'd in a cold quicksilver sweat wilt lie [3]
A verier ghost than I,
What I will say, I will not tell thee now,
Lest that preserve thee; and since my love is spent,
I'had rather thou shouldst painfully repent,
Than by my threatnings rest still innocent.
—1633

The Flea

Mark but this flea, and mark in this,
How little that which thou deny'st me is;
Me it suck'd first, and now sucks thee,
And in this flea, our two bloods mingled be;
Thou know'st that this cannot be said
A sin, nor shame, nor loss of maidenhead,
Yet this enjoys before it woo,
And pamper'd swells with one blood made of two,
And this, alas, is more than we would do. [4]

Oh stay, three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost, nay more than married are.
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed, and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, w'are met,
And cloistered in these living walls of jet.
Though use make you apt to kill me,
Let not to that, self murder added be,
And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

Cruel and sudden, hast thou since
Purpled thy nail, in blood of innocence?
Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
Find'st not thy self, nor me the weaker now;
'Tis true, then learn how false, fears be;
Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

The Good-Morrow

I wonder by my troth, what thou, and I
Did, till we lov'd? were we not wean'd till then?
But suck'd on country pleasures, childishly?
Or snorted we in the seven sleepers' den? [5]

[1] vestal virgin, a chaste woman (OED vestal sb 2).

[2] aspen tremulous, quivering, quaking, timorous (OED aspen a 2).

[3] quicksilver pertaining to quicksilver, the metal mercury, so called for its liquid mobile form at ordinary temperatures (OED quicksilver a 3, sb 1).

[4] In Aristotelian physiology coition was thought to be a mingling of bloods.

[5] seven sleepers The seven sleepers of Ephesus were the heroes of a Christian legend. Having been walled up alive in a cave during the persecution of Christians by the Roman emperor Decius, they slept for 187 years.

T'was so; But this, all pleasures fancies be
If ever any beauty I did see,
Which I desir'd, and got, t'was but a dream of thee.

And now good morrow to our waking souls,
Which watch not one another out of fear;
For love, all love of other sights controls,
And makes one little room, an every where.
Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone,
Let maps to others, worlds on worlds have shown,
Let us possess our world, each hath one, and is one.[1]

My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,
And true plain hearts do in the faces rest,
Where can we find two better hemispheres
Without sharp North, without declining West?
What ever dies, was not mixed equally;[2]
If our two loves be one, or, thou and I
Love so alike, that none do slacken, none can die.

Love's Alchemy

Some that have deeper digged loves mine then I,
Say, where his centric happiness doth lie:[3]
I have lov'd, and got, and told,[4]
But should I love, get, tell, till I were old,
I should not find that hidden mystery;
Oh, 'tis imposture all:
And as no chymic yet th'elixir got,[5]
But glorifies his pregnant pot,
If by the way to him befall
Some odoriferous thing, or medicinal,[6]
So, lovers dream a rich and long delight,
But get a winter-seeming summer's night.

Our ease, our thrift, our honour, and our day,
Shall we, for this vain bubble's shadow pay?
Ends love in this, that my man,[7]
Can be as happy as I can; if he can
Endure the short scorn of a bridegroom's play?
That loving wretch that swears,
'Tis not the bodies marry, but the minds,
Which he in her angelic finds,
Would swear as justly, that he hears,
In that day's rude hoarse minstralsy, the spheres.[8]
Hope not for mind in women; at their best
Sweetness and wit they are but mummy, possessed.[9]

The Indifferent

I can love both fair and brown,
Her whom abundance melts, and her whom want betrays
Her who loves loneness best, and her who masks and plays,
Her whom the country formed, and whom the town,

[1] our world "one world" in the 1633 edition.

[2] What ever dies, was not mixed equally in reference to the theory that disease originated from unbalanced elements in the body.

[3] centric central.

[4] told counted (OED tell v II 10).

[5] chymic chemist.

[6] Some odoriferous thing.... .medicinal The search for the elixir of life or the philosopher's stone was expected to have such byproducts; their presence was often cited by the alchemist as signalling likely success in the quest.

[7] my man my servant.

[8] rude hoarse minstralsy Seventeenth-century wedding days typically included music and bawdy humour.

[9] mummy i.e. as preserved flesh; the word was also used to refer to a medicine made from the substance of mummies (OED mummy); possessed possessed by a spirit; possessed sexually; owned (OED possess v 4, 3b,2).

Her who believes, and her who tries, [1]
Her who still weeps with spongy eyes,
And her who is dry cork, and never cries;
I can love her, and her, and you and you,
I can love any, so she be not true.

Will no other vice content you?
Will it not serve your turn to do, as did your mothers?
Have you old vices spent, and now would find out others?
Or doth a fear, that men are true, torment you?
Oh we are not, be not you so,
Let me, and do you, twenty know.
Rob me, but bind me not, and let me go.
Must I, who came to travail thorough you, [2]
Grow your fixed subject, because you are true?

Venus heard me sigh this song,
And by Love's sweetest part, variety, she swore,
She heard not this till now; and that it should be so no more.
She went, examined, and returned ere long,
And said, "Alas, some two or three
Poor heretics in love there be,
Which think to stablish dangerous constancy.
But I have told them, 'Since you will be true,
You shall be true to them, who are false to you.'"

Catullus

All Kings, and all their favorites,
All glory of honors, beauties, wits,
The Sun itself, which makes times, as they pass,
Is elder by a year, now, than it was
When thou and I first one another saw:
All other things, to their destruction draw,
    Only our love hath no decay;
This, no tomorrow hath, nor yesterday,
Running it never runs from us away,
But truly keeps his first, last, everlasting day.

Alas, as well as other princes, we,
(Who prince enough in one another be,)
Must leave at last in death, these eyes, and ears,
Oft fed with true oaths, and with sweet salt tears;
    But souls where nothing dwells but love
(All other thoughts being inmates) then shall

This, or a love increased there above,
When bodies to their graves, souls from their

[1] Her who believes, and her who tries the woman who believes a lover's vows, and the one who puts them to the test.

[2] travail trouble, hardship (OED sb[1] travail); to journey (OED travail v II 5); travel in 1635 and subsequent editions. The word may be understood both as a noun and, with "to," as the infinitive of the verb. The possibilities of word-play are intriguing, but the primary meaning is that the speaker entered into a relationship, intending to pass through it and on to another.

[3] corse corpse (OED corse sb 2).

[4] inmates foreigners, strangers (OED inmate sb 1b).

The Sun Rising

Busy old fool, unruly Sun,
Why dost thou thus,
Through windows, and through curtains call on us?
Must to thy motions lovers' seasons run?
Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
Late school boys and sour prentices, [1]
Go tell Court-huntsmen, that the King will ride,
Call country ants to harvest offices; [2]
Love, all alike, no season knows, nor clime, [3]
Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.

Thy beams, so reverend, and strong
Why shouldst thou think?
I could eclipse and cloud them with a wink,
But that I would not lose her sight so long:
If her eyes have not blinded thine,
Look, and tomorrow late, tell me,
Whether both the Indias of spice and mine [4]
Be where thou leftst them, or lie here with me.
Ask for those Kings whom thou saw'st yesterday,
And thou shalt hear, all here in one bed lay.

She'is all States, and all Princes, I,
Nothing else is.
Princes do but play us, compar'd to this,
All honor's mimic; all wealth alchemy;[5]
Thou sun art half as happy'as we,
In that the world's contracted thus.
Thine age asks ease, and since thy duties be
To warm the world, that's done in warming us.
Shine here to us, and thou art everywhere;
This bed thy center is, these walls, thy sphere.

The Canonization

For Godsake hold your tongue, and let me love,
Or chide my palsy, or my gout, [6]
My five gray hairs, or ruin'd fortune flout,
With wealth your state, your mind with arts improve,
Take you a course, get you a place,
Observe his honour, or his grace,
Or the King's real, or his stamped face [7]
Contemplate, what you will, approve,
So you will let me love.

Alas, alas, who's injur'd by my love?
What merchant's ships have my sighs drown'd?
Who says my tears have overflow'd his ground?
When did my colds a forward spring remove?
When did the heats which my veins fill
Add one more to the plaguy bill? [8]
Soldiers find wars, and lawyers find out still
Litigious men, which quarrels move,
Though she and I do love.

Call us what you will, we are made such by love;
Call her one, me another fly,
We'are tapers too, and at our own cost die,
And we in us find the Eagle and the Dove,

---

[1] sour prentices peevish, discontented apprentices (OED sour a 5).

[2] harvest offices the duties of harvest time.

[3] clime climate (OED clime 1) or region (OED clime 2).

[4] the Indias of spice and mine the East and West Indies; Donne wrote in a letter of 1624 "Eastward…is the way to the land of Perfumes and Spices…Westward…is the way to the land of Gold, and of Mines."

[5] alchemy glittering dross, refuse, rubbish (OED alchemy 4).

[6] palsy…gout/…five grey hairs Nowadays it might be said to a young person seen smoking, "You are too old to do that." Donne is suggesting that his interlocutor might make a similar objection to his throwing away his health and worldly prospects on a love affair.

[7] his stamped face the king's face stamped on coins.

[8] plaguy bill the official list of the deaths caused by the plague in any district (OED sb plague 4c).

The Phoenix riddle hath more wit [1]
By us, we two being one, are it.
So, to one neutral thing both sexes fit,
We die and rise the same, and prove
Mysterious by this love. [2]

We can die by it, if not live by love,
And if unfit for tombs and hearse
Our legend be, it will be fit for verse;
And if no piece of chronicle we prove, [3]
We'll build in sonnets pretty rooms;
As well a well wrought urn becomes
The greatest ashes, as half-acre tombs,
And by these hymns, all shall approve
Us canonized for love. [4]

And thus invoke us: "You whom reverend love
Made one another's hermitage;
You, to whom love was peace, that now is rage,
Who did the whole world's soul contract, and drove
Into the glasses of your eyes [5]
So made such mirrors, and such spies,
That they did all to you epitomize,
Countries, towns, courts: Beg from above
A pattern of your love."

Confined Love

Some man unworthy to be possessor
Of old or new love, himself being false or weak,
Thought his pain and shame would be lesser,
If on womankind he might his anger wreak,
And thence a law did grow,
One should but one man know;
But are other creatures so? [6]

Are sun, moon, or stars by law forbidden,
To smile where they list, or lend away their light?
Are birds divorc'd, or are they chidden
If they leave their mate, or lie abroad a night?
Beasts do no jointures lose [7]
Though they new lovers choose,
But we are made worse than those.

Who e'r rigged fair ship to lie in harbours,
And not to seek new lands, or not to deal withal?
Or built fair houses, set trees, and arbours,
Only to lock up, or else to let them fall?
Good is not good, unless
A thousand it possess,
But doth waste with greediness. [8]

[1] The Phoenix riddle The phoenix is a mythical bird which burns itself to ashes every five hundred years, and emerges renewed from the fire (OED phoenix 1).

[2] die often used to refer to sexual climax.

[3] legend the life of a saint; chronicle the life of a king or great man.

[4] canonized i.e. they will be universally recognized as saints.

[5] contract Helen Gardner preferred extract, which has manuscript authority and yields an alchemical metaphor. Donne was at least as addicted to kinetic words as he was to alchemical ones; and the reader who "traces the leading thought throughout the whole" (Coleridge on this poem) may understand why contract is the better reading.

[6] Helen Gardner suggests that this poem is spoken by a woman, and notes a speech in Ovid's Metaphorphoses (320–355) in which Myrrha expresses regret that human laws forbid what nature does nothing to prohibit: "other animals mate as they will, nor is it thought base for a heifer to endure her sire, nor for his own offspring to be a horse's mate.... Happy they who have such privilege! Human civilization has made spiteful laws; and what nature allows, the jealous laws forbid..." (trans. J.F. Miller, 1916).

[7] jointures payments made to widows, which cease upon re-marriage (OED jointure 2).

[8] waste with greediness wastes away as a result of the greed of its possessor, who keeps even what he cannot use.

Air and Angels

Twice or thrice had I loved thee,
Before I knew thy face or name;
So in a voice, so in a shapeless flame,
Angels affect us oft, and worship'd be,
Still when, to where thou wert, I came
Some lovely glorious nothing I did see,

looking for love → so spiritual that he finds nothing

But since, my soul, whose child love is,
Takes limbs of flesh, and else could nothing do,
More subtle than the parent is,
Love must not be, but take a body too,
And therefore what thou wert, and who
I did Love ask, and now
That it assume thy body, I allow,
And fix itself in thy lip, eye, and brow.

Whilst thus to ballast love, I thought,
And so more steadily to have gone,[1]
With wares which would sink admiration,
I saw, I had love's pinnace overfraught,
Ev'ry thy hair for love to work upon
Is much too much, some fitter must be sought;

all it sinks the ship
so lust takes over

For, nor in nothing, nor in things
Extreme, and scattring bright, can love inhere;
Then as an Angel, face, and wings
Of air, not pure as it, yet pure doth wear,[2]
So thy love may be my love's sphere;
Just such disparity
As is twixt Air and Angel's purity,
T'wixt women's love, and men's will ever be.

Twicknam Garden[3]

Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears,
Hither I come to seek the spring,
And at mine eyes, and at mine ears,
Receive such balms, as else cure everything,
But O, self traitor, I do bring
The spider love, which transubstantiates all,[4]
And can convert manna to gall,[5]
And that this place may thoroughly be thought
True Paradise, I have the serpent brought.[6]

couplet doesn't sum nothing up.

'Twere wholesomer for me, that winter did
Benight the glory of this place,[7]
And that a grave frost did forbid
These trees to laugh and mock me to my face;
But that I may not this disgrace
Endure, nor leave this garden, Love let me
Some senseless piece of this place be;
Make me a mandrake, so I may grow here,[8]
Or a stone fountain weeping out my year.

Hither with crystal vials, lovers come,
And take my tears, which are love's wine,
And try your mistress' tears at home,
For all are false, that taste not just like mine;
Alas, hearts do not in eyes shine,

[1] to ballast to steady (OED ballast v 2).

[2] face, and wings / Of air Angels were thought to achieve visibility by assuming a body of air.

[3] Twicknam Garden the residence of Lucy, Countess of Bedford, Donne's patron.

[4] transubstantiates transforms, transmutes (OED transubstantiate v). The word was used most commonly to refer to the Roman Catholic belief that the sacramental bread and wine are transformed into the body and blood of Christ.

[5] manna food sent by God to the Israelites during their exodus from Egypt (Exodus 16:4–35); gall a bitter substance. Jesus, during his crucifixion, asked for wine, and was given wine mixed with gall. After tasting it he refused to drink (Matthew 27:34).

[6] the serpent Genesis 3:1–15.

[7] Benight darken, cloud (OED benight v 2).

[8] mandrake a plant, whose forked root is thought to resemble the human form. It was fabled to utter a deadly shriek when plucked up from the ground (OED mandrake 1).

Nor can you more judge woman's thoughts by tears,
Then by her shadow, what she wears.
O perverse sex, where none is true but she,
Who's therefore true, because her truth kills me.
—1633

A Valediction: of Weeping

Let me pour forth
My tears before thy face, whil'st I stay here,
For thy face coins them, and thy stamp they bear,
And by this mintage they are something worth,
For thus they be
Pregnant of thee,
Fruits of much grief they are, emblems of more,
When a tear falls, that thou falls which it bore,
So thou and I are nothing then, when on a diverse shore.

On a round ball
A workman that hath copies by, can lay
An Europe, Afric, and an Asia,
And quickly make that, which was nothing, All,
So doth each tear,
Which thee doth wear,
A globe, yea world by that impression grow,
Till thy tears mixed with mine do overflow
This world, by waters sent from thee, my heaven dissolved so.

O more than Moon,
Draw not up seas to drown me in thy sphere,
Weep me not dead, in thine arms, but forbear
To teach the sea, what it may do too soon,
Let not the wind
Example find,
To do me more harm, than it purposeth,
Since thou and I sigh one another's breath,
Who e'r sighs most, is cruellest, and hastes the other's death.

The Ecstasy

Where, like a pillow on a bed,
A pregnant bank swell'd up, to rest
The violet's reclining head,
Sat we two, one another's best;

Our hands were firmly cemented
With a fast balm, which thence did spring,
Our eye-beams twisted, and did thread
Our eyes, upon one double string;

So to entergraft our hands, as yet
Was all our means to make us one,
And pictures in our eyes to get
Was all our propagation. [1]

As 'twixt two equal armies, Fate
Suspends uncertain victory,
Our souls, (which to advance their state,
Were gone out,) hung 'twixt her, and me.

And whil'st our souls negotiate there,
We like sepulchral statues lay;
All day, the same our postures were,
And we said nothing, all the day.

If any, so by love refin'd,
That he soul's language understood,
And by good love were grown all mind,
Within convenient distance stood,

He (though he knew not which soul spake,
Because both meant, both spake the same)

[1] pictures in our eyes reflections of each other; "seeing babies" is the idiomatic expression of Donne's thought in these two lines.

Might thence a new concoction take, [1]
And part far purer than he came.

This Ecstasy doth unperplex
(We said) and tell us what we love,
We see by this, it was not sex,
We see, we saw not what did move:

But as all several souls contain
Mixture of things, they know not what,
Love, these mixed souls, doth mix again,
And makes both one, each this and that.

A single violet transplant,
The strength, the colour, and the size,
(All which before was poor, and scant,)
Redoubles still, and multiplies.

When love, with one another so
Interinanimates two souls,
That abler soul, which thence doth flow,
Defects of loneliness controls.

We then, who are this new soul, know,
Of what we are compos'd, and made,
For, th'atomies of which we grow,
Are souls, whom no change can invade.

But O alas, so long, so far
Our bodies why do we forbear?
They are ours, though not we, we are
The intelligences, they the sphere. [2]

We owe them thanks, because they thus,
Did us, to us, at first convey,
Yielded their forces, sense, to us,
Nor are dross to us, but allay. [3]

On man heaven's influence works not so,
But that it first imprints the air,
So soul into the soul may flow,
Though it to body first repair.

As our blood labours to beget
Spirits, as like souls as it can, [4]
Because such fingers need to knit
That subtle knot, which makes us man: [5]

So must pure lovers' souls descend
T'affections, and to faculties,
Which sense may reach and apprehend,
Else a great Prince in prison lies.

To our bodies turn we then, that so
Weak men on love reveal'd may look;
Love's mysteries in souls do grow,
But yet the body is his book.

And if some lover, such as we,
Have heard this dialogue of one,
Let him still mark us, he shall see
Small change, when we'are to bodies gone.

[1] concoction bringing to a state of perfection (OED concoction 2).

[2] The intelligences The celestial spheres were thought to be moved by incorporeal "intelligences."

[3] dross the scum or extraneous matter thrown off from metals in the process of melting (OED dross sb 1); allay alloy, a mixture of metals (OED alloy sb 5).

[4] Spirits In contemporary thought "spirit" was thought to mediate between body and soul.

Farewell to Love [1]

Whilst yet to prove, [2]
I thought there was some deity in love,
So did I reverence, and gave
Worship, as atheists at their dying hour
Call, what they cannot name, an unknown power,
As ignorantly did I crave:
Thus when
Things not yet known are coveted by men,
Our desires give them fashion, and so [3]
As they wax lesser, fall, as they size, grow. [4]

But, from late fair
His highness sitting in a golden chair, [5]
Is not less cared for after three days
By children, than the thing which lovers so
Blindly admire, and with such worship woo;
Being had, enjoying it decays: [6]
And thence,
What before pleased them all, takes but one sense, [7]
And that so lamely, as it leaves behind
A kind of sorrowing dullness to the mind.

Ah cannot we,
As well as cocks and lions jocund be, [8]
After such pleasures, unless wise
Nature decreed (since each such act, they say,
Diminisheth the length of life a day) [9]
This; as she would man should despise
The sport,[10]
Because that other curse of being short, [11]
And only for a minute made to be
Eager, desires to raise posterity. [12]

Since so, my mind [13]
Shall not desire what no man else can find,
I'll no more dote and run
To pursue things which had endamaged me.
And when I come where moving beauties be, [14]
As men do when the summer's sun
Grows great,
Though I admire their greatness, shun their heat;
Each place can afford shadows. If all fail,
'Tis but applying worm-seed to the tail. [15]

[1] A.J. Smith observes that "Petrarch renounced his love of Laura for the love of God at one stage in the moral turmoil of his self-destructive obsession with a fellow-creature" and that "an abrupt dismissal of love became a customary Petrarchan move," referring to Sidney's sonnet which begins "Leave me O love which reachest but to dust, / And thou my mind aspire to higher things."

[2] While yet to prove subject to a testing process (OED prove 1).

[3] fashion characteristic form (OED fashion sb 1).

[4] size increase in size (OED size v 5b).

[5] from late fair…golden Chair At the large annual fair held in the churchyard of St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield (Bartholomew Fair) images in gingerbread of foreign monarchs or of the Pope, designed for the consumption of children, were commonly sold.

[6] Being had, enjoying it decays This is the same thought as in Shakespeare's sonnet beginning "The expense of spirit in a waste of shame/ Is lust in action." Once sexual enjoyment has been achieved, it ceases to be interesting.

[7] pleased them all that is, pleased all the senses; takes is attractive to.

[8] cocks and lions It was believed that these creatures were distinguished by their ability to resist "dullness" after orgasm.

[9] Diminisheth the length of life a day According to Aristotle sexual activity shortens life; Christianity linked this claim to the alleged sinfulness of such activity.

[10] as she would as Nature would [have it that].

[11] curse of being short the shortness of human life (resulting from the original sin in the Garden) as well as the shortness of the detumescent male organ.

[12] to raise posterity to raise children (i.e. it is a curse resulting from the Fall that we desire to perpetuate our mortal selves through having offspring; but that desire results in our killing ourselves through sex; hence Nature, in order to prolong our lives, may have instilled in us a sense of disillusionment about sex.)

[13] Since so since this is so.

[14] moving "affecting" (OED moving a 2b) as well as "in motion."

[15] worm-seed a strong anaphrodisiac; the tail the penis.

A Valediction: forbidding Mourning

metaphss
[illegible]

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their souls, to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
The breath goes now, and some say, no:

So let us melt, and make no noise,
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move,
T'were profanation of our joys,
To tell the laity our love.

our love is beyond ordinary people

Moving of th'earth brings harms and fears,
Men reckon what it did and meant, [1]
But trepidation of the spheres, [2]
Though greater far, is innocent.

it's like the movement of the spheres

Dull sublunary lovers' love [3]
(Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
Absence, because it doth remove
Those things which elemented it.

+ we are like the planets

But we by a love, so much refined,
That our selves know not what it is,
Inter-assured of the mind,
Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.

our love is refined our minds are in love + we don't miss the body

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, endure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twin compassess are two,

admit they will be apart

Thy soul the fixed foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if th'other do.

And though it in the centre sit,
Yet when the other far doth roam,
It leans, and hearkens after it,
And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must
Like th'other foot, obliquely run;
Thy firmness makes my circle just,
And makes me end, where I begun.

A Nocturnal upon S. Lucy's Day being the shortest day [4]

Tis the year's midnight, and it is the day's,
Lucy's, who scarce seven hours herself unmasks,
The Sun is spent, and now his flasks [5]
Send forth light squibs, no constant rays; [6]
The world's whole sap is sunk:
The general balm th'hydroptic earth hath drunk, [7]
Whither, as to the bed's-feet, life is shrunk,
Dead and interred, yet all these seem to laugh,
Compar'd with me, who am their Epitaph.

Study me then, you who shall lovers be
At the next world, that is, at the next Spring:
For I am every dead thing,
In whom love wrought new Alchemy.
For his art did express

[1] Moving of th'earth…did and meant In contrasting the damage caused by earthquakes and the harmlessness of the trepidation of the spheres, Donne is preparing for the contrast between his love and that of "dull sublunary lovers."

[2] trepidation vibration, oscillation (OED trepidation 2).

[3] sublunary inferior, subordinate (OED sublunary a 2).

[4] Nocturnal night-piece (OED nocturnal sb B1).

[5] flasks used to hold gunpowder (OED flask sb^2 2); the reference is probably to the stars, believed to store light from the sun. See Paradise Lost 7:346–369.

[6] squibs explosive devices used as missiles or means of attack (OED squib sb 2a).

[7] hydroptic (an erroneous formation from hydropsy) insatiably thirsty (OED hydropic a 2). In one of his letters Donne wrote of having "an hydroptique immoderate desire of humane learning and languages."

A quintessence even from nothingness,
From dull privations, and lean emptiness:
He ruin'd me, and I am re-begot
Of absence, darkness, death; things which are not.

All others, from all things, draw all that's good,
Life, soul, form, spirit, whence they being have,

I, by love's limbeck, am the grave [1]
Of all, that's nothing. Oft a flood
Have we two wept, and so
Drowned the whole world, us two; oft did we grow
To be two Chaosses, when we did show
Care to ought else; and often absences
Withdrew our souls, and made us carcasses.

But I am by her death, (which word wrongs her)
Of the first nothing, the elixir grown; [2]
Were I a man, that I were one,
I needs must know; I should prefer,
If I were any beast,
Some ends, some means; yea plants, yea stones detest,
And love; all, all some properties invest;
If I an ordinary nothing were,
As shadow, a light, and body must be here.

But I am none; nor will my Sun renew.
You lovers, for whose sake, the lesser Sun
At this time to the Goat is run
To fetch new lust, and give it you,
Enjoy your summer all;
Since she enjoys her long night's festival,
Let me prepare towards her, and let me call
This hour her vigil, and her eve, since this
Both the year's, and the day's deep midnight is.

The Relic

When my grave is broke up again
Some second guest to entertain
(For graves have learn'd that woman-head
To be to more than one a bed)[3]
And he that digs it, spies
A bracelet of bright hair about the bone,
Will he not let us alone,
And think that there a loving couple lies,
Who thought that this device might be some way
To make their souls, at the last busy day,
Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?[4]

If this fall in a time, or land,
Where mis-devotion doth command, [5]
Then, he that digs us up, will bring
Us, to the Bishop, and the King,
To make us relics; then
Thou shalt be a Mary Magdalen, and I
A something else thereby;[6]
All women shall adore us, and some men;
And since at such time, miracles are sought, [7]
I would have that age by this paper taught
What miracles we harmless lovers wrought.[8]

First, we lov'd well and faithfully,
Yet knew not what we lov'd, nor why,
Difference of sex no more we knew,

[3] woman-head womanliness (with a play on "maidenhead").

[4] this device the inclusion of a lock of hair in the grave. At the Resurrection souls are supposed to be scattered; the suggestion here is that the lock of hair might help them find each other.

[5] mis-devotion i.e. devotion to relics.

[6] Mary Magdalen Mary Magdalen was usually represented in art with bright, golden hair.

[7] miracles are sought i.e. verification of miracles is sought for in relics.

[8] this paper this poem.

Than our guardian angels do,[1]
Coming and going, we,
Perchance might kiss, but not between those meals.
Our hands ne'r touched the seals,
Which nature, injur'd by late law, sets free:[2]
These miracles we did; but now alas,
All measure, and all language, I should pass,
Should I tell what a miracle she was.[3]

ELEGIES

Elegy VI

Oh, let me not serve so, as those men serve
Whom honours' smokes at once fatten and sterve;[4]
Poorly enrich't with great men's words or looks;
Nor so write my name in thy loving books
As those idolatrous flatterers, which still
Their Prince's styles with many realms fulfill
Whence they no tribute have, and where no sway.[5]
Such services I offer as shall pay
Themselves, I hate dead names: Oh then let me
Favorite in ordinary, or no favorite be.
When my soul was in her own body sheath'd,
Nor yet by oaths betroth'd, nor kisses breath'd
Into my Purgatory, faithless thee,
Thy heart seem'd wax, and steel thy constancy.
So, careless flowers strowed on the water's face,
The curled whirlpools suck, smack, and embrace,
Yet drown them; so, the taper's beamy eye
Amorously twinkling, beckons the giddy fly,
Yet burns his wings; and such the devil is,
Scarce visiting them, who are entirely his.
When I behold a stream, which, from the spring,
Doth with doubtful melodious murmuring,
Or in a speechless slumber, calmly ride
Her wedded channel's bosom, and then chide
And bend her brows, and swell if any bough
Do but stoop down, to kiss her upmost brow:
Yet, if her often gnawing kisses win
The traitorous bank to gape, and let her in,
She rusheth violently, and doth divorce
Her from her native, and her long-kept course,
And roars, and braves it, and in gallant scorn,
In flattering eddies promising return,
She flouts the channel, who thenceforth is dry;
Then say I: that is she, and this am I.
Yet let not thy deep bitterness beget[6]
Careless despair in me, for that will whet
My mind to scorn; and Oh, love dull'd with pain
Was ne'er so wise, nor well arm'd as disdain.
Then with new eyes I shall survey thee, and spy
Death in thy cheeks, and darkness in thine eye.
Though hope bred faith and love; thus taught, I shall
As nations do from Rome, from thy love fall.[7]
My hate shall outgrow thine, and utterly
I will renounce thy dalliance: and when I

[1] Difference of sex....guardian angels do The love of angels is spiritual and has no sexual component.

[2] the seals,/ Which nature, injur'd by late law, sets free In the original condition of free created nature, there were no restrictions on love; to conform to law requires "miracles".

[3] I should pass exceed (OED pass v B III 37).

[4] honours' smokes the smoke of honours, that fatten a name through added titles but which are essentially empty (making the "dead names" of l. 9); sterve starve; the original spelling is retained to indicate the rhyme created by contemporary pronunciation.

[5] Their Prince's styles Flatterers swell the royal "style" or title with the names of realms over which the Prince does not in fact rule; Donne may be glancing at English monarchs, who continued to be styled the rulers of France long after England lost its last foothold on the continent in 1558.

[6] bitterness cruelty, severity.

[7] As nations do from Rome that is, as nations that become Protestant "fall" from the Roman Catholic church.

Elegy VII

Nature's lay idiot, I taught thee to love, [2]
And in that sophistry, oh, thou dost prove [3]
Too subtle: Fool, thou didst not understand
The mystic language of the eye nor hand:
Nor couldst thou judge the difference of the air
Of sighs, and say, this lies, this sounds despair:
Nor by the eyes' water call a malady
Desperately hot, or changing feverously.
I had not taught thee then, the alphabet
Of flowers, how they devisefully being set
And bound up, might with speechless secrecy
Deliver errands mutely, and mutually.
Remember since all thy words used to be
To every suitor; Ay, if my friends agree.
Since, household charms, thy husband's name to teach,
Were all the love tricks, that thy wit could reach; [4]
And since, an hour's discourse could scarce have made
One answer in thee, and that ill arrayed
In broken proverbs, and torn sentences.
Thou art not by so many duties his,
That from the world's common having sever'd thee,
Inlaid thee, neither to be seen, nor see,
As mine: who have with amorous delicacies
Refin'd thee into a blissful paradise.
Thy graces and good words my creatures be;
I planted knowledge and life's tree in thee, [5]
Which oh, shall strangers taste? Must I alas
Frame and enamel plate, and drink in glass?
Chafe wax for others' seals? break a colt's force [6]
And leave him then, being made a ready horse?

The Comparison

As the sweet sweat of roses in a still, [7]
As that which from chaf'd musk cat's pores doth trill,
As the almighty balm of th'early East,
Such are the sweat drops of my mistress' breast,
And on her neck her skin such lustre sets,
They seem no sweat drops, but pearl carcanets. [8]
Rank sweaty froth thy mistress' brow defiles,
Like spermatic issue of ripe menstruous boils,
Or like that scum, which, by need's lawless law
Enforc'd, Sanserra's starved men did draw [9]
From parboiled shoes, and boots, and all the rest
Which were with any sovereign fatness blest,
And like vile lying stones in saffroned tin, [10]
Or warts, or weals, they hang upon her skin.
Round as the world's her head, on every side,
Like to the fatal ball which fell on Ide, [11]
Or that whereof God had such jealousy,

As, for the ravishing thereof we die.
Thy head is like a rough-hewn statue of jet,
Where marks for eyes, nose, mouth, are yet scarce set;
Like the first Chaos, or flat seeming face
Of Cynthia, where th'earth's shadows her embrace. [1]
Like Proserpine's white beauty-keeping chest, [2]
Or Jove's best fortune's urn, is her fair breast. [3]
Thine's like worm eaten trunks, cloth'd in seal's skin,
Or grave, that's dust without, and stink within.
And like that slender stalk, at whose end stands
The woodbine quivering, are her arms and hands,
Like rough-bark'd elmboughs, or the russet skin
Of men late scourg'd for madness, or for sin,
Like sun-parch'd quarters on the city gate, [4]
Such is thy tann'd skin's lamentable state.
And like a bunch of ragged carrots stand
The short swoll'n fingers of thy gouty hand
Then like the Chymic's masculine equal fire, [5]
Which in the Limbeck's warm womb doth inspire
Into th'earth's worthless part a soul of gold,
Such cherishing heat her best lov'd part doth hold.
Thine's like the dread mouth of a fired gun,
Or like hot liquid metals newly run
Into clay moulds, or like to that Ætna [6]
Where round about the grass is burnt away.
Are not your kisses then as filthy, and more,
As a worm sucking an invenom'd sore?
Doth not thy fearful hand in feeling quake,
As one which gath'ring flowers, still fears a snake?
Is not your last act harsh, and violent,
As when a plough a stony ground doth rent?
So kiss good turtles, so devoutly nice [7]
Are priests in handling reverent sacrifice,
And such in searching wounds the surgeon is
As we, when we embrace, or touch, or kiss.
Leave her, and I will leave comparing thus,
She, and comparisons are odious.

The Autumnal

No spring, nor summer beauty hath such grace,
As I have seen in one autumnal face, [8]
Young beauties force your love, and that's a rape,
This doth but counsel, yet you cannot scape.
If 'twere a shame to love, here 'twere no shame,
Affection here takes reverence's name.
Were her first years the Golden Age; that's true,
But now she's gold oft tried, and ever new. [9]
That was her torrid and inflaming time,
This is her tolerable tropic clime.
Fair eyes, who asks more heat than comes from hence,
He in a fever wishes pestilence.
Call not these wrinkles, graves; if graves they were,
They were Love's graves; for else he is no where.
Yet lies not Love dead here, but here doth sit

Vow'd to this trench, like an Anachorit.[1]
And here, till hers, which must be his death, come,
He doth not dig a grave, but build a tomb.
Here dwells he, though he sojourn ev'ry where,
In Progress, yet his standing house is here.
Here, where still evening is; not noon, nor night;
Where no voluptuousness, yet all delight.
In all her words, unto all hearers fit,
You may at revels, you at counsel, sit.
This is love's timber, youth his under-wood;[2]
There he, as wine in June, enrages blood,
Which then comes seasonabliest, when our taste
And appetite to other things, is past;
Xerxes' strange Lydian love, the platan tree,
Was lov'd for age, none being so large as she,[3]
Or else because, being young, nature did bless
Her youth with age's glory, barrenness.
If we love things long sought, age is a thing
Which we are fifty years in compassing.
If transitory things, which soon decay,
Age must be loveliest at the latest day.
But name not winter-faces, whose skin's slack;
Lank, as an unthrift's purse; but a soul's sack;
Whose eyes seek light within, for all here's shade;
Whose mouths are holes, rather worn out, than made;
Whose every tooth to a several place is gone,
To vex their souls at Resurrection;[4]
Name not these living death's-heads unto me,[5]
For these, not ancient, but antiques be.
I hate extremes; yet I had rather stay
With tombs, than cradles, to wear out a day.
Since such love's natural lation is, may still[6]
My love descend, and journey down the hill,
Not panting after growing beauties, so,
I shall ebb out with them, who home-ward go.

Elegy XIX
To His Mistress Going to Bed[7]

Come, Madam, come, all rest my powers defy,
Until I labour, I in labour lie.
The foe oft-times, having the foe in sight,
Is tir'd with standing though he never fight.
Off with that girdle, like heaven's zone glittering,
But a far fairer world encompassing.
Unpin that spangled breastplate which you wear,[8]
That th'eyes of busy fools may be stopt there.
Unlace your self, for that harmonious chime,
Tells me from you, that now 'tis your bed time.
Off with that happy busk, which I envy,[9]
That still can be, and still can stand so nigh.
Your gown's going off, such beauteous state reveals,
As when from flow'ry meads th'hill's shadow steals.
Off with that wiry coronet and shew
The hairy diadem which on you doth grow:
Now off with those shoes, and then softly tread
In this love's hallow'd temple, this soft bed.
In such white robes Heaven's Angels us'd to be Received by men: thou Angel bringst with thee

---

[1] Anachorit anchorite, a person who has withdrawn or secluded himself from the world (OED anchoret, ite 1), in this instance, one who has pledged (vow'd) himself to a particular place.

[2] under-wood small trees or shrubs or brushwood (OED).

[3] Xerxes...the platan tree Herodotus tells of Xerxes greatly admiring a plane tree in Lydia.

[4] Whose every tooth...vex their souls at Resurrection Donne is suggesting that lost teeth, scattered in different places, make the doctrine of the Resurrection problematic. It is unlikely that he seriously believed this, at all events at any point in adult life.

[5] death's-heads skulls (OED death's-head 1).

[6] lation movement (OED lation).

[7] This poem was refused a licence for the edition of 1633; it was first printed in 1654, in an anthology (The Harmony of the Muses); it first appeared in an edition of Donne's poems in 1669.

[8] breastplate stomacher, a covering for the chest worn by women under the bodice, often jewelled; sometimes a chiming watch was worn on it (see line 9).

[9] busk corset (OED busk sb^{1}).

A heaven like Mahomet's paradise, and though [1]
Ill spirits walk in white, we easily know,
By this these Angels from an evil sprite,
Those set our hairs, but these our flesh upright.
    Licence my roving hands, and let them go,
Before, behind, between, above, below. [2]
O my America! my new-found-land,
My kingdom, safeliest when with one man manned,
My mine of precious stones: my Empery, [3]
How blest am I in this discovering thee!
To enter in these bonds, is to be free;
Then where my hand is set, my seal shall be.
    Full nakedness! All joys are due to thee,
As souls unbodied, bodies uncloth'd must be,
To taste whole joys. Gems which you women use
Are like Atlanta's balls, cast in men's views, [4]
That when a fool's eye lighteth on a gem,
His earthly soul may covet theirs, not them:
Like pictures, or like books' gay coverings made
For lay-men, are all women thus array'd.
Themselves are mystic books, which only we (Whom their imputed grace will dignify) [5]
Must see reveal'd. Then since that I may know;
As liberally, as to a midwife shew
Thy self: cast all, yea, this white linen hence,
Here is no penance, much less innocence: [6]
    To teach thee, I am naked first; why then
What needst thou have more covering then a man.

Elegy [XVIII]

Love's Progress [7]

Whoever loves, if he do not propose
The right true end of love, he's one that goes
To sea for nothing but to make him sick.
Love is a bear-whelp born, if we o'er lick [8]
Our love, and force it new strange shapes to take,
We err, and of a lump a monster make.
Were not a calf a monster that were grown
Faceed like a man, though better then his own? [9]
Perfection is in unity: prefer
One woman first, and then one thing in her.
I when I value gold, may think upon
The ductileness, the application,
The wholesomeness, the ingenuity, [10]
From rust, from soil, from fire ever free:
But if I love it, 'tis because 'tis made
By our new nature, use, the soul of trade. [11]
    All these in women we might think upon
(If women had them) and yet love but one. [12]
Can men more injure women than to say

[1] Mahomet's paradise peopled with beautiful women ready to satisfy the carnal desires of the male inhabitants.

[3] Empery the territory of an absolute or powerful ruler (OED empery sb 2b).

[4] Atlanta's balls Atalanta rejected all suitors who could not defeat her in a footrace. She was eventually defeated by Hippomenes who, during the race, dropped three golden apples he had been given by Aphrodite. Atalanta stopped to pick them up and lost the race.

[5] imputed grace Calvinist doctrine: through imputed grace, Christ's virtue was attributed to the elect.

[6] The 1669 reading is "There is no penance due to innocence." Manuscript authority for this reading is weaker than for that given in the text; the fact that it might be easier to make sense of is not considered to be a virtue in editorial circles, where the principle of preferring the lectio difficilior reigns.

[7] This poem was refused a licence in 1633; it was first printed in 1654 in The Harmony of the Muses, and first included in an edition of Donne's poems in 1669.

[8] Love is a bear-whelp born... lick The mother bear's licking of the newborn was thought to instill shape and substance into the cub.

[9] Faced like a man i.e. though a human face be better than that of a calf, it would still be monstrous on a bovine body.

[10] ingenuity noble quality (OED ingenuity 2).

[11] use habit, custom (OED use n 4); also utility (i.e. the habit of our new nature is to value the use to which things are put rather than the unified form in which they are made).

[12] one one thing.

They love them for that, by which they are not they?
Makes virtue woman? Must I cool my blood
Till I both be, and find one wise and good?
May barren angels love so. Bit if we Make love to woman, virtue is not she:
As beauty is not nor wealth. He that strays thus
From her to hers, is more adulterous [1]
Than if he took her maid. Search every sphere
And firmament, our Cupid is not there. [2]
He's an infernal god and under ground
With Pluto dwells, where gold and fire abound. [3]
Men to such gods, their sacrificing coals
Did not on altars lay, but pits and holes. [4]
Although we see celestial bodies move
Above the earth, the earth we till and love:
So we her airs contemplate, words and heart,
And virtues; but we love the centric part. [5]
Nor is the soul more worthy, or more fit
For love than this, as infinite as it. [6]
But in attaining this desired place
How much they stray, that set out at the face!
The hair a forest is of ambushes,
Of springes, snares, fetters and manacles: [7]
The brow becalms us when 'tis smooth and plain,
And when 'tis wrinkled, shipwrecks us again.
Smooth, 'tis a Paradise, where we would have
Immortal stay, and wrinkled 'tis our grave.
The nose, like to the first meridian, runs
Not 'twixt an east and west, but 'twixt two suns;
It leaves a cheek, a rosy hemisphere
On either side, and then directs us where
Upon the Islands Fortunate we fall, [8]
Not faint Canary, but ambrosial,
Her swelling lips; To which when we are come,
We anchor there, and think ourselves at home,
For they seem all: there sirens' songs, and there
Wise Delphic oracles do fill the ear;
There in a creek where chosen pearls do swell,
The Remora, her cleaving tongue doth dwell. [9]
These, and the glorious promontory, her chin
O'er past; and the strait Hellespont between [10]
The Sestos and Abydos of her breasts,
(Not of two lovers, but two loves the nests)
Succeeds a boundless sea, but yet thine eye
Some Island moles may scattered there descry;
And sailing towards her India, in that way [11]
Shall at her fair Atlantic navel stay;
Though thence the current be thy pilot made,
Yet ere thou be where thou wouldst be embayed,
Thou shalt upon another forest set,
Where many shipwreck, and no further get.
When thou art there, consider what this chase
Mispent by thy beginning at the face.
Rather set out below; practise my art,
Some symmetry the foot hath with that part
Which thou dost seek, and is thy map for that Lovely enough to stop, but not stay at:

---

[1] From her to hers from the unified essence of the woman to individual qualities attributed to her (but which may not truly belong to her).

[2] Search every sphere…Cupid is not there i.e. no constellation or planet is named after this god.

[3] Pluto the god of the underworld, also known as Hades. (N.B. The planet Pluto was not discovered and named until the twentieth century.)

[4] pits and holes Offerings to such pagan gods as these were to be thrown into trenches in the earth.

[5] centric earth, the centre of the universe.

[6] than this this part (i.e. the "centric part") of the body.

[7] springes snares; see OED springe sb.

[8] Islands Fortunate The first (or Greenwich) meridian, dividing the earth into eastern and western hemispheres, was thought to pass through the Canary Islands, also then known as the Fortunate Islands. The Canary Islands also produced light wine, contrasted here with the stronger ambrosia of the gods.

[9] Remora a fish, believed to be able to stop the progress of any ship by attaching itself to it and sucking.

[10] Hellespont The strait of Hellespont separated the cities of Sestos and Abydos (homes respectively of the lovers Hero and Leander).

[11] India a conventional short form for the East Indies, thought of as the source of fabulous wealth.

Least subject to disguise and change it is;[1]
Men say the Devil never can change his.
It is the emblem that hath figured
Firmness; 'tis the first part that comes to bed.[2]
Civility, we see refin'd the kiss
Which at the face begun, transplanted is
Since to the hand, since to the imperial knee,[3]
Now at the papal foot delights to be:[4]
If kings think that the nearer way, and do[5]
Rise from the foot, lovers may do so too.
For as free spheres move faster far than can[6]
Birds, whom the air resists, so may that man
Which goes this empty and etherial way,
Than if at beauties' elements he stay.
Rich Nature hath in women wisely made
Two purses, and their mouths aversely laid:[7]
They then, which to the lower tribute owe,
That way which that exchequer looks, must go:[8]
He which doth not, his error is as great,
As who by clyster gave the stomach meat.[9]

SATIRES

Satire III

Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids[10]
Those tears to issue which swell my eye-lids;
I must not laugh, nor weep sins, and be wise,
Can railing then cure these worn maladies?
Is not our mistress fair Religion,
As worthy of all our soul's devotion,
As virtue was to the first blinded age?[11]
Are not heaven's joys as valiant to assuage
Lusts, as earth's honour was to them? Alas,
As we do them in means, shall they surpass
Us in the end, and shall thy father's spirit
Meet blind philosophers in heaven, whose merit
Of strict life may be imputed faith, and hear
Thee, whom he taught so easy ways and near
To follow, damn'd? O if thou dar'st, fear this.
This fear great courage, and high valour is;
Dar'st thou aid mutinous Dutch, and dar'st thou lay[12]
Thee in ships wooden sepulchers, a prey
To leaders rage, to storms, to shot, to dearth?
Dar'st thou dive seas, and dungeons of the earth?
Hast thou more courageous fire to thaw the ice
Of frozen North discoveries? and thrice
Colder than salamanders, like divine
Children in th'oven, fires of Spain, and the line,[13]

---

[1] Least subject to disguise The Devil was said to be unable to disguise his cloven foot.

[2] Firmness Helen Gardner notes that theological authorities saw the foot as "an emblem of firmitas or soliditas."

[3] Since then (OED since n 1).

[4] papal foot One kissed the foot of the Pope to demonstrate complete subservience to him.

[5] nearer way readiest way [to demonstrate their devotion to the Pope].

[6] spheres heavenly bodies (OED sphere sb 2).

[7] Two purses the mouth and the vagina. As Helen Gardner observes, the phrase "pursing of the lips" draws on the analogy between the way purse-strings draw tight the opening to a purse and the way in which human lips may be tightened.

[8] They then....exchequer looks, must go i.e. [They] which owe to the lower of the two mouths an offering of submission (or a tax) must go to that exchequer (or treasury).

[9] Clyster enema (OED clyster).

[10] spleen the seat of melancholy or morose feelings (OED spleen sb 1b).

[11] first blinded age the age before Christianity was thought to be without the light of the gospel.

[12] mutinous Dutch The Dutch were engaged in an ongoing dispute against Spanish rule.

[13] divine / Children in th'oven Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were three young men thrown in a fire for refusing to worship a golden statue built by King Nebuchadnezzar. An angel appeared in the midst of the flames and allowed the three men to stay unharmed (Daniel 3: 1–97).

Whose countries' limbecks to our bodies be, [1]
Canst thou for gain bear? and must every he
Which cries not, Goddess, to thy Mistress, draw,
Or eat thy poisonous words? courage of straw!
O desperate coward, wilt thou seem bold, and
To thy foes and his (who made thee to stand Sentinel in his world's garrison) thus yield,
And for the forbidden wars, leave th'appointed field?
Know thy foes; the foul devil, whom thou
Striv'st to please: for hate, not love, would allow
Thee fain, his whole Realm to be quit; and as [2]
The world's all parts wither away and pass,
So the world's self, thy other lov'd foe, is
In her decrepit wane, and thou loving this,
Dost love a withered and worn strumpet; last,
Flesh (itself's death) and joys which flesh can taste,
Thou lovest; and thy fair goodly soul, which doth
Give this flesh power to taste joy, thou dost loath;
Seek true religion. O where? Mirreus [3]
Thinking her unhous'd here, and fled from us,
Seeks her at Rome, there, because he doth know
That she was there a thousand years ago,
He loves her rags so, as we here obey
The statecloth where the Prince sat yesterday, [4]
Crants to such brave loves will not be enthrall'd,
But loves her only, who at Geneva is call'd [5]
Religion, plain, simple, sullen, young,
Contemptuous, yet unhandsome. As among
Lecherous humors, there is one that judges
No wenches wholesome, but coarse country drudges.
Graius stays still at home here, and because
Some Preachers, vile ambitious bauds, and laws
Still new like fashions, bid him think that she
Which dwells with us, is only perfect, he Embraceth her, whom his godfathers will
Tender to him, being tender, as wards still Take such wives as their guardians offer, or Pay values. Careless Phrygius doth abhor [6]
All, because all cannot be good, as one
Knowing some women whores, dares marry none.
Graccus loves all as one, and thinks that so
As women do in divers countries go
In divers habits, yet are still one kind;
So doth, so is religion; and this blind-
Ness too much light breeds; but unmoved thou
Of force must one, and forc'd but one allow;
And the right; ask thy father which is she,
Let him ask his; though truth and falsehood be Near twins, yet truth a little elder is;
Be busy to seek her, believe me this,
He's not of none, nor worst, that seeks the best.
To adore, or scorn an image, or protest, [7]
May all be bad; doubt wisely, in strange way
To stand inquiring right, is not to stray;
To sleep, or run wrong, is: on a huge hill,
Cragg'd, and steep, Truth stands, and he that will Reach her, about must, and about must go;
And what the hill's suddenness resists, win so;
Yet strive so, that before age, death's twilight,
Thy soul rest, for none can work in that night.
To will, implies delay, therefore now do.
Hard deeds, the bodies' pains; hard knowledge too
The mind's endeavours reach, and mysteries
Are like the sun, dazzling, yet plain to all eyes;

---

[1] limbecks alembics, apparatus used in distilling (OED alembic 1).

[2] his whole Realm to be quit to have access to his whole realm in exchange for your soul. Quit, in this phrase, has the sense of being in exchange for something (OED v quit 11c).

[3] Mirreus…Crants…Graius…Phrygius…Graccus The five imaginary individuals presented by Donne represent various different sects of Christianity.

[4] as we here obey…statecloth where the Prince sat yesterday the royal canopy, still a symbol of respect even when the Prince is absent.

[5] Geneva Calvinism originated in Geneva.

[6] Pay values Wards who refused to marry their guardian's choice had to pay values or fines.

[7] protest protest against the Catholic church, ie. to convert to Protestantism.

Keep the truth which thou hast found; men do not stand
In so ill case here, that God hath with his hand
Sign'd King's blank-charters to kill whom they hate, [1]
Nor are they vicars, but hangmen to fate. [2]
Fool and wretch, wilt thou let thy soul be tied
To man's laws, by which she shall not be tried
At the last day? Will it then boot thee [3]
To say a Philip, or a Gregory,
A Harry, or a Martin taught thee this? [4]
Is not this excuse for mere contraries,
Equally strong? cannot both sides say so?
That thou mayest rightly obey power, her bounds know;
Those past, her nature, and name is chang'd; to be
Then humble to her is idolatry;
As streams are, Power is; those blest flowers that dwell
At the rough stream's calm head, thrive and do well,
But having left their roots, and themselves given
To the stream's tyrannous rage, alas are driven
Through mills, and rocks, and woods, and at last, almost
Consum'd in going, in the sea are lost:
So perish souls, which more choose men's unjust
Power from God claim'd, than God himself to trust.

DIVINE POEMS

Holy Sonnets

V

I am a little world made cunningly
Of elements, and an angelic sprite, [5]
But black sin hath betrayed to endless night
My world's both parts, and (oh) both parts must die.
You which beyond that heaven which was most high
Have found new spheres, and of new lands can write
Pour new seas in mine eyes, that so I might Drown my world with my weeping earnestly,
Or wash it if it must be drown'd no more:
But oh it must be burnt; alas the fire
Of lust and envy have burnt it heretofore,
And made it fouler; let their flames retire,
And burn me O Lord, with a fiery zeal
Of thee and thy house, which doth in eating heal.[6]
—1635

VI

This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint
My pilgrimage's last mile; and my race
Idly, yet quickly run, hath this last pace,
My span's last inch, my minute's latest point, [7]
And gluttonous death, will instantly unjoint
My body, and soul, and I shall sleep a space,
But my ever-waking part shall see that face, [8]
Whose fear already shakes my every joint:
Then, as my soul, to heaven her first seat, takes flight, [9]

[1] blank-charters documents given to agents of the Crown with power to fill it in as they please (OED a blank 10).

[2] vicars earthly representatives of God or Christ (OED vicar 1).

[3] boot profit (OED sb¹ boot 3).

[4] a Philip... or a Martin taught thee this Philip Philip II, the Catholic Ruler of Spain; Gregory one of several Pope Gregories; Harry Henry VIII who brought Protestantism to England, Martin Martin Luther.

[5] sprite spirit (OED sprite sb ¹)

[6] a fiery zeal/ Of thee and thy house For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up (Psalm 69:9).

[7] span life span.

[8] that face God's face.

[9] seat residence, abode (OED sb seat III).

And earth born body, in the earth shall dwell,
So, fall my sins, that all may have their right,
To where they are bred, and would press me, to hell.
Impute me righteous, thus purg'd of evil, [1]
For thus I leave the world, the flesh, and devil.
—1633

At the round earth's imagined corners, blow
Your trumpets, angels, and arise, arise
From death, you numberless infinities
Of souls, and to your scattered bodies go,
All whom the flood did, and fire shall o'erthrow,
All whom war, dearth, age, agues, tyrannies,
Despair, law, chance, hath slain, and you whose eyes
Shall behold god and never taste death's woe.[2]
But let them sleep, Lord, and me mourn a space,
For if above all these my sins abound,
'Tis late to ask abundance of thy grace
When we are there; here on this lowly ground,
Teach me how to repent; for that's as good
As if thou hadst sealed my pardon with thy blood.
—1633

IX

If poisonous minerals, and if that tree,
Whose fruit threw death on else immortal us,
If lecherous goats, if serpents envious
Cannot be damn'd; alas; why should I be
Why should intent or reason, born in me,
Make sins, else equal, in me more heinous
And mercy being easy, and glorious
To God, in his stern wrath, why threatens he?
But who am I, that dare dispute with thee
O God? Oh! of thine only worthy blood
And my tears, make a heavenly Lethean flood [3]
And drown in it my sins' black memory;
That thou remember them, some claim as debt,
I think it mercy, if thou wilt forget.
—1633

X

Death be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for, thou are not so,
For, those, whom thou think'st, thou dost overthrow,
Die not, poor death, nor yet canst thou kill me;
From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures be,
Much pleasure, then from thee, much more must flow,
And soonest our best men with thee do go,
Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.
Thou art slave to Fate, chance, kings, and desperate men,
And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell,
And poppy, or charms can make us sleep as well
And better then thy stroke; why swell'st thou then?
One short sleep past, we wake eternally,
And death shall be no more, Death, thou shalt die.
—1633

Spit in my face ye Jews, and pierce my side,
Buffet, and scoff, scourge, and crucify me,
For I have sinn'd, and sinn'd, and only he,
Who could do no iniquity, hath died:
But by my death can not be satisfied
My sins, which pass the Jews' impiety:
They kill'd once an inglorious man, but I
Crucify him daily, being now glorified; [4]
Oh let me then, his strange love still admire:
Kings pardon, but he bore our punishment.
And Jacob came cloth'd in vile harsh attire
But to supplant, and with gainful intent: [5]
God cloth'd himself in vile man's flesh, that so

---

[1] Impute Protestant teaching held that Christ's grace is imputed, or attributed, to Christians.

[2] See Luke 9:27.

[3] Lethean causing oblivion or forgetfulness (OED lethean a).

[4] Crucify him daily Heb 6:6.

[5] Jacob came cloth'd…to supplant Jacob, in order to steal his elder brother's blessing from his blind father Isaac, dressed in animal skins so that he would feel hairy like his brother (Genesis 27: 1–38).

He might be weak enough to suffer woe.

XII

Why are we by all creatures waited on?
Why do the prodigal elements supply [1]
Life and food to me, being more pure than I,
Simple, and further from corruption?
Why brook'st thou, ignorant horse, subjection?
Why dost thou bull, and boar so sillily
Dissemble weakness, and by one man's stroke die, [2]
Whose whole kind, you might swallow and feed upon?
Weaker I am, woe is me, and worse then you,
You have not sinn'd nor need be timorous,
But wonder at a greater wonder, for to us
Created nature doth these things subdue,
But their Creator, whom sin, nor nature tied,
For us, his creatures, and his foes, hath died.
—1633

XIII

What if this present were the world's last night?
Mark in my heart, O Soul, where thou dost dwell,
The picture of Christ crucified, and tell
Whether that countenance can thee affright,
Tears in his eyes quench the amazing light,
Blood fills his frowns, which from his pierc'd head fell,
And can that tongue adjudge thee unto hell,
Which pray'd forgiveness for his foes' fierce spite?
No, no; but as in my idolatry
I said to all my profane mistresses,
Beauty, of pity, foulness only is
A sign of rigour: so I say to thee
To wicked spirits are horrid shapes assign'd,
This beauteous form assures a piteous mind.
—1633

XIV

Batter my heart, three person'd God; for you [3]
As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;
That I may rise, and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend
Your force, to break, blow, burn and make me new.
I, like an usurped town, to another due,
Labour to admit you, but oh, to no end,
Reason your viceroy in me, me should defend,
But is captiv'd, and proves weak or untrue, [4]
Yet dearly I love you, and would be lov'd fain,
But am betroth'd unto your enemy,
Divorce me, untie, or break that knot again,
Take me to you, imprison me, for I
Except you enthral me, never shall be free,
Nor ever chaste, except you ravish me.

Holy Sonnets
from the Westmoreland MS [5]

XVII

Since she whom I lov'd hath paid her last debt
To Nature, and to hers, and my good is dead,
And her soul early into heaven ravished,
Wholly on heavenly things my mind is set.
Here the admiring her my mind did whet
To seek thee God; so streams do shew the head;
But though I have found thee, and thou my thirst hast fed,
A holy thirsty dropsy melts me yet. [6]
But why should I beg more love, when as thou
Dost woo my soul for hers; offring all thine:
And dost not only fear lest I allow
My love to saints and angels, things divine,

---

[1] prodigal wastefully lavish (OED prodigal a 2).

[2] Dissemble weakness that is, disguise their real nature so as to appear weak (*OED*dissemble v^1 1).

[3] three person'd God that is, Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

[4] viceroy Reason, God's viceroy in man, is vitiated by the Fall.

[5] This and the following two sonnets from the Westmoreland Manuscript were not printed until the nineteenth century.

[6] dropsy an instaiable thirst or craving (OED dropsy sb 2).

But in thy tender jealousy dost doubt
Least the world, flesh, yea Devil put thee out.

Show me dear Christ, thy spouse, so bright and clear. [1]
What! is it she, which on the other shore [2]
Goes richly painted? or which robbed and tore
Laments and mourns in Germany and here?
Sleeps she a thousand, then peeps up one year?
Is she self truth and errs? now new, now outwore? [3]
Doth she, and did she, and shall she evermore
On one, on seven, or on no hill appear? [4]
Dwells she with us, or like adventuring knights
First travail we to seek and then make love?
Betray kind husband thy spouse to our sights,
And let mine amorous soul court thy mild dove, [5]
Who is most true, and pleasing to thee, then
When she is embrac'd and open to most men.

Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one:
Inconstancy unnaturally hath begot
A constant habit; that when I would not
I change in vows, and in devotion.
As humorous is my contrition
As my profane love, and as soon forgot:
As riddlingly distempered, cold and hot, [6]
As praying, as mute; as infinite, as none.
I durst not view heaven yesterday; and today
In prayers, and flattering speeches I court God:
Tomorrow I quake with true fear of his rod.
So my devout fits come and go away
Like a fantastic ague: save that here
Those are my best days, when I shake with fear.[7]

Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward

Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this,
The intelligence that moves, devotion is, [8]
And as the other spheres, by being grown
Subject to foreign motions, lose their own, [9]
And being by others hurried every day,
Scarce in a year their natural form obey:
Pleasure or business, so, our souls admit
For their first mover, and are whirled by it. [10]
Hence is't, that I am carried towards the West
This day, when my soul's form bends towards the East.
There I should see a sun, by rising set,
And by that setting endless day beget;
But that Christ on this Cross, did rise and fall,
Sin had eternally benighted all. [11]
Yet dare I almost be glad, I do not see
That spectacle of too much weight for me.
Who sees God's face, that is self life, must die;

[1] thy spouse the Church (Revelation 21:2). Christ is the bridegroom.

[2] she which / Goes richly painted the Roman Catholic Church, contrasted with the Protestant church in Germany and England.

[3] Is she self truth and errs? The Church, as Christ's representative on earth, should be Truth (see John 14:6); but the conflicting claims of the competing branches of Christianity cannot all be true.

[4] On one, on seven, or on no hill appear the one hill may be a dual reference, to Mount Moriah, where Solomon built his temple, and St. Paul's, on Ludgate Hill; Rome is built on seven hills, Geneva on none.

[5] dove the turtle-dove symbolized marital fidelity; the Church is supposed to be filled with the holy spirit, also symbolized by the dove (Matthew 3:16and other places).

[6] distempered disordered condition of the body or mind (OED sb^{1} distempered 4).

[7] ague fit of shaking or shivering (OED ague 3).

[8] Let man's soul…devotion is The soul is (or should be) moved by devotion as the spheres are moved by intelligences.

[9] foreign motions Cosmologists of the time thought that the spheres were deflected from their natural orbit by various cosmic forces.

[10] first mover in reference to the Primum Mobile (first moving thing), supposed to revolve round the earth from east to west in twenty-four hours, carrying the other spheres with it (OED Primum Mobile).

[11] benighted involved in moral darkness (OED benight v 2b).

What a death were it then to see God die?
It made his own Lieutenant Nature shrink,
It made his footstool crack, and the Sun wink. [1]
Could I behold those hands which span the poles,
And tune all spheres at once pierc'd with those holes?
Could I behold that endless height which is
Zenith to us, and to our Antipodes, [2]
Humbled below us? or that blood which is
The seat of all our souls, if not of his,
Made dirt of dust, or that flesh which was worn
By God, for his apparel, ragg'd, and torn?
If on these things I durst not look, durst I
Upon his miserable mother cast mine eye,
Who was God's partner here, and furnish'd thus
Half of that sacrifice, which ransom'd us?
Though these things, as I ride, be from mine eye,
They are present yet unto my memory,
For that looks towards them; and thou look'st
  towards me,
O Saviour, as thou hang'st upon the tree;
I turn my back to thee, but to receive
Corrections, till thy mercies bid thee leave.
O think me worth thine anger, punish me,
Burn off my rusts, and my deformity,
Restore thine image, so much, by thy grace,
That thou may'st know me, and I'll turn my face.

A Hymn to Christ,
at the Author's last going into Germany [3]

In what torn ship soever I embark,
That ship shall be my emblem of thy Ark;
What sea soever swallow me, that flood
Shall be to me an emblem of thy blood;
Though thou with clouds of anger do disguise
Thy face, yet through that mask I know those eyes,
  Which, though they turn away sometimes,
    They never will despise.

I sacrifice this island unto thee,
And all whom I lov'd there, and who lov'd me;
When I have put our seas twixt them and me,
Put thou thy sea betwixt my sins and thee. [4]
As the tree's sap doth seek the root below
In winter, in my winter now I go,
  Where none but thee, th'eternal root
    Of true love I may know.

△ sticks out

Nor thou nor thy religion dost control,
The amorousness of an harmonious soul,
But thou would'st have that love thyself: as thou
Art jealous, Lord, so I am jealous now,
Thou lov'st not, till from loving more, thou free
My soul: Who ever gives, takes liberty:
  O, if thou car'st not whom I love
    Alas, thou lov'st not me.

△ sticks out

Seal then this bill of my divorce to all,
On whom those fainter beams of love did fall;
Marry those loves, which in youth scattered be
On fame, wit, hopes (false mistresses) to thee.
Churches are best for prayer, that have least light:
To see God only, I go out of sight:
  And to scape stormy days, I choose
    An everlasting night.

[1] his footstool crack, and the Sun wink The earth is held to be God's footstool (Isaiah 66:1); there was an earthquake at the crucifixion (Matthew 27: 51) and also an eclipse of the sun (Matthew 27:45).

[2] Zenith the highest point of the celestial sphere as viewed from any particular place (OED zenith 1); Antipodes places on the earth directly opposite to each other (OED antipodes sb 3).

[4] Put thou thy sea betwixt my sins and thee that is, the sea of Christ's blood.

And to scape stormy days, I choose
An everlasting night.

A Hymn to God my God, in my sickness

Since I am coming to that holy room,
Where, with thy choir of saints for evermore,
I shall be made thy music; as I come
I tune the instrument here at the door,
And what I must do then, think here before.

Whilst my physicians by their love are grown
Cosmographers, and I their map, who lie
Flat on this bed, that by them may be shown
That this is my southwest discovery
Per fretum febris, by these straits to die, [1]

I joy, that in these straits, I see my West;
For, though their currents yield return to none,
What shall my West hurt me? As West and East
In all flat maps (and I am one) are one,
So death doth touch the Resurrection.

Is the Pacific Sea my home? Or are
The Eastern riches? Is Jerusalem?
Anyan, and Magellan, and Gibraltar, [2]
All straits, and none but straits are ways to them
Whether where Japhet dwelt, or Cham, or Sem.[3]

We think that Paradise and Calvary,
Christ's cross, and Adam's tree, stood in one place; [4]
Look Lord, and find both Adams met in me; [5]
As the first Adam's sweat surrounds my face
May the last Adam's blood my soul embrace.

So, in his purple wrapp'd receive me Lord,
By these his thorns give me his other crown; [6]
And as to others' souls I preach'd thy word,
Be this my text, my sermon to mine own,
Therefore that he may raise the Lord throws down. [7]

A Hymn to God the Father

I

Wilt thou forgive that sin where I begun, [8]
Which was my sin, though it were done before?
Wilt thou forgive that sin, through which I run,
And do run still: though still I do deplore?
When thou hast done, thou hast not done,
For, I have more.

II

Wilt thou forgive that sin which I have won
Others to sin? and, made my sin their door?
Wilt thou forgive that sin which I did shun
A year, or two: but wallowed in, a score?
When thou hast done, thou has not done,
For I have more.

[1] Per fretum febris a pun, since "fretum" can mean both "strait" and "raging heat": through the strait (or raging heat) of fever.

[2] Anyan, and Magellan, and Gibraltar all straits; in relation to the first, it is not clear to which of the various possibilities Donne refers.

[3] Japhet dwelt, or Cham, or Sem The three sons of Noah divided the earth among them; Japhet took Europe, Ham Africa, and Shem Asia.

[4] Christ's cross, and Adam's tree...one place in reference to the tradition that Golgotha, the site of the crucifixion, occupied the same place as the Garden of Eden.

[5] both Adams Christ is the second Adam, who overcame the consequences of the sin of the first.

[6] his other crown the crown of eternal life.

[7] Therefore that he may raise the Lord throws down perhaps based on Psalm 145:14, "The Lord upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down."

[8] that sin where I begun in reference to "original sin": "Behold, I was shapen in wickedness, and in sin hath my mother conceived me" (Psalm 51:5).

III

I have a sin of fear, that when I have spun
My last thread, I shall perish on the shore;
But swear by thy self, that at my death thy son
Shall shine as he shines now, and heretofore;[1]
And, having done that, Thou hast done,
I fear no more.

Devotions: Upon Emergent Occasions

(excerpts)

IV. EXPOSTULATION

I have not the righteousness of Job, but I have the desire of Job: "I would speak to the Almighty, and I would reason with God" [Job 13:3]. My God, my God, how soon wouldst thou have me go to the physician, and how far wouldst thou have me go with the physician? I know thou hast made the matter, and the man, and the art; and I go not from thee when I go to the physician. Thou didst not make clothes before there was a shame of the nakedness of the body, but thou didst make physic before there was any grudging of any sickness; for thou didst imprint a medicinal virtue in many simples,[2] even from the beginning; didst thou mean that we should be sick when thou didst so? when thou madest them? No more than thou didst mean, that we should sin, when thou madest us: thou foresawest both, but causedst neither. Thou, Lord, promisest here trees, "whose fruit shall be for meat, and their leaves for medicine" [Ezek. 47:12]. It is the voice of thy Son, "Wilt thou be made whole?" [John 5:6] that draws from the patient a confession that he was ill, and could not make himself well. And it is thine own voice, "Is there no physician?" [Jer. 8:22] that inclines us, disposes us, to accept thine ordinance. And it is the voice of the wise man, both for the matter, physic itself, "The Lord hath created medicines out of the earth, and he that is wise shall not abhor them" [Ecclesiasticus 38:4], and for the art, and the person, the physician cutteth off a long disease. In all these voices thou sendest us to those helps which thou hast afforded us in that. But wilt not thou avow that voice too, "He that hath sinned against his Maker, let him fall into the hands of the physician" [Ecclesiasticus 38:15]; and wilt not thou afford me an understanding of those words? Thou, who sendest us for a blessing to the physician, dost not make it a curse to us to go when thou sendest. Is not the curse rather in this, that only he falls into the hands of the physician, that casts himself wholly, entirely upon the physician, confides in him, relies upon him, attends all from him, and neglects that spiritual physic which thou also hast instituted in thy church. So to fall into the hands of the physician is a sin, and a punishment of former sins; so, as Asa fell, who in his disease "sought not to the Lord, but to the physician" [I Chron. 16:12]. Reveal therefore to me thy method, O Lord, and see whether I have followed it; that thou mayest have glory, if I have, and I pardon, if I have not, and help that I may. Thy method is, "In time of thy sickness, be not negligent": wherein wilt thou have my diligence expressed? "Pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole" [Ecclesiasticus 38:9]. O Lord, I do; I pray, and pray thy servant David's prayer, "Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am weak; heal me, O Lord, for my bones are vexed" [Psalm 6:2]: I know that even my weakness is a reason, a motive, to induce thy mercy, and my sickness an occasion of thy sending health. When art thou so ready, when is it so seasonable to thee, to commiserate, as in misery? But is prayer for health in season, as soon as I am sick? Thy method goes further: "Leave off from sin, and order thy hands aright, and cleanse thy heart from all wickedness" [Ecclesiasticus 38:10]. Have I, O Lord, done so? O Lord, I have; by thy grace, I am come to a holy detestation of my former sin. Is there anymore? In thy method there is more: "Give a sweet savour, and a memorial of fine flour, and make a fat offering, as not being" [Ecclesiasticus 38:11]. And, Lord, by thy grace, I have done that, sacrificed a little of that little which thou lentest me, to them for whom thou lentest it: and now in thy method, and by thy steps, I am come to that, "Then give place to the physician, for the Lord hath created him; let him not go from thee, for thou hast need of him" [Ecclesiasticus 38:12]. I send for the physician, but I will hear him enter with those words of Peter, "Jesus Christ maketh thee whole" [Acts 9:34]; I long for his presence, but I look "that the power of the Lord should be present to heal me" [Luke 5:17].

[1] thy son / Shall shine as he shines now The symbolic equation of Christ and the Sun originates in Malachi 4:2: "But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings."

[2] simples herbs or other plants used for medicinal purposes.

V. MEDITATION

SOLUS ADEST
The physician comes

As sickness is the greatest misery, so the greatest misery of sickness is solitude; when the infectiousness of the disease deters them who should assist from coming; even the physician dares scarce come. Solitude is a torment which is not threatened in hell itself. Mere vacuity, the first agent, God, the first instrument of God, nature, will not admit; nothing can be utterly empty, but so near a degree towards vacuity as solitude, to be but one, they love not. When I am dead, and my body might infect, they have a remedy, they may bury me; but when I am but sick, and might infect, they have no remedy but their absence, and my solitude. It is an excuse to them that are great, and pretend, and yet are loath to come; it is an inhibition to those who would truly come, because they may be made instruments, and pestiducts,[1] to the infection of others, by their coming. And it is an outlawry, an excommunication upon the patient, and separates him from all offices, not only of civility but of working charity. A long sickness will weary friends at last, but a pestilential sickness averts them from the beginning. God himself would admit a figure of society, as there is a plurality of persons in God, though there be but one God; and all his external actions testify a love of society, and communion. In heaven there are orders of angels, and armies of martyrs, and in that house many mansions; in earth, families, cities, churches, colleges, all plural things; and lest either of these should not be company enough alone, there is an association of both, a communion of saints which makes the militant and triumphant church one parish; so that Christ was not out of his diocese when he was upon the earth, nor out of his temple when he was in our flesh. God, who saw that all that he made was good, came not so near seeing a defect in any of his works, as when he saw that it was not good for man to be alone, therefore he made him a helper; and one that should help him so as to increase the number, and give him her own, and more society. Angels, who do not propagate nor multiply, were made at first in an abundant number, and so were stars; but for the things of this world, their blessing was, Increase; for I think, I need not ask leave to think, that there is no phoenix; nothing singular, nothing alone. Men that inhere upon nature only, are so far from thinking that there is any thing singular in this world, as that they will scarce think that this world itself is singular, but that every planet, and every star, is another world like this; they find reason to conceive not only a plurality in every species in the world, but a plurality of worlds; so that the abhorrers of solitude are not solitary, for God, and Nature, and Reason concur against it. Now a man may counterfeit the plague in a vow, and mistake a disease for religion, by such a retiring and recluding of himself from all men as to do good to no man, to converse with no man. God hath two testaments, two wills; but this is a schedule, and not of his, a codicil, and not of his, not in the body of his testaments, but interlined and postscribed by others, that the way to the communion of saints should be by such a solitude as excludes all doing of good here. That is a disease of the mind, as the height of an infectious disease of the body is solitude, to be left alone: for this makes an infectious bed equal, nay, worse than a grave, that though in both I be equally alone, in my bed I know it, and feel it, and shall not in my grave: and this too, that in my bed my soul is still in an infectious body, and shall not in my grave be so.

XVII. MEDITATION

NUNC LENTO SONITU DICUNT, MORIERIS
Now, this bell tolling softly for another, says to me:
Thou must die

Perchance he for whom this bell tolls may be so ill, as that he knows not it tolls for him; and perchance I may think myself so much better than I am, as that they who are about me, and see my state, may have caused it to toll for me, and I know not that. The church is Catholic, universal, so are all her actions; all that she does belongs to all. When she baptizes a child, that action concerns me; for that child is thereby connected to that body which is my head too, and ingrafted into that body whereof I am a member. And when she buries a man, that action concerns me: all mankind is of one author, and is one volume; when one man dies, one chapter is not torn out of the book, but translated into a better language; and every chapter must be so translated; God employs several translators; some pieces are translated by age, some by sickness, some by war, some by justice; but God's hand is in every translation, and his hand shall bind up all our scattered leaves again for that library where every book shall lie open to one another. As therefore the bell that rings to a sermon calls not upon the preacher only, but upon the congregation to come, so this bell calls us all; but how much more me, who am brought so near the door by this sickness. There was a contention as far as a suit (in which both piety and dignity, religion and estimation, were mingled), which of the religious orders should ring to prayers first in the morning; and it was determined, that they should ring first that rose earliest. If we understand aright the dignity of this bell that tolls for our evening prayer, we would be glad to make it ours by rising early, in that application, that it might be ours as well as his, whose indeed it is. The bell doth toll for him that thinks it doth; and though it intermit again, yet from that minute that that occasion wrought upon him, he is united to God. Who casts not up his eye to the sun when it rises? but who takes off his eye from a comet when that breaks out? Who bends not his ear to any bell which upon any occasion rings? but who can remove it from that bell which is passing a piece of himself out of this world? No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main. If a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were, as well as if a manor of thy friend's or of thine own were: any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind, and therefore never send to know for whom the bells tolls; it tolls for thee. Neither can we call this a begging of misery, or a borrowing of misery, as though we were not miserable enough of ourselves, but must fetch in more from the next house, in taking upon us the misery of our neighbours. Truly it were an excusable covetousness if we did, for affliction is a treasure, and scarce any man hath enough of it. No man hath affliction enough that is not matured and ripened by it, and made fit for God by that affliction. If a man carry treasure in bullion, or in a wedge of gold, and have none coined into current money, his treasure will not defray him as he travels. Tribulation is treasure in the nature of it, but it is not current money in the use of it, except we get nearer and nearer our home, heaven, by it. Another man may be sick too, and sick to death, and this affliction may lie in his bowels, as gold in a mine, and be of no use to him; but this bell, that tells me of his affliction, digs out and applies that gold to me: if by this consideration of another's danger I take mine own into contemplation, and so secure myself, by making my recourse to my God, who is our only security.

XXI. MEDITATION

ATQUE ANNUIT ILLE, QUI, PER EOS,
CLAMAT, LINQUAS JAM, LAZARE, LECTUM
God prospers their practice, and he, by them, calls
Lazarus out of his tomb, me out of my bed

If man had been left alone in this world at first, shall I think that he would not have fallen? If there had been no woman, would not man have served to have been his own tempter? When I see him now subject to infinite weaknesses, fall into infinite sin without any foreign temptations, shall I think he would have had none, if he had been alone? God saw that man needed a helper, if he should be well; but to make woman ill, the devil saw that there needed no third. When God and we were alone in Adam, that was not enough; when the devil and we were alone in Eve, it was enough. O what a giant is man when he fights against himself, and what a dwarf when he needs or exercises his own assistance for himself? I cannot rise out of my bed till the physician enable me, nay, I cannot tell that I am able to rise till he tell me so. I do nothing, I know nothing of myself; how little and how impotent a piece of the world is any man alone? And how much less a piece of himself is that man? So little as that when it falls out (as it falls out in some cases) that more misery and more oppression would be an ease to a man, he cannot give himself that miserable addition of more misery. A man that is pressed to death, and might be eased by more weights, cannot lay those more weights upon himself: he can sin alone, and suffer alone, but not repent, not be absolved, without another. Another tells me, I may rise; and I do so. But is every raising a preferment? or is every present preferment a station? I am readier to fall to the earth, now I am up, than I was when I lay in the bed. O perverse way, irregular motion of man; even rising itself is the way to ruin! How many men are raised, and then do not fill the place they are raised to? No corner of any place can be empty; there can be no vacuity. If that man do not fill the place, other men will; complaints of his insufficiency will fill it; nay, such an abhorring is there in nature of vacuity, that if there be but an imagination of not filling, in any man, that which is but imagination, neither will fill it, that is, rumour and voice, and it will be given out (upon no ground but imagination, and no man knows whose imagination), that he is corrupt in his place, or insufficient in his place, and another prepared to succeed him in his place. A man rises sometimes and stands not, because he doth not or is not believed to fill his place; and sometimes he stands not because he overfills his place. He may bring so much virtue, so much justice, so much integrity to the place, as shall spoil the place, burthen the place; his integrity may be a libel upon his predecessor and cast an infamy upon him, and a burthen upon his successor to proceed by example, and to bring the place itself to an undervalue and the market to an uncertainty. I am up, and I seem to stand, and I go round, and I am a new argument of the new philosophy, that the earth moves round; why may I not believe that the whole earth moves, in a round motion, though that seem to me to stand, when as I seem to stand to my company, and yet am carried in a giddy and circular motion as I stand? Man hath no centre but misery; there, and only there, he is fixed, and sure to find himself. How little soever he be raised, he moves, and moves in a circle giddily; and as in the heavens there are but a few circles that go about the whole world, but many epicycles, and other lesser circles, but yet circles; so of those men which are raised and put into circles, few of them move from place to place, and pass through many and beneficial places, but fall into little circles, and, within a step or two, are at their end, and not so well as they were in the centre, from which they were raised. Every thing serves to exemplify, to illustrate man's misery. But I need go no farther than myself: for a long time I was not able to rise; at last I must be raised by others; and now I am up, I am ready to sink lower than before.

—1624

The second of my Prebend Sermons upon my five Psalms. Preached at S. Paul's, January 29, 1626

PSAL. 63:7 Because thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice.

The Psalms are the manna of the church. As manna tasted to every man like that that he liked best,[1] so do the Psalms minister instructions, and satisfaction, to every man, in every emergency and occasion. David was not only a clear prophet of Christ himself, but a prophet of every particular Christian; he foretells what I, what any shall do, and suffer, and say. And as the whole book of Psalms is Oleum effusum (as the spouse speaks of the name of Christ),[2] an ointment poured out upon all sorts of sores, a cerecloth that supples all bruises, a balm that searches all wounds; so are there some certain Psalms, that are imperial Psalms, that command over all affections, and spread themselves over all occasions, Catholic, universal Psalms, that apply themselves to all necessities. This is one of those; for, of those constitutions which are called apostolical, one is, that the church should meet every day, to sing this Psalm.[3] And accordingly, S. Chrysostome testifies,[4] that it was decreed, and ordained by the primitive fathers, that no day should pass without the public singing of this Psalm. Under both these obligations (those ancient constitutions, called the Apostles, and those ancient decrees made by the primitive fathers) belongs to me, who have my part in the service of God's church, the especial meditation, and recommendation of this Psalm. And under a third obligation too, that it is one of those five Psalms, the daily rehearsing whereof, is enjoined to me, by the constitutions of this church, as five other are to every other person of our body. As the whole book is manna, so these five Psalms are my Gomer, which I am to fill and empty every day of this manna.[5]

Now as the spirit and soul of the whole book of Psalms is contracted into this Psalm, so is the spirit and soul of this whole Psalm contracted into this verse. The key of the psalm (as S. Jerome calls the titles of the Psalms) tells us, that David uttered this Psalm, "when he was in the wilderness of Judah";

[1] "thou...didst send them from heaven bread prepared without their labour, able to content every man's delight and agreeable to every taste" (Wisdom of Solomon 16:20). For "manna" see Exodus 16:11–15. See also ODCC "Psalms, Book of." This records that the whole Psalter was recited every week in the Roman Catholic Church, and every month in the Church of England .

[2] "thy name is as ointment poured forth" (Song of Solomon 1:3). This work was interpreted as referring to Christ's love for the Church.

[3] The Apostolic Constitutions: a work of the late fourth century, dealing with, among other matters, the official responsibilities of the clergy. See ODCC, "Apostolic Canons."

[4] St. John Chrysostom (ca. 347–407) has been described as the greatest of Christian expositors.

[5] Exodus 16:16. The Vulgate has "gomor," AV "omer."

there we see the present occasion that moved him; and we see what was passed between God and him before, in the first clause of our text ("Because thou hast been my help"); and then we see what was to come, by the rest ("Therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice"). So that we have here the whole compass of time, past, present, and future; and these three parts of time, shall be at this time, the three parts of this exercise; first, what David's distress put him upon for the present; and that lies in the context; secondly, how David built his assurance upon that which was past ("Because thou hast been my help"); and thirdly, what he established to himself for the future ("Therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice"). First, his distress in the wilderness, his present estate carried him upon the memory of that which God had done for him before, and the remembrance of that carried him upon that, of which he assured himself after. Fix upon God any where, and you shall find him a circle; he is with you now, when you fix upon him; he was with you before, for he brought you to this fixation; and he will be with you hereafter, for "He is yesterday, and today, and the same for ever."

For David's present condition, who was now in a banishment, in a persecution in the wilderness of Judah, (which is our first part) we shall only insist upon that (which is indeed spread over all the Psalm to the text, and ratified in the text) that in all those temporal calamities David was only sensible of his spiritual loss; it grieved him not that he was kept from Saul's court, but that he was kept from God's church.[1] For when he says, by way of lamentation, "That he was in a dry and thirsty land, where no water was,"[2] he expresses what penury, what barrenness, what drought and what thirst he meant; "To see thy power, and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary." For there, "my soul shall be satisfied as with marrow, and with fatness," and there, "my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips." And in some few considerations conducing to this, that spiritual losses are incomparably heavier than temporal, and that therefore, the restitution to our spiritual happiness, or the continuation of it, is rather to be made the subject of our prayers to God, in all pressures and distresses, than of temporal, we shall determine that first part. And for the particular branches of both the other parts (the remembering of God's benefits past, and the building of an assurance for the future, upon that remembrance), it may be fitter to open them to you anon when we come to handle them, than now. Proceed we now to our first part, the comparing of temporal and spiritual afflictions.

In the way of this comparison, falls first the consideration of the universality of afflictions in general, and the inevitableness thereof. It is a blessed metaphor, that the Holy Ghost hath put into the mouth of the Apostle, Pondus Gloriae, that our afflictions are but light, because there is an exceeding, and an eternal weight of glory attending them.[3] If it were not for that exceeding weight of glory, no other weight in this world could turn the scale, or weigh down those infinite weights of afflictions that oppress us here. There is not only Pestis valde gravis ("the pestilence grows heavy upon the land"), but there is Musca valde gravis, God calls in but the fly, to vex Egypt, and even the fly is a heavy burden unto them. It is not only Job that complains, "That he was a burden to himself," but even Absalom's hair was a burden to him, till it was pulled. It is not only Jeremy that complains, Aggravavit compedes, that God had made their fetters and their chains heavy to them, but the workmen in harvest complain, that God had made a fair day heavy unto them ("We have borne the heat, and the burden of the day").[1] "Sand is heavy," says Solomon; and how many suffer so? under a sand-hill of crosses, daily, hourly afflictions, that are heavy by their number, if not by their single weight? And "a stone is heavy" (says he in the same place); and how many suffer so?[2] How many, without any former preparatory cross, or comminatory, or commonitory cross, even in the midst of prosperity, and security, fall under some one stone, some grindstone, some mill-stone, some one insupportable cross that ruins them? But then (says Solomon there), "A fool's anger is heavier than both"; and how many children, and servants, and wives suffer under the anger, and morosity, and peevishness, and jealousy of foolish masters, and parents, and husbands, though they must not say so? David and Solomon have cried out, that all this world is vanity, and levity; and (God knows) all is weight, and burden, and heaviness, and oppression; and if there were not a weight of future glory to counterpose it, we should all sink into nothing.

[1] Donne is relying on Psalm 63, rather than on the story of David in I and II Samuel. Apart from St. Jerome and, in the Reformation, Calvin, most authorities until after Donne's time thought of David as the author of all the Psalms.

[2] Psalm 63:1.

[3] II Corinthians 4:17.

I ask not Mary Magdalen, whether lightness were not a burden (for sin is certainly, sensibly a burden); but I ask Susanna whether even chaste beauty were not a burden to her; and I ask Joseph whether personal comeliness were not a burden to him.[3] I ask not Dives, who perished in the next world, the question; but I ask them who are made examples of Solomon's rule, of that "sore evil" (as he calls it), "Riches kept to the owners thereof for their hurt," whether riches be not a burden.[4]

All our life is a continual burden, yet we must not groan; a continual squeezing, yet we must not pant; and as in the tenderness of our childhood, we suffer, and yet are whipped if we cry, so we are complained of, if we complain, and made delinquents if we call the times ill. And that which adds weight to weight, and multiplies the sadness of this consideration, is this, that still the best men have had most laid upon them. As soon as I hear God say, that he hath found "an upright man, that fears God, and eschews evil," in the next lines I find a commission to Satan, to bring in Sabians and Chaldeans upon his cattle, and servants, and fire and tempest upon his children, and loathsome diseases upon himself.[5] As soon as I hear God say, that he hath found "a man according to his own heart," I see his sons ravish his daughters, and then murder one another, and then rebel against the father, and put him into straits for his life. As soon as I hear God testify of Christ at his baptism, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased," I find that Son of his "led up by the spirit, to be tempted of the Devil." And after I hear God ratify the same testimony again, at his Transfiguration ("This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased"), I find that beloved Son of his, deserted, abandoned, and given over to scribes, and Pharisees, and publicans, and Herodians, and priests, and soldiers, and people, and judges, and witnesses, and executioners, and he that was called the beloved Son of God, and made partaker of the glory of Heaven, in this world, in his Transfiguration, is made now the sower of all the corruption, of all the sins of this world, as no Son of God, but a mere man, as no man, but a contemptible worm. As though the greatest weakness in this world, were man, and the greatest fault in man were to be good, man is more miserable than other creatures, and good men more miserable than any other men.

[3] St. Mary Magdalen, on the basis of Luke 7:37, has been thought of through Christian history as a reformed prostitute. For Susanna, see the Story of Susanna in the Apocrypha (an early detective story, incidentally); for Joseph's resistance to the blandishments of Potiphar's wife, see Genesis 39.

[4] Dives a Latin adjective meaning "rich." It came to be used as the name of the rich man; see Luke 16:19–31. For the quotation from Solomon see Ecclesiastes 5:13.

[5] See Job 1.

But then there is Pondus Gloriae, "An exceeding weight of eternal glory," and that turns the scale; for as it makes all worldly prosperity as dung, so it makes all worldly adversity as feathers. And so it had need; for in the scale against it, there are not only put temporal afflictions, but spiritual too; and to these two kinds, we may accommodate those words, "He that falls upon this stone" (upon temporal afflictions), may be bruised, broken, "But he upon whom that stone falls" (spiritual afflictions), "is in danger to be ground to powder." And then, the great, and yet ordinary danger is, that these spiritual afflictions grow out of temporal; murmuring, and diffidence in God, and obduration, out of worldly calamities; and so against nature, the fruit is greater and heavier than the tree, spiritual heavier than temporal afflictions.

They who write of natural story,[1] propose that plant for the greatest wonder in nature, which being no firmer then a bull-rush, or a reed, produces and bears for the fruit thereof no other but an entire, and very hard stone. That temporal affliction should produce spiritual stoniness, and obduration, is unnatural, yet ordinary. Therefore doth God propose it, as one of those greatest blessings, which he multiplies upon his people, "I will take away your stony hearts, and give you hearts of flesh"; and, Lord let me have a fleshly heart in any sense, rather than a stony heart.[2] We find mention amongst the observers of rarities in nature, of hairy hearts, hearts of men, that have been overgrown with hair; but of petrified hearts, hearts of men grown into stone, we read not; for this petrifaction of the heart, this stupefaction of a man, is the last blow of God's hand upon the heart of man in this world. Those great afflictions which are poured out of the vials of the seven Angels upon the world, are still accompanied with that heavy effect, that that affliction hardened them. "They were scorched with heats and plagues," by the fourth Angel, and it follows, "They blasphemed the name of God, and repented not, to give him glory." Darkness was induced upon them by the fifth Angel, and it follows, "They blasphemed the God of Heaven, and repented not of their deeds." And from the seventh Angel there fell hailstones of the weight of talents (perchance four pound weight), upon men; and yet these men had so much life left, as to blaspheme God, out of that respect, which alone should have brought them to glorify God, "Because the plague thereof was exceeding great."[3] And when a great plague brings them to blaspheme, how great shall that second plague be, that comes upon them for blaspheming?

Let me wither and wear out mine age in a discomfortable, in an unwholesome, in a penurious prison, and so pay my debts with my bones, and recompense the wastefulness of my youth, with the beggary of mine age; let me wither in a spittle under sharp, and foul, and infamous diseases, and so recompense the wantonness of my youth, with that loathsomeness in mine age; yet, if God withdraw not his spiritual blessings, his grace, his patience, if I can call my suffering his doing, my passion his action, all this that is temporal, is but a caterpillar got into one corner of my garden, but a mildew fallen upon one acre of my corn; the body of all, the substance of all is safe, as long as the soul is safe.[4] But when I shall trust to that, which we call a good spirit, and God shall deject, and impoverish, and evacuate that spirit, when I shall rely upon a moral constancy, and God shall shake, and enfeeble, and enervate, destroy and demolish that constancy; when I shall think to refresh my self in the serenity and sweet air of a good conscience, and God shall call up the damps and vapors of Hell itself, and spread a cloud of diffidence, and an impenetrable crust of desperation upon my conscience; when health shall fly from me, and I shall lay hold upon riches to succor me, and comfort me in my sickness, and riches shall fly from me, and I shall snatch after favor, and good opinion, to comfort me in my poverty; when even this good opinion shall leave me, and calumnies and misinformations shall prevail against me; when I shall need peace, because there is none but thou, O Lord, that should stand for me, and then shall find, that all the wounds that I have, come from thy hand, all the arrows that stick in me, from thy quiver; when I shall see, that because I have given my self to my corrupt nature, thou hast changed thine; and because I am all evil towards thee, therefore thou hast given over being good towards me; when it comes to this height, that the fever is not in the humors, but in the spirits, that mine enemy is not an imaginary enemy, fortune, nor a transitory enemy, malice in great persons, but a real, and an irresistible, and an inexorable, and an everlasting enemy, the Lord of Hosts himself, the Almighty God himself, the Almighty God himself only knows the weight of this affliction, and except he put in that pondus gloriae, that exceeding weight of an eternal glory, with his own hand, into the other scale, we are weighed down, we are swallowed up, irreparably, irrevocably, irrecoverably, irremediably.

[3] See Revelation 16, especially verses 1, 9,11, and 21.

[4] This whole paragraph, from "Let me wither" to "irremediably," should be read aloud if its beauty is to be fully appreciated.

This is the fearful depth, this is spiritual misery, to be thus fallen from God. But was this David's case? was he fallen thus far, into a diffidence in God? No. But the danger, the precipice, the slippery sliding into that bottomless depth, is, to be excluded from the means of coming to God, or staying with God; and this is that that David laments here, that by being banished, and driven into the wilderness of Judah, he had not access to the Sanctuary of the Lord, to sacrifice his part in the praise, and to receive his part in the prayers of the congregation; for Angels pass not to ends, but by ways and means, nor men to the glory of the triumphant Church, but by participation of the Communion of the Militant. To this note David sets his harp, in many, many Psalms: Sometimes, that God had suffered his enemies to possess his tabernacle ("He forsook the Tabernacle of Shiloh, he delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemies' hands"), but most commonly he complains, that God disabled him from coming to the Sanctuary. In which one thing he had summed up all his desires, all his prayers ("One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I look after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord, all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to enquire in his Temple"), his vehement desire of this, he expresses again ("My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?"), he expresses a holy jealousy, a religious envy, even to the sparrows and swallows (yea, "the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for her self, and where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of Hosts, my King and my God"). Thou art my King, and my God, and yet excludest me from that, which thou affordest to sparrows, "And are not we of more value than many sparrows?"

And as though David felt some false ease, some half-tentation,[1] some whispering that way, that God is in the wilderness of Judah, in every place, as well as in his Sanctuary, there is in the original in that place, a pathetical, a vehement, a broken expressing expressed, "O thine altars"; it is true (says David), thou art here in the wilderness, and I may see thee here, and serve thee here, but, "O thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God." When David could not come in person to that place, yet he bent towards the Temple ("In thy fear will I worship towards thy holy Temple"). Which was also Daniel's devotion; when he prayed, "his chamber windows were open towards Jerusalem"; and so is Hezekiah's turning to the wall to weep, and to pray in his sick bed, understood to be to that purpose, to conform, and compose himself towards the Temple. In the place consecrated for that use, God by Moses fixes the service, and fixes the reward; and towards that place (when they could not come to it), doth Solomon direct their devotion in the consecration of the Temple ("when they are in the wars, when they are in captivity, and pray towards this house, do thou hear them"). For, as in private prayer, when (according to Christ's command) we are shut in our chamber, there is exercised Modestia fidei, the modesty and bashfulness of our faith, not pressing upon God in his house: so in the public prayers of the congregation, there is exercised the fervor, and holy courage of our faith, for Agmine facto obsidemus Deum, it is a mustering of our forces, and a besieging of God. Therefore does David so much magnify their blessedness, that are in this house of God ("Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, for they will be still praising thee"); those that look towards it, may praise thee sometimes, but those men who dwell in the Church, and whose whole service lies in the Church, have certainly an advantage of all other men (who are necessarily withdrawn by worldly business) in making themselves acceptable to almighty God, if they do their duties, and observe their church-services aright.

[1] tentation temptation (OED).

Man being therefore thus subject naturally to manifold calamities, and spiritual calamities being incomparably heavier than temporal, and the greatest danger of falling into such spiritual calamities being in our absence from God's Church, where only the outward means of happiness are ministered unto us, certainly there is much tenderness and deliberation to be used, before the Church doors be shut against any man. If I would not direct a prayer to God, to excommunicate any man from the Triumphant Church (which were to damn him), I would not oil the key, I would not make the way too slippery for excommunications in the Militant Church; for, that is to endanger him. I know how distasteful a sin to God, contumacy, and contempt, and disobedience to order and authority is; and I know (and all men, that choose not ignorance, may know), that our excommunications (though calumniators impute them to small things, because, many times, the first complaint is of some small matter) never issue but upon contumacies, contempts, disobediences to the Church. But they are real contumacies, not interpretative, apparent contumacies, not presumptive, that excommunicate a man in Heaven; and much circumspection is required, and (I am far from doubting it) exercised in those cases upon earth; for, though every excommunication upon earth be not sealed in Heaven, though it damn not the man, yet it damns up that man's way, by shutting him out of that Church, through which he must go to the other; which being so great a danger, let every man take heed of excommunicating himself. The impersuasible recusant does so; the negligent libertine does; the fantastic separatist does so; the half-present man, he, whose body is here, and mind away, does so; and he, whose body is but half here, his limbs are here upon a cushion, but his eyes, his ears are not here, does so: All these are self-excommunicators, and keep themselves from hence. Only he enjoys that blessing, the want whereof David deplores, that is here entirely, and is glad he is here, and glad to find this kind of service here, that he does, and wishes no other.

And so we have done with our first part, David's aspect, his present condition, and his danger of falling into spiritual miseries, because his persecution, and banishment amounted to an excommunication, to an excluding of him from the service of God, in the church. And we pass, in our order proposed at first, to the second, his retrospect, the consideration what God had done for him before, "Because thou hast been my help."

Through this second part, we shall pass by these three steps. First, that it behoves us, in all our purposes, and actions, to propose to ourselves a copy to write by, a pattern to work by, a rule, or an example to proceed by. Because it hath been thus heretofore, says David, I will resolve upon this course for the future.[1] And secondly, that the copy, the pattern, the precedent which we are to propose to ourselves, is, the observation of God's former ways and proceedings upon us, because God hath already gone this way, this way I will await his going still. And then, thirdly and lastly, in this second part, the way that God had formerly gone with David, which was, that he had been his help ("Because thou hast been my help").

First then, from the meanest artificer, through the wisest philosopher, to God himself, all that is well done, or wisely undertaken, is undertaken and done according to ourselves beforehand. A carpenter builds not a house, but that he first sets up a frame in his own mind, what kind of house he will build. The little great philosopher Epictetus, would undertake no action, but he would first propose to himself, what Socrates, or Plato, what a wise man would do in that case, and according to that, he would proceed. Of God himself, it is safely resolved in the School, that he never did any thing in any part of time, of which he had not an eternal preconception, an eternal idea, in himself before. Of which ideas, that is, preconceptions, predeterminations in God, S. Augustine pronounces, Tanta vis in Ideis constituitur, there is so much truth, and so much power in these ideas, as that without acknowledging them, no man can acknowledge God, for he does not allow God counsel, and wisdom, and deliberation in his actions, but sets God on work, before he have thought what he will do. And therefore he, and others of the Fathers read that place (which we read otherwise), Quod factum est, in ipso vita erat; that is, in all their expositions, whatsoever is made, in time, was alive in God, before it was made, that is, in that eternal idea, and pattern which was in him. So also do divers of those fathers read those words to the Hebrews (which we read, "the things that are seen, are not made of things that do appear"), Ex invisibilibus visibilia facta sunt, "Things formerly invisible, were made visible"; that is, we see then not till now, till they are made, but they had an invisible being, in that idea, in that prenotion, in that purpose of God before, for ever before. Of all things in Heaven, and earth, but of himself, God had an idea, a pattern in himself, before he made it.

And therefore let him be our pattern for that, to work after patterns; to propose to ourselves rules and examples for all our actions; and the more, the more immediately, the more directly our actions concern the service of God. If I ask God, by what idea he made me, God produces his Faciamus hominem ad Imaginem nostram,[2] that there was a concurrence of the whole Trinity, to make me in Adam, according to that image which they were, and according to that idea, which they had predetermined. If I pretend to serve God, and he ask me for my idea, how I mean to serve him, shall I be able to produce none? If he ask me an idea of my religion, and my opinions, shall I not be able to say, it is that which thy word, and thy Catholic Church hath imprinted in me? If he ask me an idea of my prayers, shall I not be able to say, it is that which my particular necessities, that which the form prescribed by thy Son, that which the care, and piety of the Church, in conceiving fit prayers, hath imprinted in me? If he ask me an idea of my sermons, shall I not be able to say, it is that which the analogy of faith, the edification of the congregation, the zeal of thy work, the meditations of my heart have imprinted in me? But if I come to pray or to preach without this kind of idea, if I come to extemporal prayer, and extemporal preaching, I shall come to an extemporal faith, and extemporal religion; and then I must look for an extemporal Heaven, a Heaven to be made for me; for to that Heaven which belongs to the Catholic Church, I shall never come, except I go by the way of the Catholic Church, by former ideas, former examples, former patterns, to believe according to ancient beliefs, to pray according to ancient forms, to preach according to former meditations. God does nothing, man does nothing well, without these ideas, these retrospects, this recourse to preconceptions, pre-deliberations.

[2] "Let us make man in our own image" (Genesis 1:26).

Something then I must propose to myself, to be the rule, and the reason of my present and future actions; which was our first branch in this second part; and then the second is, that I can propose nothing more availably, than the contemplation of the history of God's former proceeding with me; which is David's way here, because this was God's way before, I will look for God in this way still. That language in which God spake to man, the Hebrew, hath no present tense; they form not their verbs as our Western languages do, in the present, "I hear," or "I see," or "I read," but they begin at that which is past, "I have seen" and "heard," and "read." God carries us in his language, in his speaking, upon that which is past, upon that which he hath done already; I cannot have better security for present, nor future, than God's former mercies exhibited to me. Quis non gaudeat, says S. Augustine, who does not triumph with joy, when he considers what God hath done? Quis non & ea, quae nondum venerunt, ventura sperat, propter illa, quæ jam tanta impleta sunt? Who can doubt of the performance of all, that sees the greatest part of a prophecy performed? If I have found that true that God hath said, of the person of Antichrist, why should I doubt of that which he says of the ruin of Antichrist? Credamus modicum quod restat, says the same Father, it is much that we have seen done, and it is but little that God hath reserved to our faith, to believe that it shall be done.

There is no state, no church, no man, that hath not this tie upon God, that hath not God in these bands, that God by having done much for them already, hath bound himself to do more. Men proceed in their former ways, sometimes, lest they should confess an error, and acknowledge that they had been in a wrong way. God is obnoxious to no error, and therefore he does still, as he did before. Every one of you can say now to God, Lord, thou broughtest me hither, therefore enable me to hear; Lord, thou dost that, therefore make me understand; and that, therefore let me believe; and that too, therefore strengthen me to the practice; and all that, therefore continue me to a perseverance. Carry it up to the first sense and apprehension that ever thou hadst of God's working upon thee, either in thy self, when thou camest first to the use of reason, or in others in thy behalf, in thy baptism, yet when thou thinkest thou art at the first, God had done something for thee before all that; before that, he had elected thee, in that election which S. Augustine speaks of, Habet electos, quos creaturus est eligendos, God hath elected certain men, whom he intends to create, that he may elect them; that is, that he may declare his election upon them. God had thee, before he made thee; He loved thee first, and then created thee, that thou loving him, he might continue his love to thee. The surest way, and the nearest way to lay hold upon God, is the consideration of that which he had done already. So David does; and that which he takes knowledge of, in particular, in God's former proceedings towards him, is, because God had been his help, which is our last branch in this part, "Because thou hast been my help."

From this one word, that God hath been my "Help," I make account that we have both these notions; first, that God hath not left me to myself, He hath come to my succor, He hath helped me; and then, that God hath not left out myself; He hath been my Help, but he hath left some thing for me to do with him, and by his help. My security for the future, in this consideration of that which is past, lies not only in this, that God hath delivered me, but in this also, that he hath delivered me by way of a Help, and Help always presumes an endeavour and co-operation in him that is helped. God did not elect me as a helper, nor create me, nor redeem me, nor convert me, by way of helping me; for he alone did all, and he had no use at all of me. God infuses his first grace, the first way, merely as a Giver; entirely, all himself; but his subsequent graces, as a helper; therefore we call them auxiliary graces, helping graces; and we always receive them, when we endeavour to make use of his former grace. "Lord, I believe" (says the man in the Gospel to Christ), "Help mine unbelief." If there had not been unbelief, weakness, imperfectness in that faith, there had needed no help; but if there had not been a belief, a faith, it had not been capable of help and assistance, but it must have been an entire act, without any concurrence on the man's part.

So that if I have truly the testimony of a rectified conscience, that God hath helped me, it is in both respects; first, that he hath never forsaken me, and then, that he hath never suffered me to forsake my self; He hath blessed me with that grace, that I trust in no help but his, and with this grace too, that I cannot look for his help, except I help myself also. God did not help Heaven and earth to proceed out of nothing in the Creation, for they had no possibility of any disposition towards it; for they had no being: But God did help the earth to produce grass, and herbs; for, for that, God had infused a seminal disposition into the earth, which, for all that, it could not have perfected without his farther help. As in the making of Woman, there is the very word of our text, Gnazar, God made him a helper, one that was to do much for him, but not without him. So that then, if I will make God's former working upon me, an argument of his future gracious purposes, as I must acknowledge that God hath done much for me, so I must find, that I have done what I could, by the benefit of that grace with him; for God promises to be but a helper. "Lord open thou my lips," says David; that is God's work entirely; and then, "My mouth, my mouth shall show forth thy praise"; there enters David into the work with God. And then, says God to him, Dilata os tuum, "Open thy mouth" (it is now made "Thy mouth," and therefore do thou open it) "and I will fill it"; all inchoations and consummations, beginnings and perfectings are of God, of God alone; but in the way there is a concurrence on our part (by a successive continuation of God's grace), in which God proceeds as a helper; and I put him to more than that, if I do nothing. But if I pray for his help, and apprehend and husband his graces well, when they come, then he is truly, properly my helper; and upon that security, that testimony of a rectified conscience, I can proceed to David's confidence for the future, "Because thou hast been my Help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice"; which is our third, and last general part.

In this last part, which is (after David's aspect, and consideration of his present condition, which was, in the effect, an exclusion from God's Temple, and his retrospect, his consideration of God's former mercies to him, that he had been his help), his prospect, his confidence for the future, we shall stay a little upon these two steps; first, that that which he promises himself, is not an immunity from all powerful enemies, nor a sword of revenge upon those enemies; it is not that he shall have no adversary, nor that that adversary shall be able to do him no harm, but that he should have a refreshing, a respiration, In velamento alarum, under the shadow of God's wings. And then (in the second place), that this way which God shall be pleased to take, this manner, this measure of refreshing, which God shall vouchsafe to afford (though it amount not to a full deliverance), must produce a joy, a rejoicing in us; we must not only not decline to a murmuring, that we have no more, no nor rest upon a patience for that which remains, but we must ascend to a holy joy, as if all were done and accomplished, "In the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice."

First then, lest any man in his dejection of spirit, or of fortune, should stray into a jealousy or suspicion of God's power to deliver him, as God hath spangled the firmament with stars, so hath he his Scriptures with names, and metaphors, and denotations of power. Sometimes he shines out in the name of a Sword, and of a Target, and of a Wall, and of a Tower, and of a Rock, and of a Hill; and sometimes in that glorious and manifold constellation of all together, Dominum exercituum, "the Lord of Hosts." God, as God, is never represented to us, with defensive arms; He needs then not. When the poets present their great heroes, and their worthies, they always insist upon their arms, they spend much of their invention upon the description of their arms; both because the greatest valour and strength needs arms (Goliah himself was armed), and because to expose one's self to danger unarmed, is not valour, but rashness. But God is invulnerable in himself, and is never represented armed; you find no shirts of mail, no helmets, no cuirasses in God's armory. In that one place of Esay, where it may seem to be otherwise, where God is said "to have put on righteousness as a breastplate, and a helmet of salvation upon his head"; in that prophecy God is Christ, and is therefore in that place, called the Redeemer. Christ needed defensive arms, God does not. God's word does; his Scriptures do; and therefore S. Jerome hath armed them, and set before every book his Prologum galeatum, that prologue that arms and defends every book from calumny. But though God need not, nor receive not defensive arms for himself, yet God is to us a helmet, a breastplate, a strong tower, a rock, everything that may give us assurance and defense; and as often as he will, he can refresh that Proclamation, Nolite tangere Christos meos, our enemies shall not so much as touch us.

But here, by occasion of his metaphor in this text (Sub umbra alarum, "In the shadow of thy wings"), we do not so much consider an absolute immunity, that we shall not be touched, as a refreshing and consolation, when we are touched, though we be pinched and wounded. The names of God, which are most frequent in the Scriptures, are these three, Elohim, and Adonai, and Jehovah; and to assure us of his power to deliver us, two of these three are names of power. Elohim is Deus fortis, the mighty, the powerful God: and (which deserves a particular consideration) Elohim is a plural name; it is not Deus fortis, but Dii fortes, powerful Gods. God is all kind of Gods; all kinds, which either idolaters and gentiles can imagine (as riches, or justice, or wisdom, or valour, or such), and all kinds which God himself hath called gods (as princes, and magistrates, and prelates, and all that assist and help one another), God is Elohim, all these Gods, and all these in their height and best of their power; for Elohim is Dii fortes, Gods in the plural, and those plural Gods in their exaltation.

The second name of God is a name of power too, Adonai. For, Adonai is Dominus, the Lord, such a Lord, as is Lord and proprietary of all his creatures, and all creatures are his creatures; and then, Dominium est potestas tum utendi, tum abutendi, says the law; to be absolute Lord of any thing, gives that Lord a power to do what he will with that thing. God, as he is Adonai, the Lord, may give and take, quicken and kill, build and throw down, where and whom he will. So then two of God's three names are names of absolute power, to imprint, and re-imprint an assurance in us, that he can absolutely deliver us, and fully revenge us, if he will. But then, his third name, and that name which he chooses to himself, and in the signification of which name, he employs Moses, for the relief of his people under Pharaoh, that name Jehovah, is not a name of power, but only of essence, of being, of subsistence, and yet in the virtue of that name, God relieved his people. And if, in my afflictions, God vouchsafe to visit me in that name, to preserve me in my being, in my subsistence in him, that I be not shaked out of him, disinherited in him, excommunicate from him, divested of him, annihilated towards him, let him, at his good pleasure, reserve his Elohim, and his Adonai, the exercises and declarations of his mighty power, to those great public causes, that more concern his glory, than any thing that can befall me; but if he impart his Jehovah, enlarge himself so far towards me, as that I may live, and move, and have my being in him, though I be not instantly delivered, nor mine enemies absolutely destroyed, yet this is as much as I could promise myself, this is as much as the Holy Ghost intends in this metaphor, Sub umbra alarum, "Under the shadow of thy wings," that is a refreshing, a respiration, a conservation, a consolation in all afflictions that are inflicted upon me.

Yet, is not this metaphor of wings without a denotation of power. As no act of Gods, though it seem to imply but spiritual comfort, is without a denotation of power (for it is the power of God that comforts me; to overcome that sadness of soul, and that dejection of spirit, which the adversary by temporal afflictions would induce upon me, is an act of his power), so this metaphor, "The shadow of his wings" (which in this place expresses no more, than consolation and refreshing in misery, and not a powerful deliverance out of it), is so often in the Scriptures made a denotation of power too, as that we can doubt of no act of power, if we have this shadow of his wings. For, in this metaphor of wings, doth the Holy Ghost express the Maritime power, the power of some nations at sea, in navies ("Woe to the land shadowing with wings"), that is, that hovers over the world, and intimidates it with her sails and ships. In this metaphor doth God remember his people, of his powerful deliverance of them ("You have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagle's wings and brought you to myself"). In this metaphor doth God threaten his and their enemies, what he can do ("The noise of the wings of his cherubims, are as the noise of great waters, and of an army"). So also, what he will do ("He shall spread his wings over Bozrah, and at that day shall the hearts of the mighty men of Edom, be as the heart of a woman in her pangs"). So that, if I have the shadow of his wings, I have the earnest of the power of them too; if I have refreshing, and respiration from them, I am able to say (as those three confessors did to Nebuchadnezzar), "My God is able to deliver me," I am sure he hath power; "And my God will deliver me," when it conduces to his glory, I know he will; "But, if he do not, be it known unto thee, O King, we will not serve thy Gods"; be it known unto thee, O Satan, how long soever God defer my deliverance, I will not seek false comforts, the miserable comforts of this world. I will not, for I need not; for I can subsist under this shadow of these wings, though I have no more.

The Mercy-seat itself was covered with the cherubims' wings; and who would have more than Mercy? and a Mercy-seat; that is, established, resident Mercy, permanent and perpetual Mercy; present and familiar Mercy; a Mercy-seat. Our Saviour Christ intends as much as would have served their turn, if they had laid hold upon it, when he says, "That he would have gathered Jerusalem, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings." And though the other prophets do (as ye have heard) mingle the signification of Power, and actual deliverance, in this metaphor of wings, yet our

Prophet, whom we have now in especial consideration, David, never doth so; but in every place where he uses this metaphor of wings (which are in five or six several Psalms) still he rests and determines in that sense, which is his meaning here; that though God do not actually deliver us, nor actually destroy our enemies, yet if he refresh us in the shadow of his wings, if he maintain our subsistence (which is a religious constancy) in him, this should not only establish our patience (for that is but half the work), but it should also produce a joy, and rise to an exultation, which is our last circumstance, "Therefore in the shadow of thy wings, I will rejoice."

I would always raise your hearts, and dilate your hearts, to a holy joy, to a joy in the Holy Ghost. There may be a just fear, that men do not grieve enough for their sins; but there may be a just jealousy, and suspicion too, that they may fall into inordinate grief, and diffidence of God's mercy; and God hath reserved us to such times, as being the later times, give us even the dregs and lees of misery to drink. For, God hath not only let loose into the world a new spiritual disease; which is, an equality, and an indifferency, which religion our children, or our servants, or our companions profess (I would not keep company with a man that thought me a knave, or a traitor; with him that thought I loved not my Prince, or were a faithless man, not to be believed, I would not associate myself; and yet I will make him my bosom companion, that thinks I do not love God, that thinks I cannot be saved); but God hath accompanied, and complicated almost all our bodily diseases of these times, with an extraordinary sadness, a predominant melancholy, a faintness of heart, a cheerlessness, a joylessness of spirit, and therefore I return often to this endeavour of raising your hearts, dilating your hearts with a holy joy, joy in the Holy Ghost, for "Under the shadow of his wings," you may, you should, "rejoice."

If you look upon this world in a map, you find two hemispheres, two half worlds.[1] If you crush Heaven into a map, you may find two hemispheres too, two half Heavens; half will be joy, and half will be glory; for in these two, the joy of Heaven, and the glory of Heaven, is all Heaven often represented unto us. And as of those two hemispheres of the world, the first hath been known long before, but the other (that of America, which is the richer in treasure), God reserved for later discoveries; so though he reserve that hemisphere of Heaven, which is the glory thereof, to the Resurrection, yet the other hemisphere, the joy of Heaven, God opens to our discovery, and delivers for our habitation even whilst we dwell in this world. As God hath cast upon the unrepentant sinner two deaths, a temporal, and a spiritual death, so hath he breathed into us two lives; for so, as the word for death is doubled, Morte morieris,[2] "Thou shalt die the death," so is the word for life expressed in the plural, Chaiim, vitarum, "God breathed into his nostrils the breath of lives," of divers lives. Though our natural life were no life, but rather a continual dying, yet we have two lives besides that, an eternal life reserved for Heaven, but yet a heavenly life too, a spiritual life, even in this world; and as God doth thus inflict two deaths, and infuse two lives, so doth he also pass two judgements upon man, or rather repeats the same judgement twice. For, that which Christ shall say to thy soul then at the last Judgement, "Enter into thy Master's joy," He says to thy conscience now, "Enter into thy Master's joy." The everlastingness of the joy is the blessedness of the next life, but the entering, the inchoation is afforded here. For that which Christ shall say then to us, Venite benedicti, "Come ye blessed," are words intended to persons that are coming, that are upon the way, though not at home; here in this world he bids us "Come," there in the next, he shall bid us "Welcome." The Angels of Heaven have joy in thy conversion, and canst thou be without that joy in thy self? If thou desire revenge upon thine enemies, as they are God's enemies, that God would be pleased to remove, and root out all such as oppose him, that affection appertains to glory; let that alone till thou come to the hemisphere of glory; there join with those martyrs under the altar, Usquequo Domine, how long O Lord, dost thou defer judgement? and thou shalt have thine answer there for that. Whilst thou art here, here join with David, and the other Saints of God, in that holy increpation of a dangerous sadness, "Why art thou cast down O my soul? why art thou disquieted in me?" That soul that is dissected and anatomized to God, in a sincere confession, washed in the tears of true contrition, embalmed in the blood of reconciliation, the blood of Christ Jesus, can assign no reason, can give no just answer to that interrogatory, "Why art thou cast down O my soul? why art thou disquieted in me?" No man is so little, as that he can be lost under these wings, no man so great, as that they cannot reach to him; Semper ille major est, quantumcumque creverimus, to what temporal, to what spiritual greatness soever we grow, still pray we him to shadow us under his wings; for the poor need those wings against oppression, and the rich against envy. The Holy Ghost, who is a dove, shadowed the whole world under his wings; Incubabat aquis, he hovered over the waters, he sat upon the waters, and he hatched all that was produced, and all that was produced so, was good. Be thou a Mother where the Holy Ghost would be a Father; conceive by him; and be content that he produce joy in thy heart here. First think, that as a man must have some land, or else he cannot be in wardship, so a man must have some of the love of God, or else he could not fall under God's correction; God would not give him his physic, God would not study his cure, if he cared not for him. And then think also, that if God afford thee the shadow of his wings, that is, consolation, respiration, refreshing, though not a present, and plenary deliverance, in thy afflictions, not to thank God, is a murmuring, and not to rejoice in God's ways, is an unthankfulness. Howling is the noise of Hell, singing the voice of Heaven; sadness the damp of Hell, rejoicing the serenity of Heaven. And he that hath not this joy here, lacks one of the best pieces of his evidence for the joys of Heaven; and hath neglected or refused that earnest, by which God uses to bind his bargain, that true joy in this world shall flow into the joy of Heaven, as a river flows into the sea; this joy shall not be put out in death, and a new joy kindled in me in Heaven; but as my soul, as soon as it is out of my body, is in Heaven, and does not stay for the possession of Heaven, nor for the fruition of the sight of God, till it be ascended through air, and fire, and moon, and sun, and planets, and firmament, to that place which we conceive to be Heaven, but without the thousandth part of a minute's stop, as soon as it issues, is in a glorious light, which is Heaven (for all the way to Heaven is Heaven; and as those Angels, which came from Heaven hither, bring Heaven with them, and are in Heaven here, so that soul that goes to Heaven, meets Heaven here; and as those Angels do not divest Heaven by coming, so these souls invest Heaven, in their going). As my soul shall not go towards Heaven, but go by Heaven to Heaven, to the Heaven of Heavens, so the true joy of a good soul in this world is the very joy of Heaven; and we go thither, not that being without joy, we might have joy infused into us, but that as Christ says, "Our joy might be full," perfected, sealed with an everlastingness; for, as he promises, "That no man shall take our joy from us," so neither shall Death itself take it away, nor so much as interrupt it, or discontinue it, but as in the face of Death, when he lays hold upon me, and in the face of the Devil, when he attempts me, I shall see the face of God (for, everything shall be a glass, to reflect God upon me), so in the agonies of Death, in the anguish of that dissolution, in the sorrows of that valediction, in the irreversibleness of that transmigration, I shall have a joy, which shall no more evaporate, than my soul shall evaporate, a joy, that shall pass up, and put on a more glorious garment above, and be joy super-invested in glory. Amen

[1] Donne's interest in geography and map-making is also apparent in a number of poems.

[2] literally, "by death you will die." The Latin is from the Vulgate, Genesis 2:17.

Ben Jonson

1572/3 – 1637

Ben Jonson was born, by his own account, a month after the death of his father. Two years later, his mother married a bricklayer, who seems to have taken care of his stepson's education. After a period at a private school, he was educated at Westminster School, then probably the most famous school in England, under the headship of William Camden. Camden may himself have paid for Jonson's tuition at Westminster, and Jonson showed himself grateful in a poem which begins "Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe / All that I am in arts, all that I know." The great teacher and his great pupil became friends after the completion of Jonson's formal education. Jonson was married in 1594 to Anne Lewis, whom he described to Drummond as "a shrew, yet honest." There were several children of this marriage, and probably others outside it. In 1597 he was mentioned in Henslowe's diary as an actor, and in 1598 was indicted for killing a fellow actor, Gabriel Spencer, in a duel. He pleaded self-defence, was given benefit of clergy, branded on the thumb, and his goods confiscated. While in prison he converted to Catholicism, and is said to have continued in that religion for twelve years. In 1605 he and his co-authors were imprisoned for libel in Eastward Ho! In the following year he and his wife appeared before the Consistory Court on charges of recusancy. In 1612–13 he was in France as tutor to Sir Walter Raleigh's son. In 1618–19 he travelled on foot to Scotland, where he was a guest of Drummond of Hawthornden, who recorded his conversation. Jonson's Works were published in folio in 1616; between then and his death he received a variety of honours and suffered from a variety of ailments. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Jonson was a major playwright, whose satirical comedies and tragedies are still read and staged. "Clerimont's Song" and "A Vision of Beauty" come from his plays. The reign of King James created a context in which Jonson's talent throve. Often commissioned to writes masques and plays for the court, he was well-respected both by the aristocracy and by other artists, and became financially comfortable. Jonson was also an astute literary critic, who recognized the genius of his contemporary Shakespeare. Jonson was treated less well after the accession of Charles, however, and his health suffered. His masques and plays ceased to enjoy success, and although no particular occasion is known, no doubt this prompted "An Ode. To Himself." He was far from alone in the world, however. Acquainted with most of the celebrated men of his age, Jonson was at the centre of a group of young poets calling themselves the "Sons of Ben." He enjoyed close relationships with several aristocratic families, including the Sidneys and the Countess of Bedford, celebrated in "To Penshurst" and "On Lucy, Countess of Bedford." Jonson was also connected with leading literary and academic men, including Camden, his master at Westminster School, Donne, Chapman, Fletcher, Selden, and Shakespeare.

To the Reader

Pray thee take care, that tak'st my book in hand,
To read it well; that is, to understand.

To Alchemists

If all you boast of your great art be true,
Sure, willing poverty lives most in you.

On Something that Walks Somewhere

At court I met it, in clothes brave enough
To be a courtier, and looks grave enough
To seem a statesman. As I near it came,
It made me a great face; I asked the name;
A lord, it cried, buried in flesh and blood,
And such from whom let no man hope least good,
For I will do none; and as little ill,
For I will dare none. Good lord, walk dead still.
—1616

To William Camden [1]

Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe
All that I am in arts, all that I know,
(How nothing's that?) to whom my country owes
The great renown and name wherewith she goes;
Than thee the age sees not that thing more grave,
More high, more holy, that she more would crave.
What name, what skill, what faith hast thou in things!
What sight in searching the most ántique springs!
What weight, and what authority in thy speech!
Man scarce can make that doubt, but thou canst teach.
Pardon free truth, and let thy modesty,
Which conquers all, be once overcome by thee.
Many of thine this better could than I;
But for their powers, accept my piety.

On My First Daughter [2]

Here lies, to each her parents' ruth,
Mary, the daughter of their youth;
Yet, all heaven's gifts being heaven's due,
It makes the father less to rue.
At six months' end she parted hence
With safety of her innocence; [3]
Whose soul heaven's Queen (whose name she bears),
In comfort of her mother's tears,
Hath placed amongst her virgin train;
Where, while that severed doth remain, [4]
This grave partakes the fleshly birth;[5]
Which cover lightly, gentle earth.
—1616

On My First Son [6]

Farewell, thou child of my right hand, and joy; [7]
My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy.
Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.
Oh, could I lose all father now! For why [8]
Will man lament the state he should envy?
To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
And, if no other misery, yet age?
Rest in soft peace, and, asked, say here doth lie
Ben Jonson his best piece of poetry;
For whose sake, henceforth, all his vows be such,
As what he loves may never like too much.

[1] Camden (1551–1623), Jonson's master at Westminster School; the publication of his Britannia (1586) made Camden the most celebrated antiquary of the era (see l. 4).

[2] Mary Jonson, probably born after 1598, died at 6 months.

[3] With safety of without damage to (OED safety 1c).

[4] that the soul, disassociated from the body.

[5] while that…fleshly birth i.e. until the Resurrection, the grave has its share of the body.

[6] Jonson's son Benjamin died in 1611.

[7] "Benjamin," the name of Jacob's youngest son (Genesis 35:18), means son of the right hand; sitting to the right has been traditionally associated with honour (OED 2c).

On Lucy, Countess of Bedford[1]

This morning, timely rapt with holy fire,[2]
I thought to form unto my zealous muse
What kind of creature I could most desire
To honour, serve and love, as poets use.
I meant to make her fair, and free, and wise,[3]
Of greatest blood, and yet more good than great;
I meant the day-star should not brighter rise,[4]
Nor lend like influence from his lucent seat.[5]
I meant she should be courteous, facile, sweet,[6]
Hating that solemn vice of greatness, pride;
I meant each softest virtue there should meet,
Fit in that softer bosom to reside.
Only a learnèd and a manly soul
I purposed her, that should, with even powers,[7]
The rock, the spindle and the shears control
Of destiny, and spin her own free hours.[8]
Such when I meant to feign and wished to see,
My muse bade, Bedford write, and that was she.

To Sir Henry Savile[9]

If, my religion safe, I durst embrace
That stranger doctrine of Pythagoras,[10]
I should believe the soul of Tacitus[11]
In thee, most weighty Savile, lived to us:
So hast thou rendered him in all his bounds
And all his numbers, both of sense and sounds.[12]
But when I read that special piece, restored,
Where Nero falls and Galba is adored,
To thine own proper I ascribe then more,[13]
And gratulate the breach I grieved before:[14]
Which fate, it seems, caused in the history
Only to boast thy merit in supply.
Oh, wouldst thou add like hand to all the rest!
Or (better work!) were thy glad country blest
To have her story woven in thy thread,
Minerva's loom was never richer spread.[15]
For who can master those great parts like thee,
That liv'st from hope, from fear, from faction free;
That hast thy breast so clear of present crimes
Thou need'st not shrink at voice of after-times;
Whose knowledge claimeth at the helm to stand,
But wisely thrusts not forth a forward hand,
No more than Sallust in the Roman state.[16]
As, then, his cause, his glory emulate.
Although to write be lesser than to do,

[2] timely early and/or opportunely (OED timely adv 1,2).

[3] free Several meanings are apposite: not in bondage to sin (OED free a 1b); of gentle birth (free a 3); magnanimous (free a 4a).

[4] the day-star either the morning star (OED day-star 1), or the sun (OED day-star 2).

[5] lucent luminous, shining (OED lucent a 1b).

[6] facile affable, gentle (OED facile a 4a,c).

[7] even steady, even-tempered (OED even a 8); equal to the task of controlling destiny (see OED even a 13a).

[8] The rock, spindle, and shears in the Hesiodic theology are symbolic of the three Fates: with her distaff (or rock), Clotho chooses the moment of our birth, Lachesis weaves the tapestry of events of our lives, and Atropos severs the thread (OCD).

[9] Sir Henry Savile (1549-1622), Warden of Merton College, Oxford, and later Provost of Eton.

[10] That stranger doctrine Pythagoras taught the transmigration of souls, whereby after death each soul enters another body, still cognizant of its past life (OCD).

[11] Savile translated the Histories of Tacitus in 1591.

[12] numbers parts, categories (OED number sb 7c).

[13] proper special or intrinsic attribute (OED proper C sb or quasi-sb 3).

[14] gratulate celebrate, rejoice over (OED gratulate v 2).

[15] Minerva the Roman goddess of handicrafts, especially of weaving.

[16] Sallust, after fighting with Julius Caesar in the African campaign, withdrew from the military life to write history.

It is the next deed, and a great one too.
We need a man that knows the several graces
Of history, and how to apt their places: [1]
Where brevity, where splendour, and where height,
Where sweetness is required, and where weight;
We need a man can speak of the intents,
The counsels, actions, orders and events
Of state, and censure them; we need his pen [2]
Can write the things, the causes, and the men.
But most we need his faith (and all have you)
That dares nor write things false, nor hide things true.
—1616

To Sir Thomas Roe[3]

Thou hast begun well, Roe, which stand well too,
And I know nothing more thou hast to do.
He that is round within himself, and straight,
Need seek no other strength, no other height;
Fortune upon him breaks herself, if ill,
And what would hurt his virtue makes it still.
That thou at once, then, nobly may'st defend
With thine own course the judgement of thy friend,
Be always to thy gathered self the same,
And study conscience, more than thou wouldst fame.
Though both be good, the latter yet is worst,
And ever is ill-got without the first.
—1616

To the Same

That thou hast kept thy love, increased thy will,
Bettered thy trust to letters; that, thy skill;
Hast taught thyself worthy thy pen to tread,
And that to write things worthy to be read:
How much of great example wert thou, Roe,
If time to facts, as unto men, would owe?
But much it now avails what's done, of whom:
The self-same deeds, as diversely they come
From place, or fortune, are made high or low,
And even the praiser's judgement suffers so.
Well, though thy name less than our great ones be,
Thy fact is more: let truth encourage thee.

Inviting a Friend to Supper

Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house and I
Do equally desire your company;
Not that we think us worthy such a guest,
But that your worth will dignify our feast
With those that come; whose grace may make that seem Something, which else could hope for no esteem.
It is the fair acceptance, sir, creates
The entertainment perfect, not the cates. [4]
Yet shall you have, to rectify your palate,
An olive, capers, or some better salad
Ushering the mutton; with a short-legged hen,
If we can get her, full of eggs, and then
Lemons, and wine for sauce; to these, a coney [5]
Is not to be despaired of, for our money;
And though fowl now be scarce, yet there are clerks,
The sky not falling, think we may have larks.
I'll tell you of more, and lie, so you will come:
Of partridge, pheasant, woodcock, of which some
May yet be there; and godwit, if we can;
Knat, rail and ruff, too. Howsoe'er, my man [6]
Shall read a piece of Virgil, Tacitus,

[6] godwit...knat, rail and ruff commonly eaten birds.

Livy, or of some better book to us,
Of which we'll speak our minds, amidst our meat;
And I'll profess no verses to repeat;
To this, if aught appear which I not know of,
That will the pastry, not my paper, show of.
Digestive cheese and fruit there sure will be;
But that which most doth take my muse and me
Is a pure cup of rich Canary wine, [1]
Which is the Mermaid's now, but shall be mine; [2]
Of which had Horace or Anacreon tasted, [3]
Their lives, as do their lines, till now had lasted.
Tobacco, nectar, or the Thespian spring [4]
Are all but Luther's beer to this I sing. [5]
Of this we will sup free, but moderately;
And we will have no Poley or Parrot by; [6]
Nor shall our cups make any guilty men,
But at our parting we will be as when
We innocently met. No simple word
That shall be uttered at our mirthful board
Shall make us sad next morning, or affright
The liberty that we'll enjoy tonight.

To Penshurst [7]

new estates vs. medieval home

Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show
Of touch or marble, nor canst boast a row [8]
Of polished pillars, or a roof of gold;
Thou hast no lantern whereof tales are told, [9]
Or stair, or courts; but stand'st an ancient pile, [10]
And these grudged at, art reverenced the while.
Thou joy'st in better marks, of soil, of air, [11]
Of wood, of water; therein thou art fair.
Thou hast thy walks for health as well as sport:
Thy Mount, to which the dryads do resort, [12]
Where Pan and Bacchus their high feasts have made, [13]
Beneath the broad beech and the chestnut shade;
That taller tree, which of a nut was set
At his great birth, where all the muses met. [14]
There, in the writhèd bark, are cut the names
Of many a sylvan taken with his flames;
And thence the ruddy satyrs oft provoke [15]
The lighter fauns to reach thy lady's oak.
Thy copse, too, named of Gamage, thou hast there,
That never fails to serve thee seasoned deer [16]
When thou wouldst feast or exercise thy friends.
The lower land, that to the river bends,
Thy sheep, thy bullocks, kine and calves do feed;
The middle grounds thy mares and horses breed.
Each bank doth yield thee conies, and the tops, [17]
Fertile of wood, Ashour and Sidney's copse,

To crown thy open table, doth provide
The purpled pheasant with the speckled side;
The painted partridge lies in every field,
And for thy mess is willing to be killed. [1]
And if the high-swoll'n Medway fail thy dish, [2]
Thou hast thy ponds that pay thee tribute fish:
Fat, agèd carps, that run into thy net;
And pikes, now weary their own kind to eat,
As loath the second draught or cast to stay,
Officiously, at first, themselves betray; [3]
Bright eels, that emulate them, and leap on land
Before the fisher, or into his hand.
Then hath thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers,
Fresh as the air and new as are the hours:
The early cherry, with the later plum,
Fig, grape and quince, each in his time doth come;
The blushing apricot and woolly peach
Hang on thy walls, that every child may reach.
And though thy walls be of the country stone,
They're reared with no man's ruin, no man's groan;
There's none that dwell about them wish them down,
But all come in, the farmer and the clown,
And no one empty-handed, to salute
Thy lord and lady, though they have no suit.[4]
Some bring a capon, some a rural cake, [5]
Some nuts, some apples; some that think they make
The better cheeses, bring 'em; or else send
By their ripe daughters, whom they would commend
This way to husbands; and whose baskets bear
An emblem of themselves, in plum or pear. [6]
But what can this (more than express their love)
Add to thy free provisions, far above [7]
The need of such? whose liberal board doth flow
With all that hospitality doth know!
Where comes no guest but is allowed to eat
Without his fear, and of thy lord's own meat;
Where the same beer and bread and self-same wine
That is his lordship's shall be also mine;
And I not fain to sit, as some this day [8]
At great men's tables, and yet dine away.
Here no man tells my cups, nor, standing by, [9]
A waiter, doth my gluttony envy,
But gives me what I call, and lets me eat;
He knows below he shall find plenty of meat,
Thy tables hoard not up for the next day.
Nor, when I take my lodging, need I pray
For fire or lights or livery: all is there, [10]
As if thou then wert mine, or I reigned here;
There's nothing I can wish, for which I stay.
That found King James, when, hunting late this way
With his brave son, the Prince, they saw thy fires
Shine bright on every hearth as the desires
Of thy Penates had been set on flame [11]
To entertain them; or the country came
With all their zeal to warm their welcome here.
What (great, I will not say, but) sudden cheer [12]
Didst thou then make 'em! and what praise was heaped
On thy good lady then! who therein reaped
The just reward of her high housewifery:

To have her linen, plate, and all things nigh
When she was far; and not a room but dressed
As if it had expected such a guest!
These, Penshurst, are thy praise, and yet not all.
Thy lady's noble, fruitful, chaste withal;
His children thy great lord may call his own,
A fortune in this age but rarely known.
They are and have been taught religion; thence
Their gentler spirits have sucked innocence.
Each morn and even they are taught to pray
With the whole household, and may every day
Read in their virtuous parents' noble parts
The mysteries of manners, arms and arts.
Now, Penshurst, they that will proportion thee [1]
With other edifices, when they see
Those proud, ambitious heaps, and nothing else,
May say, their lords have built, but thy lord dwells.

To Heaven

Good and great God, can I not think of thee,
But it must straight my melancholy be?
Is it interpreted in me disease
That, laden with my sins, I seek for ease?
Oh, be thou witness, that the reins dost know, [2]
And hearts of all, if I be sad for show;
And judge me after, if I dare pretend
To aught but grace, or aim at other end.
As thou art all, so be thou all to me,
First, midst, and last; converted one and three;
My faith, my hope, my love; and in this state,
My judge, my witness, and my advocate.
Where have I been this while exiled from thee?
And whither rapt, now thou but stoop'st to me?
Dwell, dwell here still: Oh, being everywhere,
How can I doubt to find thee ever here?
I know my state, both full of shame and scorn,
Conceived in sin, and unto labour born,
Standing with fear, and must with horror fall,
And destined unto judgement, after all.
I feel my griefs too, and there scarce is ground
Upon my flesh to inflict another wound.
Yet dare I not complain, or wish for death
With holy Paul,[3] lest it be thought the breath
Of discontent; or that these prayers be
For weariness of life, not love of thee.

Song
To Celia [4]

Come, my Celia, let us prove, [5]
While we may, the sports of love;
Time will not be ours for ever;
He at length our good will sever.
Spend not then his gifts in vain.
Suns that set may rise again;
But if once we lose this light,
'Tis with us perpetual night. → catullus
Why should we defer our joys?
Fame and rumour are but toys.
Cannot we delude the eyes
Of a few poor household spies?
Or his easier ears beguile,
So removèd by our wile?
'Tis no sin love's fruit to steal,
But the sweet theft to reveal:

---

[1] proportion compare (OED proportion v 6).

[2] reins the kidneys or loins, but figuratively the passions, thought to be seated in these parts of the body.

[3] See Romans 7:24.

[4] This poem is based on Catullus v (Vivamus, mea Lesbia, atque amemus), one of the most frequently translated of the poems of Catullus. See also Herrick's "Corinna's Going A Maying," line 68 and note.

[5] prove Several meanings apply: to show authenticity (OED prove v 7a); to make trial of (OED prove v 2); to learn through experience (OED prove v 3).

To be taken, to be seen,
These have crimes accounted been.

Her Triumph[1]

See the chariot at hand here of Love,
Wherein my lady rideth!
Each that draws is a swan or a dove,
And well the car Love guideth.
As she goes, all hearts do duty
Unto her beauty;
And enamoured, do wish, so they might
But enjoy such a sight,
That they still were to run by her side,
Through swords, through seas, whither she would ride.[2]

Do but look on her eyes, they do light
All that Love's world compriseth!
Do but look on her hair, it is bright
As Love's star when it riseth![3]
Do but mark, her forehead's smoother
Than words that soothe her!
And from her arched brows, such a grace
Sheds itself through the face,
As alone there triumphs to the life
All the gain, all the good, of the elements' strife.

Have you seen but a bright lily grow,
Before rude hands have touched it?
Have you marked but the fall o' the snow,
Before the soil hath smutched it?[4]
Have you felt the wool o' the beaver?
Or swan's down ever?
Or have smelled o' the bud o' the briar?
Or the nard i' the fire?[5]
Or have tasted the bag o' the bee?
O so white! O so soft! O so sweet is she!

An Epistle to Master John Selden[6]

I know to whom I write. Here, I am sure,
Though I am short, I cannot be obscure;[7]
Less shall I for the art or dressing care,
Truth and the graces best when naked are.
Your book, my Selden, I have read, and much
Was trusted, that you thought my judgement such
To ask it; though in most of works it be
A penance, where a man may not be free,
Rather than office, when it doth or may
Chance that the friend's affection proves allay[8]
Unto the censure. Yours all need doth fly
Of this so vicious humanity.
Than which there is not unto study a more
Pernicious enemy; we see before
A many of books, even good judgements wound
Themselves through favouring what is there not found.
But I on yours far otherwise shall do,
Not fly the crime, but the suspicion too;
Though I confess (as every muse hath erred,
And mine not least) I have too oft preferred
Men past their terms, and praised some names too much;[9]
But 'twas with purpose to have made them such.

[1] This section comes fourth in "A Celebration of Charis in Ten Lyric Pieces."

[2] whither wherever (OED whither adv 4).

[3] Love's star the planet Venus.

[4] smutched blackened (OED smutched ppl.a 1).

[5] nard aromatic balsam used in the ancient world (OED nard sb 1).

[6] Drummond reported that Jonson described Selden as "the law-book of the judges of England, the bravest man in all languages." This poem was prefixed to Selden's Titles of Honour (1614); in its preface, Selden testifies to Jonson's learning.

[7] short brief. Horace had warned that brevity could lead to obscurity.

[8] allay a tempering (OED allay sb^1 8), or check (OED allay sb^1 9). Friendship makes it difficult to criticise freely.

[9] terms limits, i.e. true capacities (OED term sb 1a).

Since being deceived, I turn a sharper eye
Upon myself, and ask to whom, and why,
And what I write? And vex it many days
Before men get a verse, much less a praise;
So that my reader is assured I now
Mean what I speak, and still will keep that vow.
Stand forth my object, then, you that have been
Ever at home, yet have all countries seen;
And like a compass keeping one foot still
Upon your centre, do your circle fill
Of general knowledge; watched men, manners too,
Heard what times past have said, seen what ours do.
Which grace shall I make love to first: your skill,
Or faith in things? Or is't your wealth and will
To instruct and teach, or your unwearied pain
Of gathering, bounty in pouring out again?
What fables have you vexed, what truth redeemed,
Antiquities searched, opinions disesteemed,
Impostures branded, and authorities urged!
What blots and errors have you watched and purged
Records and authors of! How rectified
Times, manners, customs! Innovations spied!
Sought out the fountains, sources, creeks, paths, ways,
And noted the beginnings and decays!
Where is that nominal mark, or real rite,[1]
Form, art, or ensign that hath 'scaped your sight?[2]
How are traditions there examined, how
Conjectures retrieved! And a story now
And then of times, besides the bare conduct
Of what it tells us, weaved in to instruct!
I wondered at the richness, but am lost
To see the workmanship so exceed the cost;[3]
To mark the excellent seasoning of your style,
And manly elocution, not one while
With horror rough, then rioting with wit:
But to the subject still the colours fit[4]
In sharpness of all search, wisdom of choice,
Newness of sense, antiquity of voice!
  I yield, I yield, the matter of your praise
Flows in upon me, and I cannot raise
A bank against it. Nothing but the round
Large clasp of nature such a wit can bound.
Monarch in letters! 'mongst thy titles shown
Of others' honours, thus enjoy thine own.
I first salute thee so, and gratulate,
With that thy style, thy keeping of thy state,
In offering this thy work to no great name
That would, perhaps, have praised and thanked the same,
But naught beyond. He thou hast given it to,[5]
Thy learnèd chamber-fellow, knows to do
It true respects. He will not only love,
Embrace, and cherish, but he can approve[6]
And estimate thy pains, as having wrought
In the same mines of knowledge, and thence brought
Humanity enough to be a friend,
And strength to be a champion and defend
Thy gift 'gainst envy. O how I do count
Among my comings-in, and see it mount,[7]
The gain of your two friendships! Hayward and
Selden: two names that so much understand;
On whom I could take up, and ne'er abuse[8]
The credit, what would furnish a tenth muse!
But here's no time, nor place, my wealth to tell;
You both are modest: so am I. Farewell.
—1640

[1] nominal mark, or real rite ceremonial titles. "Real" is a variant spelling of "royal" (OED). These terms are Selden's own from Titles of Honour.

[2] ensign symbol of dignity or office (OED ensign sb 4).

[3] cost quality (i.e. of the events Selden wrote about) (OED cost sb [1] 2).

[4] still always (OED still adv 3a); colours of rhetoric (OED colour sb [1] 13).

[5] He thou hast given it to Edward Hayward of the Inner Temple.

[6] approve corroborate, attest to (OED approve v [1] 2).

An Epistle Answering to One that Asked to be Sealed of the Tribe of Ben[1]

Men that are safe and sure in all they do
Care not what trials they are put unto;
They meet the fire, the test, as martyrs would,
And though opinion stamp them not, are gold.
I could say more of such, but that I fly
To speak myself out too ambitiously,
And showing so weak an act to vulgar eyes,
Put conscience and my right to compromise.
Let those that merely talk, and never think,
That live in the wild anarchy of drink,
Subject to quarrel only, or else such
As make it their proficiency how much
They have glutted in and lechered out that week,
That never yet did friend or friendship seek
But for a sealing: let these men protest.
Or the other on their borders, that will jest
On all souls that are absent, even the dead,
Like flies or worms which man's corrupt parts fed:
That to speak well, think it above all sin,
Of any company but that they are in;
Call every night to supper in these fits,
And are received for the covey of wits;
That censure all the town, and all the affairs,
And know whose ignorance is more than theirs;
Let these men have their ways, and take their times
To vent their libels, and to issue rhymes:
I have no portion in them, nor their deal
Of news they get to strew out the long meal.
I study other friendships, and more one
Than these can ever be; or else wish none.
What is't to me whether the French design
Be, or be not, to get the Valtelline?[2]
Or the States' ships sent forth belike to meet[3]
Some hopes of Spain in their West Indian Fleet?
Whether the dispensation yet be sent,[4]
Or that the match from Spain was ever meant?
I wish all well, and pray high heaven conspire
My prince's safety and my king's desire;
But if, for honour, we must draw the sword,
And force back that which will not be restored,
I have a body yet that spirit draws
To live, or fall, a carcass in the cause.
So far without inquiry what the States,
Brunsfield, and Mansfield,[5] do this year, my fates
Shall carry me at call; and I'll be well,
Though I do neither hear these news, nor tell
Of Spain or France; or were not pricked down one
Of the late mystery of reception,
Although my fame to his not underhears,[6]
That guides the motions and directs the bears.
But that's a blow, by which in time I may Lose all my credit with my Christmas clay
And animated porcelain of the court;
Aye, and for this neglect, the coarser sort
Of earthen jars there may molest me too:
Well, with mine own frail pitcher, what to do
I have decreed; keep it from waves and press,
Lest it be jostled, cracked, made naught, or less;
Live to that point I will, for which I am man,

---

[1] Tribe of Ben a biblical phrase (Revelation 7:8), here applied to Jonson's followers or poetic "sons."

[2] Valtelline a valley in Lombardy, fought over by France and Spain throughout the 1620s.

[3] States' Dutch.

[4] dispensation papal permission for (the Protestant) Prince Charles (later Charles I) to marry the Spanish Infanta (the "match from Spain" in the line following).

[5] Brunsfield, and Mansfield referring generally to military events on the continent; Brunsfield is unidentified, Mansfield commanded the forces of Frederick, Elector Palatine.

[6] his designer and architect Inigo Jones, Jonson's collaborator and rival, who was helping plan the reception for the Spanish Infanta.

And dwell as in my centre as I can,
Still looking to, and ever loving, heaven;
With reverence using all the gifts thence given.
'Mongst which, if I have any friendships sent,
Such as are square, well-tagged, and permanent,
Not built with canvas, paper, and false lights,
As are the glorious scenes at the great sights,
And that there be no fevery heats, nor colds,
Oily expansions, or shrunk dirty folds,
But all so clear and led by reason's flame,
As but to stumble in her sight were shame;
These I will honour, love, embrace, and serve,
And free it from all question to preserve.
So short you read my character, and theirs
I would call mine, to which not many stairs
Are asked to climb. First give me faith, who know Myself a little. I will take you so,
As you have writ yourself. Now stand, and then,
Sir, you are sealèd of the tribe of Ben.

An Ode. To Himself

Where dost thou careless lie,
Buried in ease and sloth?
Knowledge that sleeps doth die;
And this security,
It is the common moth
That eats on wits and arts, and [oft] destroys them both.

Are all the Aonian springs
Dried up? Lies Thespia waste? [1]
Doth Clarius' harp want strings, [2]
That not a nymph now sings?
Or droop they, as disgraced
To see their seats and bowers by chattering pies defaced? [3]

If hence thy silence be,
As 'tis too just a cause,
Let this thought quicken thee:
Minds that are great and free,
Should not on fortune pause;
'Tis crown enough to virtue still, her own applause.

What though the greedy fry
Be taken with false baits
Of worded balladry,
And think it poesy?
They die with their conceits,
And only piteous scorn upon their folly waits.

Then take in hand thy lyre,
Strike in thy proper strain;
With Japhet's line, aspire [4]
Sol's chariot for new fire
To give the world again; [5]
Who aided him, will thee, the issue of Jove's brain.[6]

And since our dainty age
Cannot endure reproof,
Make not thyself a page
To that strumpet, the stage;
But sing high and aloof,

---

[1] Aonian springs sacred to the Muses; Thespia a town at the foot of Mount Helicon, also sacred to the Muses.

[2] Clarius Apollo, sun god, patron of music and poetry, as worshipped in Claros, in Ionia.

[3] pies magpies, applied figuratively to cunning or saucy people (OED pie sb^{1} 2).

[4] Japhet for the biblical reference see Genesis 9:26-27. Jonson is thinking of Prometheus; see Horace, Odes I.iii.25-28; aspire ascend (OED aspire v 8).

[5] Prometheus stole fire from the gods and brought it to humankind.

[6] issue of Jove's brain Minerva, or Athena, who sprang from the head of Zeus, was goddess of crafts and battle. She also represented intelligence. Jonson may want his audience to recall her role as mythological helper of male heroes.

Safe from the wolf's black jaw, and the dull ass's hoof.

To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of that Noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison[1]

The Turn

Brave infant of Saguntum, clear
Thy coming forth in that great year
When the prodigious Hannibal did crown
His rage with razing your immortal town.
Thou, looking then about,
Ere thou wert half got out,
Wise child, didst hastily return,
And mad'st thy mother's womb thine urn.[2]
How summed a circle didst thou leave mankind
Of deepest lore, could we the centre find!

The Counter-Turn

Did wiser nature draw thee back
From out the horror of that sack?
Where shame, faith, honour, and regard of right
Lay trampled on; the deeds of death and night
Urged, hurried forth, and hurled
Upon the affrighted world:
Sword, fire, and famine with fell fury met,
And all on utmost ruin set;
As, could they but life's miseries foresee,
No doubt all infants would return like thee.

The Stand

For what is life, if measured by the space,
Not by the act?
Or maskèd man, if valued by his face
Above his fact?
Here's one outlived his peers
And told forth fourscore years;
He vexèd time, and busied the whole state;
Troubled both foes and friends,
But ever to no ends:
What did this stirrer, but die late?
How well at twenty had he fallen or stood!
For three of his fourscore he did no good.

The Turn

He entered well by virtuous parts,
Got up and thrived with honest arts;
He purchased friends and fame and honours then,
And had his noble name advanced with men;
But weary of that flight,
He stooped in all men's sight
To sordid flatteries, acts of strife,
And sunk in that dead sea of life
So deep, as he did then death's waters sup,
But that the cork of title buoyed him up.

The Counter-Turn

Alas, but Morison fell young!
He never fell: thou fall'st, my tongue.
He stood, a soldier to the last right end,
A perfect patriot, and a noble friend;
But most, a virtuous son.
All offices were done
By him so ample, full, and round,
In weight, in measure, number, sound,
As, though his age imperfect might appear,
His life was of humanity the sphere.

The Stand

Go now, and tell out days summed up with fears,
And make them years;

---

[1] Cary (?1610–1643), second Viscount Falkland, famed for his learning and for the intellectual circle associated with his estate Great Tew. Sir Henry Morison (1608–1629), Cary's brother-in-law, died probably of smallpox. Jonson's celebration of their friendship is the first sustained attempt in English to imitate the tripartite structure of the Pindaric ode.

[2] infant of Saguntum according to Pliny (Natural History, Vii.iii), an infant born in Saguntum (in Spain) while Hannibal was sacking the town immediately returned to its mother's womb.

Produce thy mass of miseries on the stage,
To swell thine age;
Repeat of things a throng,
To show thou hast been long,
Not lived; for life doth her great actions spell
By what was done and wrought
In season, and so brought
To light: her measures are, how well
Each syllabe answered, and was formed, how fair;
These make the lines of life, and that's her air.

The Turn

It is not growing like a tree
In bulk, doth make man better be;
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sere:
A lily of a day
Is fairer far, in May,
Although it fall and die that night;
It was the plant and flower of light.
In small proportions we just beauty see,
And in short measures life may perfect be.

The Counter-Turn

Call, noble Lucius, then for wine,
And let thy looks with gladness shine;
Accept this garland, plant it on thy head;
And think, nay know, thy Morison's not dead.
He leaped the present age,
Possessed with holy rage
To see that bright eternal day,
Of which we priests and poets say
Such truths, as we expect for happy men;
And there he lives with memory, and Ben

The Stand

Jonson, who sung this of him, ere he went
Himself to rest,
Or taste a part of that full joy he meant
To have expressed
In this bright asterism: [1]
Where it were friendship's schism
(Were not his Lucius long with us to tarry)
To separate these twi-
Lights, the Dioscuri; [2]
And keep the one half from his Harry.
But fate doth so alternate the design,
Whilst that in heaven, this light on earth must shine.

The Turn

And shine as you exalted are;
Two names of friendship, but one star:
Of hearts the union. And those not by chance
Made, or indentured, or leased out to advance
The profits for a time.
No pleasures vain did chime,
Of rhymes, or riots, at your feasts,
Orgies of drink, or feigned protests:
But simple love of greatness, and of good;
That knits brave minds and manners, more than blood.

The Counter-Turn

This made you first to know the why
You liked; then after, to apply
That liking; and approach so one the t'other,
Till either grew a portion of the other:
Each stylèd, by his end,
The copy of his friend.
You lived to be the great surnames
And titles by which all made claims
Unto the virtue. Nothing perfect done
But as a Cary, or a Morison.

The Stand

And such a force the fair example had,
As they that saw

[1] asterism constellation.

[2] Dioscuri Castor and Pollux, the twins set among the stars to form the constellation Gemini.

The good and durst not practise it, were glad
That such a law
Was left yet to mankind;
Where they might read and find
Friendship in deed was written, not in words;
And with the heart, not pen,
Of two so early men
Whose lines her rolls were, and records.
Who, ere the first down bloomèd on the chin,
Had sowed these fruits, and got the harvest in.

[Horace, Epode ii]
The Praises of a Country Life[1]

Happy is he, that from all business clear
As the old race of mankind were,
With his own oxen tills his sire's left lands,
And is not in the usurer's bands;
Nor, soldier-like, started with rough alarms,
Nor dreads the sea's enragèd harms;
But flees the bar and courts, with the proud boards
And waiting-chambers of great lords.
The poplar tall he then doth marrying twine
With the grown issue of the vine;
And with his hook lops off the fruitless race,
And sets more happy in the place;
Or in the bending vale beholds afar
The lowing herds there grazing are;
Or the pressed honey in pure pots doth keep
Of earth, and shears the tender sheep;
Or when that autumn through the fields lifts round
His head, with mellow apples crowned,
How, plucking pears his own hand grafted had,
And purple-matching grapes, he's glad!
With which, Priapus, he may thank thy hands,
And, Silvane, thine, that kept'st his lands.[2]
Then, now beneath some ancient oak he may,
Now in the rooted grass, him lay,
Whilst from the higher banks do slide the floods;
The soft birds quarrel in the woods,
The fountains murmur as the streams do creep,
And all invite to easy sleep.
Then when the thundering Jove his snow and showers
Are gathering by the wintry hours,
Or hence, or thence, he drives with many a hound
Wild boars into his toils pitched round;
Or strains on his small fork his subtle nets
For the eating thrush, or pitfalls sets;
And snares the fearful hare and new-come crane,
And 'counts them sweet rewards so ta'en.
Who, amongst these delights, would not forget
Love's cares so evil, and so great?
But if, to boot with these, a chaste wife, meet
For household aid and children sweet,
Such as the Sabines'; or a sun-burnt blowze,
Some lusty, quick Apulian's spouse,[3]
To deck the hallowed hearth with old wood fired
Against the husband comes home tired;
That penning the glad flock in hurdles by,
Their swelling udders doth draw dry;
And from the sweet tub wine of this year takes,
And unbought viands ready makes:
Not Locrine oysters I could then more prize,
Nor turbot, nor bright golden-eyes;[4]
If with bright floods, the winter troubled much,
Into our seas send any such,

---

[1] Drummond writes that Jonson read this poem to him "and admired it." This may be regarded as an example of "self-esteem, founded on just and right" (Milton), for this is a fine translation, imitating the form of the original to the extent of having the same number of lines. Horace's second epode has been frequently translated.

[2] Priapus Greek and Roman god of fertility and hence of gardens, vineyards, etc. Silvane Silvanus, the Roman god of forests and agriculture.

[3] The Sabines were ancient Italians, inhabiting the central Apennines, whose wives had a reputation for modesty, constancy, and thrift; blowze a sunburnt female, often of the working or rustic class (OED). The Apulians lived in southern Italy.

[4] The Romans especially prized oysters of the Lucrine Lake; turbot European coastal fish, much-esteemed as food; golden-eyes probably another species of fish, although also a species of sea-duck (OED).

The Ionian godwit, nor the Guinea-hen[1]
Could not go down my belly then
More sweet than olives that new-gathered be
From fattest branches of the tree;
Or the herb sorrel that loves meadows still,
Or mallows, loosing body's ill; [2]
Or at the feast of bounds, the lamb then slain,
Or kid forced from the wolf again. [3]
Among these cates how glad the sight doth come [4]
Of the fed flocks approaching home!
To view the weary oxen draw, with bare
And fainting necks, the turnèd share!
The wealthy household swarm of bondmen met,
And 'bout the steaming chimney set!
These thoughts when usurer Alfius, now about
To turn mere farmer, had spoke out,
'Gainst the ides his moneys he gets in with pain
At the calends, puts all out again. [5]

On The New Inn
Ode. To Himself [6]

Come, leave the loathèd stage,
And the more loathsome age,
Where pride and impudence, in faction knit,
Usurp the chair of wit:
Indicting and arraigning every day
Something they call a play.
Let their fastidious, vain
Commission of the brain
Run on and rage, sweat, censure, and condemn:
They were not made for thee, less thou for them.

Say that thou pour'st them wheat,
And they will acorns eat:
'Twere simple fury still thyself to waste
On such as have no taste:
To offer them a surfeit of pure bread
Whose appetites are dead.
No, give them grains their fill,
Husks, draff to drink and swill; [7]
If they love lees, and leave the lusty wine,
Envy them not, their palate's with the swine.

No doubt some mouldy tale
Like Pericles, and stale
As the shrieve's crusts, and nasty as his fish-
Scraps out of every dish, [8]
Thrown forth, and raked into the common tub,
May keep up the play club:
There sweepings do as well
As the best-ordered meal.
For who the relish of these guests will fit
Needs set them but the alms-basket of wit.

And much good d't you then:
Brave plush and velvet men
Can feed on orts; and safe in your stage-clothes
Dare quit, upon your oaths,
The stagers and the stage-wrights too (your peers)
Or larding your large ears
With their foul comic socks,
Wrought upon twenty blocks:

---

[1] Ionian godwit…Guinea-hen edible birds (OED).

[2] sorrel…mallows edible herbs.

[3] feast of bounds in honour of Terminus, god of boundaries. Meat was eaten at this feast. The wolf was thought to take the best of the flock.

[4] cates delicacies (OED).

[5] ides and calends days upon which debts and interest came due. The poem ends sardonically; in spite of his praise of the country life, Alfius will continue to practise usury in the town.

[6] The New Inn a play by Jonson, hissed off the stage in 1629; Jonson published this ode with the play in 1631.

[7] draff dregs.

[8] Pericles by Shakespeare, first printed in 1609; shrieve's sheriff's; referring to the food, often leftovers, collected to feed impoverished prisoners.

Which, if they're torn and turned and patched enough,
The gamesters share your guilt, and you their stuff.

Leave things so prostitute,
And take the Alcaic lute,
Or thine own Horace, or Anacreon's lyre;
Warm thee by Pindar's fire:[1]
And though thy nerves be shrunk and blood be cold
Ere years have made thee old,
Strike that disdainful heat
Throughout, to their defeat:
As curious fools, and envious of thy strain,
May, blushing, wear no palsy's in thy brain.

But when they hear thee sing
The glories of thy king,
His zeal to God, and his just awe o'er men:
They may, blood-shaken, then
Feel such a flesh-quake to possess their powers,
As they shall cry: Like ours
In sound of peace or wars
No harp e'er hit the stars,
In tuning forth the acts of his sweet reign:
And raising Charles's chariot 'bove his Wain.[2]

To the Memory of My Beloved, The Author, Mr William Shakespeare, And What He Hath Left Us[3]

To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name,
Am I thus ample to thy book and fame;[4]
While I confess thy writings to be such
As neither man nor muse can praise too much:
'Tis true, and all men's suffrage. But these ways
Were not the paths I meant unto thy praise:
For silliest ignorance on these may light,
Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right;
Or blind affection, which doth ne'er advance
The truth, but gropes, and urgeth all by chance;
Or crafty malice might pretend this praise,
And think to ruin where it seemed to raise.
These are as some infamous bawd or whore
Should praise a matron: what could hurt her more?
But thou art proof against them, and indeed
Above the ill fortune of them, or the need.
I therefore will begin. Soul of the age!
The applause, delight, the wonder of our stage!
My Shakespeare, rise: I will not lodge thee by
Chaucer or Spenser, or bid Beaumont lie
A little further, to make thee a room;
Thou art a monument without a tomb,[5]
And art alive still while thy book doth live,
And we have wits to read, and praise to give.
That I not mix thee so, my brain excuses:
I mean with great, but disproportioned, muses;
For if I thought my judgement were of years[6]
I should commit thee surely with thy peers:

died same year as Chaucer → all buried in west minster abbey

Doesn't mean much → think of church monuments → herbert believed good writers knew Latin + Greek symmetrical turn-abouts

And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine,
Or sporting Kyd, or Marlowe's mighty line.
And though thou hadst small Latin, and less Greek,
From thence to honour thee I would not seek
For names, but call forth thundering Aeschylus,
Euripides, and Sophocles to us,
Pacuvius, Accius, him of Cordova dead, [1]
To life again, to hear thy buskin tread
And shake a stage; or, when thy socks were on, [2]
Leave thee alone for the comparison
Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.
Triumph, my Britain, thou hast one to show
To whom all scenes of Europe homage owe.
He was not of an age, but for all time!
And all the muses still were in their prime
When like Apollo he came forth to warm
Our ears, or like a Mercury to charm! [3]
Nature herself was proud of his designs,
And joyed to wear the dressing of his lines,
Which were so richly spun and woven so fit
As, since, she will vouchsafe no other wit.
The merry Greek, tart Aristophanes,
Neat Terence, witty Plautus, now not please, [4]
But antiquated and deserted lie
As they were not of nature's family.
Yet must I not give nature all: thy art,
My gentle Shakespeare, must enjoy a part.
For though the poet's matter nature be,
His art doth give the fashion. And that he [5]
Who casts to write a living line must sweat [6]
(Such as thine are) and strike the second heat
Upon the muses' anvil: turn the same
(And himself with it) that he thinks to frame;
Or for the laurel he may gain a scorn: [7]
For a good poet's made, as well as born;
And such wert thou. Look how the father's face
Lives in his issue: even so, the race [8]
Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines
In his well-turnèd and true-filèd lines:
In each of which he seems to shake a lance,
As brandished at the eyes of ignorance.
Sweet swan of Avon! What a sight it were
To see thee in our waters yet appear,
And make those flights upon the banks of Thames
That so did take Eliza, and our James!
But stay, I see thee in the hemisphere
Advanced, and made a constellation there!
Shine forth, thou star of poets, and with rage
Or influence chide or cheer the drooping stage;
Which, since thy flight from hence, hath mourned like night,
And despairs day, but for thy volume's light.

Clerimont's Song [9]

Still to be neat, still to be dressed,
As you were going to a feast;
Still to be powdered, still perfumed:
Lady, it is to be presumed,
Though art's hid causes are not found,
All is not sweet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:

A Vision of Beauty[1]

It was a beauty that I saw
So pure, so perfect, as the frame
Of all the universe was lame;
To that one figure, could I draw,
Or give least line of it a law!

A skein of silk without a knot!
A fair march made without a halt!
A curious form without a fault!
A printed book without a blot!
All beauty, and without a spot!

William Laud

1573 – 1645

Born in Reading, the son of a clothier, Laud entered St. John's College, Oxford in 1589 and remained there for more than two decades, as scholar, Fellow, and eventually College President (1611). His early career in the church was slowed by the hostility of George Abbot, the puritan Archbishop of Canterbury, and the suspicions of James I, who distrusted what he called Laud's "restless spirit." Laud eventually caught the attention of the Duke of Buckingham, with whose help he was made Bishop of St. David's, in Wales, in 1621. But it was the accession of Charles I that marked the beginning of Laud's rapid rise to national prominence: he was made Dean of the Chapel Royal (1626), Bishop of Bath and Wells (1626), Privy Councillor (1627), Bishop of London (1628), Chancellor of the University of Oxford (1629), and finally Archbishop of Canterbury (1633).

Laud and King Charles shared a strong belief in the need for uniformity of worship within the church, in the value and dignity of ceremony, and in the necessity of obedience to religious and political superiors. Laud's dislike of opposition and of religious debate mirrored the King's dislike of unruly and questioning parliaments. His Arminian or "high church" emphasis on ceremony and ritual in worship led to accusations that Laud was seeking to reintroduce Catholic practices into the English church. Some historians have argued that it was Laud's insistence on compulsory uniformity that divided into hostile camps a church that had previously tolerated a measure of diversity. Eventually, an increasingly radicalized puritan opposition blamed Laud for the "Bishops' wars" that followed the attempt to introduce a new service book in Scotland; he was impeached of high treason by Parliament in 1640, committed to the Tower in 1641, tried in 1644, and beheaded in January 1645.

The history of the following diary is sketched in the preface by Henry Wharton, the text's seventeenth-century editor. It was first published, with some deliberate inaccuracies, by Laud's political enemies in the 1640s. Wharton published a corrected version as an introduction to his edition of Laud's self-defence, The History of the Troubles and Tryal of... William Laud (1695). While not as detailed or personal (except for the records of his dreams) as the diaries kept by Samuel Pepys and John Evelyn, Laud's diary provides a capsule summary of major events from the 1620s to the 1640s by a person who was intimately involved in them. For a contemporary view of Laud, see Clarendon's "character" of the Archbishop in the selection from The History of the Rebellion.

The Diary of... William Laud

(selections)

The Preface

That the reader may be satisfied how it came to pass, that an history wrote of, and by, a person of so great a character in this nation, and by him designed for the public, hath lain hid, and been suppressed for near fifty years; through whose hands it hath passed; and by what means, and by whose labour it is at last published; he may be pleased to take the following account.[1]

The Most Reverend Archbishop, the author and subject of this history, was very exact and careful in keeping all papers, which concerned himself, or any affairs of Church and State, passing through his hands; not only kept a journal of his own actions, but from time to time took minutes of whatsoever passed at Council Table, Star Chamber, High Commission Court,[1] etc.; digested all his papers in most exact order; wrote with his own hand on the back or top of every one, what it concerned, when it was received, when wrote or answered, etc.

[1] an history referring to the autobiographical History of the Troubles and Tryal of... William Laud (1695), with which this Diary was published.

This his enemies knew full well; and therefore, when after they had caused him to be impeached of High Treason, of endeavouring to introduce Popery and arbitrary government, and to be imprisoned upon the impeachment in the end of the year 1640, and had now in vain laboured for two years and an half, to find out evidence to prove this their accusation; but the more they sought, they found to their confusion, so much the greater evidence of the contrary: After they had in vain ransacked all papers left by the Archbishop in his study at Lambeth, and examined all his intimate friends and subaltern agents upon oath; when nothing did appear, they hoped to find somewhat against him, either in his private journal of his life, which they knew to be kept by him, or in those papers, which he had carried with him from Lambeth at his first commitment, in order to his future defence. Upon these hopes, they with great privacy framed an order, for the searching his chamber and pockets in the Tower, in May 1643, and committed the execution of it, to his inveterate enemy, William Prynne;[2] who thereupon took from the Archbishop twenty-one bundles of papers, which he had prepared for his defence; his Diary, his book of private devotions, the Scotch Service-Book,[3] and directions accompanying it, &c. And although he then faithfully promised restitution of them within three or four days, yet never restored any more than three bundles; employed such against the Archbishop at his trial, as might seem prejudicial to his cause; suppressed those, which might be advantageous to him; published many, embezzled some; and kept the rest to the day of his death.

As soon as Prynne was possessed of the Archbishop's papers, he set himself with eager malice to make use of them to his defamation, and to prove the charge of Popery and abetting arbitrary government, by the publication of many of them. His first specimen in this kind was a pamphlet, which came out in August following, entitled Rome's Master-piece, in five sheets in quarto, containing the papers and letters relating to the plot contrived by Papists against the Church and State then established in England, and discovered by Andreas ab Habernfeild.[4] But never did malice appear so gross and ridiculous together, as in this case. For from this plot, if there were any truth in it, it appeared that the life of the Archbishop was chiefly aim'd at by the plotters, as the grand obstacle of their design, and one who could by no arts be wrought to any connivance of them, much less concurrence with them. This pamphlet being, after the publication of it, carried to the Archbishop in the Tower, he made several marginal annotations on it, in answer to Prynne's falsifications and malicious calumnies intermixed therein. Which copy, coming afterwards into the hands of Dr. Baily, the Archbishop's executor,[1] was by him given to the learned antiquary, Mr. Anthony Wood, and by him transmitted to me, in order to be placed among the other papers and memorials which are to follow this history, according to the Archbishop's own direction.

[1] That is, Laud took notes during the deliberations of the Privy Council (the governing body of the realm), and at proceedings at the courts of Star Chamber (associated with the maintenance of royal authority) and High Commission (an ecclesiastical court).

[2] Prynne A prolific controversialist, the Presbyterian William Prynne (1600–69) had spent much of the 1630s in prison (and had had his ears cut off) for writing pamphlets that attacked the church, particularly Laud and episcopacy, and the theatre, particularly court entertainments.

[3] Scotch Service-Book a revised liturgy that Laud and the King attempted to introduce in Scotland, with disastrous results, in 1637 (see the King's Proclamation against the Scots).

[4] Prynne, Rome's Master-peece; or, the Grand Conspiracy of the Pope and his Jesuited Instruments to Extirpate the Protestant Religion (1643). In 1640, Habernfeld brought English authorities in The Hague a fantastic story about an elaborate Catholic plot to promote a civil war.

But Prynne's malice could not be abated by the shame of one miscarriage. In the next place, he bethought himself of publishing the Archbishop's Diary, as soon as his trial ended, wherein it had been often produced as evidence against him. This then he published in the beginning of September, 1644, in nine sheets in folio, with this title, A Breviat of the Life of, &c. (intending it, as he saith, for a prologue to the much desired history of his trial) but neither the entire, nor faithfully, as far as he did publish it; but altered, mangled, corrupted, and glossed in a most shameful manner; accompanied with desperate untruths, as the Archbishop complains in this history; and therefore addeth: "For this Breviat of his, if God lend me life and strength to end this [the history] first; I shall discover to the world, the base and malicious slanders, with which it is fraught." This the Archbishop wrote, when he despaired that ever his Diary should be recovered out of those vile hands, in which it then was; and be published faithfully and entirely, which would be the most effectual discovery of the baseness and malice of Prynne therein.

Yet notwithstanding so vile and corrupt an edition of it, all those who have wrote any thing of this excellent prelate, have been forced to make use of it; not being able to gain the sight of the original, nor perhaps so much as suspecting any such fraud in the edition of it. Particularly, it is much to be lamented, that Dr. Heylin, who wrote the History of the Archbishop's life with great care and elegance,[2] was forced, in most things, to borrow his account from this corrupted edition of his Diary, and hath thereby been led into many and great errors. Others also have, since him, taken up and divulged many false opinions concerning the Diary itself; as that it was wholly wrote in Latin by the Archbishop, that it was by himself entitled A Breviat of his Life, and that it was translated and published entire by Prynne.

The true and faithful publication of it, which I have made from the original, now in my hands, will not only supply the defect of what the Archbishop intended in the words before related, but never effected; but will also undeniably assert his innocence from those greater accusations formerly brought against him, and will farther clear him from many later aspersions of lesser moment....

HENRY WHARTON

. . . .

Anno 1624

January 25. It was Sunday. I was alone, and languishing with I know not what sadness. I was much concerned at the envy and undeserved hatred born to me by the Lord Keeper.[3] I took into my hands the Greek Testament; that I might read the portion of the day. I lighted upon the XIII Chapter to the Hebrews; wherein that of David, Psalm 56 occurred to me then grieving and fearing: The Lord is my helper: I will not fear, what man can do unto me. I thought an example was set to me; and who is not safe under that shield? Protect me O Lord my God.

February 1. I stood by the most illustrious Prince Charles at dinner. He was then very merry; and talked occasionally of many things with his attendants. Among other things, he said, that if he were necessitated to take any particular profession of life, he could not be a lawyer; adding his reasons. I cannot (saith he) defend a bad, nor yield in a good cause. May you ever hold this resolution and succeed (most Serene Prince) in matters of greater moment, for ever prosperous.

Anno 1625

January 30. Sunday night, my dream of my Blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. One of the most comfortable passages that ever I had in my life.

. . . .

March 27. Midlent Sunday, I preached at White-Hall. I ascended the pulpit, much troubled, and in a very melancholy moment, the report then spreading, that his Majesty King James, of most sacred memory to me, was dead. Being interrupted with the dolours of the Duke of Buckingham, I broke off my sermon in the middle. The King died at Theobalds, about three quarters of an hour past eleven in the forenoon. He breathed forth his blessed soul most religiously, and with great constancy of faith, and courage. That day, about five o'clock, Prince Charles was solemnly proclaimed King. God grant to him a prosperous and happy reign. The King fell sick, March 4 on Friday. The disease appeared to be a tertian ague. But I fear it was the gout, which by the wrong application of medicines, was driven from his feet to his inward vital parts.

April 1. I received letters from the Earl of Pembroke, Lord Chamberlain to the King, and therein a command from his Majesty King Charles, to preach a sermon before himself and the House of Peers in the session of Parliament, to be held on the 17 day of May next following.

April 3. I delivered into the Duke of Buckingham's hands, my short Annotations upon the Life and Death of the most august King James; which he had commanded me to put in writing.

April 5. I exhibited a schedule, in which were wrote the names of many churchmen, marked with the letters "O" and "P".[1] The Duke of Buckingham had commanded to digest their names in that method; that (as himself said) he might deliver them to King Charles.

. . . .

May 1. The marriage was celebrated at Paris, between his Majesty King Charles, and the most illustrious Princess Henrietta Maria of France, daughter of Henry IV.[2]

May 7, Saturday. We celebrated the funeral of King James.

May 11. Early in the morning the Duke of Buckingham went towards the sea-side, to pass over into France to meet Queen Mary. I wrote letters to the Duke that day; which might follow after him. For he went in great haste.

May 17. The Parliament was put off till the last day of May.

May 18. I took a short journey with my brother to Hammersmith, that we might there see our common friends. It was Wednesday.

May 19. I sent letters the second time to the Duke of Buckingham, then staying for a while at Paris.

May 29. I gave a third letter into the hands of the Bishop of Durham, who was to attend the King; that he might deliver them to the Duke of Buckingham at his first landing.

May 30. I went to Chelsea, to wait upon the Duchess of Buckingham.

---

[1] for "orthodox" (meaning sympathetic to the high church or "Arminian" ceremonialism later associated with Laud) and "puritan."

[2] The two were married by proxy; the Queen arrived in England the following month.

May 31. The Parliament was a second time put off, till Monday the 13 of June. King Charles set forward toward Canterbury, to meet the Queen.

June 5, Whitsunday. In the morning, just as I was going to prayers, I received letters from France, from the most illustrious Duke of Buckingham.

June 6. I wrote an answer next morning. After I had finished my answer, the Right Reverend Lancelot Lord Bishop of Winchester and I went together to the country house which John Lord Bishop of Rochester hath by Bromley. We dined there; and returned in the evening.

June 8. I went to Chelsea, but returned with my labour lost.

June 12. It was Trinity Sunday, Queen Mary crossing the seas, landed upon our shore about seven o'clock in the evening. God grant, that she may be an evening and an happy star to our orb.

. . . .

July 3, Sunday. In my sleep his Majesty King James appeared to me. I saw him only passing by swiftly. He was of a pleasant and serene countenance. In passing he saw me, beckoned to me, smiled, and was immediately withdrawn from my sight.

July 7. Richard Montague was brought into the Lower House of Parliament,[1] &c.

July 9. It pleased his Majesty King Charles, to intimate to the House of Commons that what had been there said and resolved, without consulting him, in Montague's cause, was not pleasing to him.

July 11. The Parliament was prorogued to Oxford, against the first day of August.

July 13. There having died in the former week at London 1222 persons, I went in to the country, to the house of my good friend Francis Windebank. In going thither, Richard Montague met me by chance. I was the first, who certified him of the King's favour to him.

. . . .

August 21, Sunday. I preached at Brecknock; where I stayed two days, very busy in performing some business. That night, in my sleep, it seemed to me, that the Duke of Buckingham came into bed to me; where he behaved himself with great kindness towards me, after that rest, wherewith wearied persons are wont to solace themselves. Many also seemed to me to enter the chamber, who saw this. Not long before, I dreamed that I saw the Duchess of Buckingham, that excellent Lady, at first very much perplexed about her husband, but afterwards cheerful, and rejoycing, that she was freed from the fear of abortion, so that in due time she might be again a mother.

August 24, Wednesday, and the Festival of St. Bartholomew. I came safely (thanks be to God) to my own house at Aberguilly.[2] Although my coach had been twice that day overturned between Aber-Markes and my house. The first time I was in it; but the latter time it was empty.

August 28, Sunday. I consecrated the Chapel or Oratory, which I had built at my own charge in my house, commonly called Aberguilly-House. I named it the Chapel of St. John Baptist, in grateful remembrance of St. John Baptist's College in Oxford, of which I had been first Fellow, and afterwards President. And this I had determined to do. But another thing intervened (of no ill omen as I hope) of which I had never thought. It was this. On Saturday, the evening immediately preceding the consecration, while I was intent at prayer, I know not how, it came strongly into my mind, that the day of the beheading of St. John Baptist was very near. When prayers were finished, I consulted the calendar. I found that day to fall upon Monday, to wit, the 29th of August, not upon Sunday. I could have wished, it had fallen upon that same day, when I consecrated the Chapel. However, I was pleased, that I should perform that solemn consecration at least on the eve of that Festival. For upon that day, his Majesty King James heard my cause about the election to the Presidentship of St. John's College in Oxford, for three hours together at least; and with great justice delivered me out of the hands of my powerful enemies.[1]

---

[1] Montague Richard Montague (1577–1641) scandalized Parliament with publications that appeared to minimize the differences between the Church of England and Catholicism; he was examined before the Commons and placed in custody, but released by the King. He was later made Bishop of Chichester (1628) and Norwich (1638).

[2] Abergwili, in Wales; Laud at the time was Bishop of St. David's.

September 4, Sunday. The night following I was very much troubled in my dreams. My imagination ran altogether upon the Duke of Buckingham, his servants, and family. All seemed to be out of order: that the Duchess was ill, called for her maids, and took her bed. God grant better things.

. . . .

September 26, Sunday. That night I dreamed of the marriage of I know not whom at Oxford. All that were present, were clothed with flourishing green garments.

. . . .

Anno 1626

January 29. I understood what D.B. [Duke of Buckingham] had collected concerning the cause, book, and opinions of Richard Montague, and what R.C. [King Charles] had determined with himself therein. Methinks, I see a cloud arising, and threatening the Church of England. God of his mercy dissipate it.

January 31. The Bishops and other peers before nominated by the King to consult of the ceremonies of the coronation, that the ancient manner might be observed, by his Majesty's command went together to him. The King viewed all the regalia; put on St. Edward's tunics; commanded me to read the rubrics of direction. All being read, we carried back the regalia to the church of Westminster, and laid them up in their place.

February 2, Thursday and Candlemas day. His Majesty King Charles was crowned. I then officiated in the place of the Dean of Westminster. The King entered the Abby Church a little before ten o'clock; and it was past three, before he went out of it. It was a very bright sun-shining day. The solemnity being ended, in the great Hall at Westminster, when the King delivered into my hands the regalia, which are kept in the Abby Church of Westminster, he did (which had not before been done) deliver to me the sword called Curtana, and two others, which had been carried before the King that day, to be kept in the Church, together with the other regalia. I returned, and offered them solemnly at the altar in the name of the King, and laid them up with the rest. In so great a ceremony, and amidst an incredible concourse of people, nothing was lost, or broke, or disordered. The theatre was clear, and free for the King, the Peers, and the business in hand; and I heard some of the nobility saying to the King in their return, that they never had seen any solemnity, although much less, performed with so little noise, and so great order.

February 6, Monday. I preached before King Charles and the House of Peers, at the opening of the Parliament.

February 11, Saturday. At the desire of the Earl of Warwick, a conference was held concerning the cause of Richard Montague, in the Duke of Buckingham's house [between Dr. Morton and Dr. Preston on the one side, and Dr. White on the other].[2]

. . . .

May 8, Monday. At two o'clock in the afternoon, the House of Commons brought up to the House of Peers a charge against the Duke of Buckingham, consisting of thirteen articles.[1]

May 11. King Charles came into the Parliament House, and made a short speech to the Lords, concerning preserving the honour of the nobility against the vile and malicious calumnies of those in the House of Commons, who had accused the Duke, &c.[2] They were eight, who in this matter chiefly appeared. The prologue, Sir Dudley Digges, the epilogue, John Elliot, were this day by the King's command committed to the Tower. They were both dismissed thence within few days.

. . . .

June 15, Thursday. After many debates and strugglings, private malice against the Duke of Buckingham prevailed, and stopped all business. Nothing was done; but the Parliament was dissolved.

. . . .

August 25, Friday. Two robin red-breasts flew together through the door into my study, as if one pursued the other. That sudden motion almost startled me. I was then preparing a sermon on Ephes. 4:30 and studying.

September 14. Thursday evening, the Duke of Buckingham willed me to form certain Instructions, partly political, partly ecclesiastical, in the cause of the King of Denmark, a little before brought into great straits by General Tilly, to be sent through all parishes.[3] Certain heads were delivered to me. He would have them made ready by Saturday following.

September 16, Saturday. I made them ready, and brought them at the appointed hour. I read them to the Duke. He brought me to the King. I being so commanded, read them again. Each of them approved them.

September 17, Sunday. They were read (having been left with the Duke) before the Lords of the Privy Council; and were (thanks be to God) approved by them all.

September 21, Monday. About four o'clock in the morning, died Lancelot Andrewes, the most worthy Bishop of Winchester, the great light of the Christian world.

September 30, Saturday. The Duke of Buckingham signified to me the King's resolution, that I should succeed the Bishop of Winchester in the office of Dean of the Chapel-Royal.

October 2, Monday. The Duke related to me, what the King had farther resolved concerning me, in case the Archbishop of Canterbury should die, &c.

Anno 1627

January 5, Epiphany-Eve, and Friday. In the night I dreamed that my mother, long since dead, stood by my bed, and drawing aside the clothes a little, looked pleasantly upon me; and that I was glad to see her with so merry an aspect. She then show'd to me a certain old man, long since deceased; whom, while alive, I both knew and loved. He seem'd to lie upon the ground; merry enough, but with a wrinkled countenance. His name was Grove. While I prepared to salute him, I awoke....

January 14, Sunday. Towards morning, I dreamed that the Bishop of Lincoln came,[4] I know not whither, with iron chains. But returning loosed from them, leaped on horseback, went away; neither could I overtake him.

[2] This speech was written by Laud.

[3] An exercise in "tuning the pulpits." Having dissolved Parliament before it voted him the usual subsidies, Charles was forced to look for alternative sources of funds. These instructions encouraged public contributions to a loan, ostensibly to aid the King's (Protestant) uncle, Christian IV of Denmark, in his battle against the (Catholic) Holy Roman Emperor.

[4] Bishop of Lincoln John Williams, Laud's rival.

January 16, Tuesday. I dreamed that the King went out to hunt; and that when he was hungry, I brought him on the sudden into the house of my friend Francis Windebank. While he prepareth to eat, I, in the absence of others, presented the cup to him after the usual manner. I carried drink to him; but it pleased him not. I carried it again, but in a silver cup. Thereupon his Majesty said: You know, that I always drink out of glass. I go away again; and awoke.

January 17, Wednesday. I show my reasons to the King, why the papers of the late Bishop of Winchester, concerning Bishops, that they are jure divino,[1] should be printed; contrary to what the Bishop of Lincoln had pitifully, and to the great detriment of the Church of England, signified to the King; as the King himself had before related to me.

February 7, Ash-Wednesday. I preached at Court, at White-Hall.

February 9, Friday. The following night I dreamed, that I was troubled with the scurvy; and that on the sudden all my teeth became loose; that one of them especially in the lower jaw, I could scarce hold in with my finger, till I called out for help, &c.

. . . .

March 8. I came to London. The night following I dreamed, that I was reconciled to the Church of Rome. This troubled me much; and I wondered exceedingly, how it should happen. Nor was I aggrieved with myself, [only by reason of the errors of that Church, but also][2] upon account of the scandal, which from that my fall, would be cast upon many eminent and learned men in the Church of England. So being troubled at my dream, I said with myself, that I would go immediately, and, confessing my fault, would beg pardon of the Church of England. Going with this resolution, a certain Priest met me, and would have stopped me. But moved with indignation, I went on my way. And while I wearied myself with these troublesome thoughts, I awoke. Herein I felt such strong impressions ; that I could scarce believe it to be a dream.

Anno 1628

June 1, Whitsunday. I preached at White-Hall.

June 11. My Lord Duke of Buckingham voted in the House of Commons to be the cause, or causes, of all grievances in the Kingdom.

June 12. I was complained of by the House of Commons for warranting Doctor Manwaring's sermons to the press.[3]

June 13. Dr. Manwaring answered for himself before the Lords; and the next day.

June 14, being Saturday, was censured. After his censure my cause was called to the report. And by God's goodness towards me, I was fully cleared in the House. The same day the House of Commons were making their Remonstrance to the King: one head was innovation of religion. Therein they named my Lord the Bishop of Winchester and myself. One in the House stood up, and said: Now we have named these persons, let us think of some causes why we did it. Sir Edward Coke answered, Have we not named my Lord of Buckingham without showing a cause, and may we not be as bold with them?

[1] jure divino the doctrine that episcopacy was by "divine right."

[2] These words are most maliciously omitted by Prynne [note by Wharton, referring to the material in square brackets].

[3] Roger Manwaring (1590–1653), at the time chaplain to the King; Laud had facilitated the publication of two sermons he made that argued the duty of subjects to submit to their superiors on issues of religion.

August 23, Saturday, St. Bartholomew's Eve. The Duke of Buckingham slain at Portsmouth by one Lieutenant Felton, about nine in the morning.

August 24. The news of his death came to Croydon; where it found myself and the bishops of Winchester, Ely, and Carlisle, at the consecration of Bishop Montague for Chichester, with my Lord's Grace.

. . . .

October 20. I was forced to put on a truss for a rupture. I know not how occasioned, unless it were with swinging of a book for my exercise in private.

November 29. Felton was executed at Tyburn for killing the Duke; and afterwards his body was sent to be hanged in chains at Portsmouth. It was Saturday and St. Andrew's even; and he killed the Duke upon Saturday St. Bartholomew's even.

. . . .

Anno 1629

January 26. The 240 Greek manuscripts were sent to London House. These I got my Lord of Pembroke to buy and give to Oxford.[1]

January 31, Saturday night. I lay in Court. I dreamed, that I put off my rochet,[2] all save one sleeve; and when I would have put it on again, I could not find it.

February 6. Sir Thomas Roe sent to London House 28 manuscripts in Greek, to have a catalogue drawn, and the books to be for Oxford.

March 2. The Parliament to be dissolved declared by proclamation, upon some disobedient passages to his Majesty that day in the House of Commons.

March 10. The Parliament dissolved, the King present. The Parliament, which was broken up this March 10, laboured my ruin; but, God be ever blessed for it, found nothing against me.

March 29. Two papers were found in the Dean of Paul's his yard before his house. The one was to this effect concerning myself: Laud, look to thy self; be assured thy life is sought. As thou art the fountain of all wickedness, repent thee of thy monstrous sins, before thou be taken out of the world, &c. And assure thy self, neither God nor the world can endure such a vile counsellor to live, or such a whisperer; or to this effect. The other was as bad as this, against the Lord Treasurer. Mr. Dean delivered both papers to the King that night. Lord, I am a grievous sinner; but I beseech thee, deliver my soul from them that hate me without a cause.

Anno 1630

May 29, Saturday. Prince Charles was born at St. James's. Paulo ante horam primam post meridiem [just before one o'clock in the afternoon], I was in the house 3 hours before, and had the honour and the happiness to see the Prince, before he was full one hour old.

June 27, Sunday. I had the honour, as Dean of the Chapel, my Lord's Grace of Canterbury being infirm, to christen Prince Charles at St. James's, horâ ferè quintâ pomeridianâ [at nearly five o'clock in the afternoon].

Anno 1633

August 4, Sunday. News came to court of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's death;[3] and the King resolved presently to give it me. Which he did

[3] George Abbot (1562–1633), whose puritan sympathies had made him a long-time opponent of Laud's.

August 6. That very morning, at Greenwich, there came one to me, seriously, and that avowed ability to perform it, and offered me to be a Cardinal: I went presently to the King, and acquainted him both with the thing and the person.

. . . .

August 14. A report brought to me, that I was poisoned.

August 17. I had a serious offer made me again to be a Cardinal: I was then from court, but so soon as I came thither (which was Wednesday August 21) I acquainted his Majesty with it. But my answer again was, that somewhat dwelt within me, which would not suffer that, till Rome were other than it is.

. . . .

September 19. I was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. The Lord make me able, &c. The day before, viz. September 18, when I first went to Lambeth,[1] my coach, horses and men sunk to the bottom of the Thames in the ferry-boat, which was over-laden, but I praise God for it, I lost neither man, nor horse. A wet summer, and by it a casual harvest. The rainy weather continuing till November 14 which made a marvellous ill seed-time. There was barley abroad this year, within 30 miles of London, at the end of October.

November 13. Richard Boyer, who had formerly named himself Lodowick, was brought into the Star Chamber, for most grossly misusing me, and accusing me of no less than treason, &c. He had broken prison for felony, when he did this. His censure is upon record. And God forgive him.

About the beginning of this month the Lady Davis prophesied against me,[2] that I should very few days out-live the fifth of November.

Anno 1634

January 1. The way to do the town of Reading good for their poor;[3] which may be compassed by God's blessing upon me, though my wealth be small. And I hope God will bless me in it, because it was his own motion in me. For this way never came into my thoughts (though I had much beaten them about it) till this night, as I was at my prayers. Amen Lord.

March 30, Palm-Sunday. I preached to the King at White-Hall.

May 13. I received the seals of my being chose Chancellor of the University of Dublin in Ireland. To which office I was chosen September 14, 1633. There were now, and somewhat before, great fractions in Court: And I doubt, many private ends followed to the prejudice of public service. Good Lord preserve me.

June 11. Mr. Prynne sent me a very libellous letter, about his censure in the Star Chamber for his Histriomastix,[4] and what I said at that censure; in which he hath many ways mistaken me, and spoken untruth of me.

June 16. I showed this letter to the King; and by his command sent it to Mr. Attorney Noye.

June 17. Mr. Attorney sent for Mr. Prynne to his chamber; showed him the letter, asked him whether it were his hand. Mr. Prynne said, he could not tell, unless he might read it. The letter being given into his hand, he tore it into small pieces, threw it out at the window, and said, that should never rise in judgement against him: Fearing, it seems, an Ore tenus for this.[5]

[4] Prynne's Histriomastix (1632) attacked the theatre, and by implication the King and Queen for participating in court masques; Prynne was censured in Star Chamber in 1634.

[5] Ore tenus "by word of mouth" or oral pleading; here a form of legal action.

June 18. Mr. Attorney brought him for this into the Star-Chamber; where all this appear'd with shame enough to Mr. Prynne. I there forgave him, &c.

June 26. I received word from Oxford, that the Statutes were accepted and published, according to my letters, in the Convocation-House that week.[1]

. . . .

Anno 1635

September 29. The Earl of Arundel brought an old man out of Shropshire. He was this present Michaelmas-day showed to the King and the other Lords, for a man of 152 or 153 years of age.

October 26, Monday. This morning between four and five of the clock, lying at Hampton Court: I dreamed, that I was going out in haste, and that when I came into my outer chamber, there was my servant William Pennell in the same riding suit, which he had on that day sevennight at Hampton Court with me. Methoughts I wondered to see him (for I left him sick at home) and asked him, how he did, and what he made there. And that he answered me, he came to receive my blessing; and with that fell on his knees. That hereupon I laid my hand on his head, and prayed over him, and therewith awaked. When I was up, I told this to them of my chamber; and added, that I should find Pennell dead or dying. My coach came; and when I came home, I found him past sense, and giving up the ghost. So my prayers (as they had frequently before) commended him to God.

Anno 1636

October 14, Friday night. I dreamed marvellously, that the King was offended with me, and would cast me off, and tell me no cause why. Avertat Deus [may God prevent it]. For cause I have given none.

. . . .

Anno 1637

June 14. This day John Bastwick Dr. of Physick, Henry Burton Batch. of Divinity, and William Prynne Barrister at Law, were censured for their libels against the hierarchy of the Church, &c.[2]

June 16. The Speech I then spake in the Star-Chamber, was commanded by the King to be printed. And it came out June the 25.

June 26. This day, Monday, the Prince Elector and his brother Prince Rupert,[3] began their journey toward the sea side, to return for Holland.

June 30. Friday, the above named three Libellers lost their ears.

July 7. A note was brought to me of a short libel pasted on the cross in Cheapside: that the arch-wolf of Canterbury had his hand in persecuting the saints, and shedding the blood of the martyrs: Memento, for the last of June.

July 11. Dr. Williams Lord Bishop of Lincoln was censured in the Star Chamber for tampering, and corrupting of witnesses, in the King's cause.

. . . .

August 25. The same day at night, my Lord Mayor sent me another libel, hanged upon the standard in Cheapside. My speech in the Star-Chamber, set in a kind of pillory, &c.

August 29. Another short libel against me, in verse.

October 22. A great noise about the perverting of the Lady Newport: Speech of it at the Council: My free speech there to the King, concerning the increasing of the Roman party, the freedom at Denmark-house, the carriage of Mr. Walter Montague and Sir Toby Matthews. The Queen acquainted with all I said that very night, and highly displeased with me; and so continues.[1]

[1] See number 8 in Laud's list of his projects.

[2] Burton, Bastwick, and Prynne were all fined, punished, and imprisoned for publishing anti-episcopal works; many contemporaries considered them martyred heroes for their opposition to the Laudian church (see the entry for July 7 below).

[3] Prince Elector... Prince Rupert respectively, the King's brother-in-law and nephew.

November 22. The extreme and unnatural hot winter weather began, and continued till December 8.

Anno 1638

April 29. The tumults in Scotland, about the Service-Book offered to be brought in, began July 23, 1637, and continued increasing by fits, and hath now brought that Kingdom in danger. No question, but there is a great concurrence between them, and the Puritan party in England. A great aim there to destroy me in the King's opinion, &c.[2]

. . . .

October 26. A most extreme tempest upon the Thames. I was in it, going from the Star-Chamber home, between six and seven at night. I was never upon the water in the like storm. And was in great danger at my landing at Lambeth Bridge.

. . . .

Anno 1639

March 27, Wednesday, Coronation-day. King Charles took his journey northward, against the Scottish Covenanting rebels. God of his infinite mercy bless him with health and success.

. . . .

June 4, Whitsun-Tuesday. As I was going to do my duty to the Queen, an officer of the Lord Mayor's met me, and delivered to me two very seditious papers, the one to the Lord Mayor and aldermen, the other to excite the apprentices, &c. Both subscribed by John Lilburne,[3] a prisoner in the Fleet, sentenced in the Star-Chamber, &c.

June 5. I delivered both these to the Lords of the Council.

June 15 & 17, Saturday and Monday. The peace concluded between the King and the Scottish rebels.[4] God make it safe and honourable to the King and Kingdom.

June 28. I sent the remainder of my manuscripts to Oxford, being in number 576. And about an hundred of them were Hebrew, Arabic, and Persian. I had formerly sent them above 700 volumes.

Anno 1640

January 24. At night I dreamed, that my father (who died 46 years since) came to me; and, to my thinking, he was as well and as cheerful, as ever I saw him. He asked me, what I did here? And after some speech, I asked him, how long he would stay with me? He answered, he would stay, till he had me away with him. I am not moved with dreams; yet I thought fit to remember this.

. . . .

May 9. A paper posted upon the Old-Exchange, animating apprentices to sack my house upon the Monday following, May 11, early.

May 11, Monday night. At midnight, my house at Lambeth was beset with 500 of these rascal routers. I had notice, and strengthened the house as well I could; and God be thanked, I had no harm, they continued there full two hours: Since I have fortified my house as well as I can; and hope all may be safe. But yet libels are continually set up in all places of note in the city. My deliverance was great; God make me thankful for it.

[1] This entry refers to the conversion to Catholicism of Anne, Countess of Newport. Mountjoy Blount, Earl of Newport, asked Laud for help in punishing those responsible for encouraging his wife, a group rumoured to include the Catholic converts Montague and Matthews; Laud's efforts in this case led to a quarrel with the Catholic Queen.

May 21. One of the chief being taken, was condemned at Southwark, and hanged and quartered on Saturday morning following, May 23. But before this, May 15, some of these mutinous people came in the day time, and brake the White-Lyon prison; and let loose their fellows, both out of that prison, and the King's-Bench, and the other prisoners also out of the White-Lyon.

August 20. His Majesty took his journey towards the North in haste, upon information that the Scots were entered the Monday before into England, and meant to be at Newcastle by Saturday: The Scots entered August 20.

August 22. A vile libel brought me, found in Covent-Garden; animating the apprentices and soldiers to fall upon me in the King's absence.

September 21. I received a letter from John Rockel, a man both by name and person unknown to me. He was among the Scots, as he travelled through the Bishopric of Durham he heard them inveigh and rail at me exceedingly, and that they hoped shortly to see me, as the Duke was, slain by one least suspected. His letter was to advise me to look to my self.

September 24. A great Council of the Lords were called by the King to York, to consider what way was best to be taken to get out the Scots; and this day the meeting began at York, and continued till October 28.

October 22. The High Commission sitting at St. Paul's, because of the troubles of the times: very near 2000 Brownists made a tumult at the end of the Court, tore down all the benches in the consistory; and cried out, they would have no Bishop, nor no High Commission.[1]

October 27, Tuesday, Simon and Jude's Eve. I went into my upper study, to see some manuscripts, which I was sending to Oxford. In that study hung my picture, taken by the life; and coming in, I found it fallen down upon the face, lying on the floor, the string being broken, by which it was hanged against the wall. I am almost every day threatened with my ruin in Parliament. God grant this be no omen.

November 11. Thomas Viscount Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, accused to the Lords by the House of Commons, for High Treason, and restrained to the Usher of the House.[2]

November 25. He was sent to the Tower.

December 2. A great debate in the House, that no bishop should be so much as of the Committee for Preparatory Examinations in this cause, as accounted causa sanguinis [a blood case]; put off till the next day.

December 3. The debate declined.

December 4. The King gave way, that his Council should be examined upon oath in the Earl of Strafford's case. I was examined this day.

December 16. The canons condemned in the House of Commons, as being against the King's prerogative, the fundamental laws of the realm, the liberty and propriety of the subject, and containing divers other things tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence. Upon this I was made the author of them, and a committee put upon me to enquire into all my actions, and to prepare a charge.

[1] Brownists technically, Separatists who followed the teachings of Robert Browne (ca. 1550–1633), but used here as a general term for radicalized groups opposed to episcopacy.

[2] The King's most formidable minister, Wentworth (1593–1641) was Lord Deputy of Ireland and a close friend of Laud's, with whom he shared an unswerving loyalty to the crown and a ruthlessness toward opponents.

The same morning, in the Upper House, I was named as an incendiary by the Scottish commissioners; and a complaint promised to be drawn up tomorrow.

December 18. I was accused by the House of Commons for High Treason, without any particular charge laid against me; which they said, should be prepared in convenient time. Mr. Denzill Hollis was the man that brought up the message to the Lords. Soon after, the charge was brought into the Upper House by the Scottish commissioners, tending to prove me an incendiary. I was presently committed to the Gentleman Usher; but was permitted to go in his company to my house at Lambeth, for a book or two to read in, and such papers, as pertained to my defence against the Scots. I stayed at Lambeth till the evening, to avoid the gazing of the people. I went to Evening Prayer in my chapel. The psalms of the day (93 and 94), and Chapter 50 of Esai, gave me great comfort. God make me worthy of it, and fit to receive it. As I went to my barge, hundreds of my poor neighbours stood there, and prayed for my safety, and return to my house. For which I bless God and them.

December 21. I was fined £500 in the Parliament House, and Sir John Lambe and Sir Henry Martin £250 a piece, for keeping Sir Robert Howard close prisoner in the case of the escape of the Lady Viscountess Purbecke out of the Gate-House; which Lady he kept avowedly, and had children by her. In such a case, say the imprisonment were more than the law allow; what may be done for honour and religion sake? This was not a fine to the King, but damage to the party.

December 23. The Lords ordered me to pay the money presently; which was done.

Anno 1641

January 21. A Parliament man of good note, and interest with diverse Lords, sent me word, that by reason of my patient and moderate carriage since my commitment, four Earls of great power in the Upper House of the Lords were not now so sharp against me as at first. And that now they were resolved only to sequester me from the King's Council, and to put me from my Archbishopric. So I see, what justice I may expect; since here is a resolution taken, not only before my answer, but before my charge was brought up against me.

February 14, Saturday, A.R. And this, if I live, and continue Archbishop of Canterbury, till after Michaelmas-day come twelve-month, Anno 1642. God bless me in this.[1]

February 26. This day I had been full ten weeks in restraint at Mr. Maxwell's house. And this day, being St. Augustine's day, my charge was brought up from the House of Commons to the Lords, by Sir Henry Vane the Younger. It consisted of fourteen articles. These generals they craved time to prove in particular. The copy of this general charge is among my papers. I spake something to it. And the copy of that also is among my papers. I had favour from the Lords not to go to the Tower till the Monday following.

March 1. I went in Mr. Maxwell's coach to the Tower. No noise, till I came into Cheapside. But from thence to the Tower, I was followed and railed at by the apprentices and the rabble, in great numbers to the very Tower gates, where I left them; and I thank God, he made me patient.

March 15. A Committee for Religion settled in the Upper House of Parliament. Ten Earls, ten Bishops, ten Barons. So the lay votes shall be double to the clergy. This committee will meddle with doctrines as well as ceremonies; and will call some divines to them to consider of the business. As appears by a letter hereto annexed, sent by the Lord Bishop of Lincoln, to some divines to attend this service. Upon the whole matter, I believe this Committee will prove the National Synod of England, to the great dishonour of this Church. And what else may follow upon it, God knoweth.

[1] The meaning of this entry is uncertain.

March 22. The Earl of Strafford's trial began in Westminster Hall; and it continued till the end of April, taking in the variation of the House of Commons, who after a long hearing drew a Bill of Attainder against him.[1]

. . . .

May 1. The King came into the Upper House; and there declared before both Houses, how diligently he had hearkened to all the proceedings with the Earl of Strafford; and found that his fault, whatever it was, could not amount to High Treason: That if it went by Bill it must pass by him; and that he could not with his conscience find him guilty, nor would wrong his conscience so far. But advised them to proceed by way of misdemeanor; and he would concur with them. The same day, after the King was gone, a letter was read in the Upper House from the Scots; in which, they did earnestly desire to be gone. It was moved for a present conference with the House of Commons about it. The debate about it was very short; yet the Commons were risen beforehand.

May 12. The Earl of Strafford beheaded upon Tower Hill.

June 23. I acquainted the King by my Lord of London, that I would resign my Chancellorship of Oxford, and why.

June 25. I sent down my resignation of the Chancellorship of Oxford, to be published in Convocation.

July 1. This was done; and the Earl of Pembroke chosen Chancellor by joint consent.

August 10. The King went post into Scotland, the Parliament sitting, and the armies not yet dissolved.

September 23. Mr. Adam Torles, my ancient, loving and faithful servant, then my steward, after he had served me full forty-two years, died, to my great loss and grief.

October 23. The Lords in Parliament sequestered my jurisdiction to my inferior officers; and ordered, that I should give no benefice, without acquainting them first, to whom I would give it; that so they might approve. This order was sent to me on Tuesday, November 2, in the afternoon.

November 1. News came to the Parliament of the troubles in Ireland,[2] the King being then in Scotland, where there were troubles enough also.

November 25. The King at his return from Scotland, was sumptuously entertained in London; and great joy on all hands. God prosper it.

December 30. The Archbishop of York, and eleven Bishops more, sent to the Tower for High Treason, for delivering a petition and a protestation into the House, that this was not a free Parliament, since they could not come to vote there, as they are bound, without danger of their lives.

Anno 1642

January 4. His Majesty went into the House of Commons; and demanded the persons of Mr. Denzill Hollis, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Stroude; whom his attorney had the day before, together with the Lord Kimbolton, accused of High Treason, upon seven articles. They had information; and were not then in the House: they came in after, and great stir was made about this breach of the privileges of Parliament.[1]

---

[1] A Bill of Attainder marked the extinction of the legal rights (to inherit or pass on land, for example) of a person convicted of a felony or sentenced to death.

[2] troubles in Ireland the Irish rebellion, which began with the massacre of thousands of English settlers.

February 6. Voted in the Lord's House, that the Bishops shall have no votes there in Parliament. The Commons had passed that Bill before. Great ringing for joy, and bonfires in some parishes.

February 11. The Queen went from Greenwich toward Dover, to go into Holland with her daughter the Princess Mary, who was lately married to the Prince of Orange his son. But the true cause was, the present discontents here. The King accompanied her to the sea.

February 14. His Majesty's message to both Houses, printed, by which he puts all into their hands; God bless us.

February 20. There came a tall man to me, under the name of Mr. Hunt. He professed he was unknown to me; but came (he said) to do me service in a great particular; and prefaced it, that he was not set on by any statesman, or any of the Parliament. So he drew a paper out of his pocket, and showed me four articles drawn against me to the Parliament, all touching my near conversation with priests, and by my endeavours by them to subvert religion in England. He told me, the articles were not yet put into the House: they were subscribed by one Willoughby, who (he said) was a priest, but now come from them. I asked him, what service it was he could do me. He said, he looked for no advantage to himself. I conceived hereupon, this was a piece of villainy: And bade him tell Willoughby, he was a villain; and bid him put his articles into the Parliament, when he will. So I went presently into my inner chamber; and told Mr. Edward Hyde, and Mr. Richard Cobb, what had befallen me. But after I was sorry at my heart, that my indignation at this base villainy made me so hasty, to send Hunt away; and that I had not desired Mr. Lieutenant to seize on him, till he brought forth this Willoughby.

March 6, Sunday. After sermon, as I was walking up and down my chamber before dinner, without any slip or treading awry, the sinew of my right leg gave a great crack, and brake asunder in the same place where I had broken it before.

It was two months, before I could go out of my chamber. On Sunday (May 15) I made shift between my man and my staff to go to church. There one Mr. Joslin preached, with vehemency becoming Bedlam, with treason sufficient to hang him in any other state, and with such particular abuse to me, that women and boys stood up in church, to see how I could bear it. I humbly thank God for my patience.

All along things grew higher between the King and the Parliament. God send a good issue.

May 29. Four ships came into the river, with part of the ammunition from Hull.

August 22, Monday. The King set up his Standard at Nottingham.[2]

. . . .

October 15. Resolved upon the question, that the fines, rents, and profits of Archbishops, Bishops, Deans and Chapters, and of such notorious delinquents who have taken up arms against the Parliament, or have been active in the Commission of Array,[3] shall be sequestered for the use and service of the Commonwealth.

. . . .

Anno 1643

January 26. The Bill passed the Lord's House for abolishing episcopacy, &c.

. . . .

---

[1] The King's unsuccessful attempt to arrest the "Five Members" served only to unite the Lords and Commons against him, and proved one of the precipitating events of the Civil War.

[2] The official beginning of the Civil War.

[3] Commission of Array the muster of soldiers to fight for the King.

March 2, Thursday, St. Cedd's day. The Lord Brooke shot in the left eye, and killed in the place, at Lichfield, going to give the onset upon the close of the church; he having ever been fierce against Bishops and Cathedrals: His beaver up,[1] and armed to the knees; so that a musket at that distance could have done him but little harm. Thus was his eye put out, who about two years since said, he hoped to live to see at St. Paul's not one stone left upon another.

. . . .

March 24. One Mr. Foord told me (he is a Suffolk man) that there was a plot to send me and Bishop Wren as delinquents to New England, within fourteen days. And that Wells, a minister that came thence, offered wagers of it. The meeting was at Mr. Barks, a merchant's house in Friday Street, being this Foord's son-in-law. I never saw Mr. Foord before.

. . . .

April 25. It was moved in the House of Commons to send me to New England. But it was rejected. The plot was laid by Peters, Wells, and others.

May 1. My chapel windows at Lambeth defaced, and the steps torn up.

May 2. The cross in Cheapside taken down.

May 9. All my goods seized upon, books and all. The seizers were Captain Guest, Layton, and Dickins. The same day an order for further restraint of me, not to go out of it without my keeper. This order was brought to me May 10.

May 16. An order of both houses for the disposing of my benefices, &c. void, or to be void. This order was brought to me Wednesday, May 17 at night. Methinks, I see a cloud rising over me, about Chartham business:[2] There having been a rumour twice, that I shall be removed to a prison lodging.

May 23. I sent my petition for maintenance. This day the Queen was voted a traitor in the Commons House.

. . . .

H[enry]W[harton]: Thus far the Archbishop had proceeded in his Diary; when it was violently seized, and taken out of his pockets by William Prynne, on the last day of May 1643. The seizure of it is related by Prynne himself (Breviat of the Arch-Bishop's Life, p. 28) and gloried in, as a most worthy action. But the barbarous manner of it is more largely described by the Archbishop himself in the following history. After the book came into his enemy's hands, it was frequently urged against him as evidence at his trial; and when the trial was near finished, Prynne caused it to be printed, and published it in the beginning of September 1644 but corrupted, and in part only; of which see before in the Preface. The Archbishop had almost filled up his paper book (where he wrote this Diary) when it was taken from him. But in the last leaf of it are found certain projects wrote with his own hand (at what time, or in what year, is uncertain) which I have subjoined.

Things which I have projected to do, if God bless me in them.

I. [Blotted out.]

II. To build at St. John's in Oxford, where I was bred up, for the good and safety of that College. Done.

---

[1] beaver the lower portion of the face-guard of a helmet (OED beaver^2).

[2] Chartham a rectory in Laud's gift; he had received conflicting requests from the King and the House of Lords (among others) as to a recipient.

III. To overthrow the Feoffment, dangerous both to Church and State, going under the specious pretence of buying in impropriations.[1] Done.

IV. To procure King Charles to give all the impropriations, yet remaining in the Crown, within the Realm of Ireland, to that poor Church. Done, and settled there.

V. To set upon the repair of St. Paul's Church in London. Done.

VI. To collect and perfect the broken, crossing,[2] and imperfect statutes of the University of Oxford; which had lain in a confused heap some hundred of years. Done.

VII. [Blotted out.]

VIII. To settle the statutes of all the Cathedral Churches of the new foundations; whose statutes are imperfect, and not confirmed. Done for Canterbury.

IX. To annex for ever some settled commendams, and those, if it may be, sine curâ, to all the small bishoprics.[3] Done for Bristol, Peterborough, St. Asaph, Chester, Oxford.

X. To find a way to increase the stipends of poor vicars.

XI. To see the tithes of London settled, between the clergy and the city.

XII. To set up a Greek press in London and Oxford, for printing of the library manuscripts; and to get both letters and matrices. Done for London.

XIII. To settle eighty pounds a year for ever, out of Dr. Fryar's Lands, (after the death of Dr. John Fryar the son) upon the fabric of St. Paul's, to the repair till that be finished, and to keep it in good state after.

XIV. To procure a large charter for Oxford, to confirm their ancient privileges, and obtain new for them, as large as those of Cambridge, which they had gotten since Hen. 8 which Oxford had not. Done.

XV. To open the great square at Oxford between St. Marys and the Schools, Brasen-nose and All-Souls.

XVI. To settle an hospital of land in Reading, of one hundred pounds a year, in a new way. I have acquainted Mr. Barnard, the Vicar of Croydon, with my project. He is to call upon my executors to do it; if the surplusage of my goods (after debts and legacies paid) come to three thousand pounds. Done to the value of two hundred pounds per annum.

XVII. To erect an Arabic Lecture in Oxford, at least for my lifetime, my estate not being able for more: That this may lead the way, &c. Done. I have now settled it for ever. The lecture began to be read August 10, 1636.

[1] Impropriation was the transference (after the English Reformation) to a lay patron of the right to collect tithes from a parish. The result was that in many parishes, only a small percentage of the tithe income went to the clerical incumbent. Laud planned to transfer or buy up impropriations whenever possible to return the full income to the church. The feoffees were a group of puritan laymen and clerics who purchased impropriations in order to place sympathetic clerics in the livings they thereby controlled.

[2] crossing contradictory.

[3] commendams benefices (with income attached) which a bishop could hold along with his bishopric, preferably sine curâ, "without cure," that is, without duties. Laud was trying to increase the income of the smaller bishoprics.

XVIII. The impropriation of the vicarage of Cuddesden to the Bishop of Oxford, finally sentenced Wednesday April 19, 1637. And so the House built by the now Bishop of Oxford Dr. John Bancroft, settled for ever to that Bishopric. Done.

XIX. A book in vellum fair written, containing the records which are in the Tower, and concern the clergy. This book I got done at my own charge, and have left it in my study at Lambeth for posterity, June 10, 1637. Ab Anno 20 Ed. 1 ad Annum 24 Ed. 4. [from the 20th year of the reign of Edward I to the 24th year of the reign of Edward IV]. Done.

XX. A new charter for the College near Dublin to be procured of his Majesty; and a body of new statutes made, to rectify that government. Done.

XXI. A charter for the Town of Reading, and a mortmain of &c.[1] Done.

XXII. If I live to see the repair of St. Paul's near an end, to move his Majesty for the like grant from the High Commission, for the buying in of impropriations, as I have now for St. Paul's. And then I hope to buy in two a year at least.

XXIII. I have procured for St. John Baptist's College in Oxford the perpetual inheritance and patronage of &c.
—(1624–43)

[1] mortmain a legal condition which would give the corporation inalienable control over (here unspecified) lands (OED).

Elizabeth Clinton, Countess of Lincoln

ca. 1574 – ca. 1630

Elizabeth Clinton, Countess of Lincoln, was the daughter of Sir Henry Knyvet, of Charlton, Wiltshire. She married Thomas Clinton who was to become the third Earl of Lincoln and the eleventh Baron Clinton. During their marriage, Elizabeth Clinton bore eighteen children, many of whom did not survive infancy. In 1618, Thomas Clinton died, and his son Theophilus succeeded him as Earl. Anne Bradstreet's father, Thomas Dudley, arranged Theophilus's marriage to Bridget Fiennes.

It is to her daughter-in-law Bridget that the Countess dedicated her advice manual on the virtue of breast-feeding, The Countess of Lincoln's Nursery (1622). Clinton's advice book should be read in light of a broad cultural dialogue on motherhood in early modern culture. Reformers and humanists alike championed breast-feeding by the natural mother on functional, medical and ethical grounds. However, it is clear from Clinton's treatise that it was the general practice of the wealthy to employ wet-nurses. While there is no record of her death, it is believed that Elizabeth Clinton died in 1630.

The Countess of Lincoln's Nursery

(excerpts)

Because it hath pleased God to bless me with many children, and so caused me to observe many things falling out to mothers, and to their children; I thought good to open my mind concerning a special matter belonging to all child-bearing women, seriously to consider of: and to manifest my mind the better, even to write of this matter, so far as God shall please to direct me; in sum, the matter I mean, is the duty of nursing due by mothers to their own children.

In setting down whereof, I will first show that every woman ought to nurse her own child; and secondly, I will endeavour to answer such objections as are used to be cast out against this duty to disgrace the same.

The first point is easily performed. For it is the express ordinance of God that mothers should nurse their own children, and being his ordinance they are bound to it in conscience. This should stop the mouths of all repliers, for God is most wise, and therefore must needs know what is fittest and best for us to do:[1] and to prevent all foolish fears, or shifts, we are given to understand that he is also all sufficient, and therefore infinitely able to bless his own ordinance, and to afford us means in ourselves (as continual experience confirmeth) toward the observance thereof.[2]

If this (as it ought) be granted, then how venturous are those women that dare venture to do otherwise, and so to refuse, and by refusing to despise that order, which the most wise and almighty God hath appointed, and instead thereof to choose their own pleasures? Oh what peace can there be to these women's consciences, unless through the darkness of their understanding they judge it no disobedience?

And then they will drive me to prove that this nursing, and nourishing of their own children in their own bosoms is God's ordinance; they are very wilful, or very ignorant, if they make a question of it. For it is proved sufficiently to be their duty, both by God's word, and also by his works.

[1] God is most wise "Isaiah 31.2" (original marginalia).

[2] shifts evasions (OED shift sb III.4a); all sufficient "Gen. 17.1" (original marginalia).

By his word it is proved, first by examples, namely the example of Eve. For who suckled her sons Cain, Abel, Seth, etc. but herself? Which she did not only of mere necessity, because yet no other woman was created; but especially because she was their mother, and so saw it was her duty: and because she had a true natural affection, which moved her to do it gladly. Next the example of Sarah the wife of Abraham; for she both gave her son Isaac suck, as doing the duty commanded of God: and also took great comfort, and delight therein, as in a duty well pleasing to her self;[1] whence she spake of it, as of an action worthy to be named in her holy rejoicing. Now if Sarah, so great a princess, did nurse her own child, why should any of us neglect to do the like, except (which God forbid) we think scorn to follow her, whose daughters it is our glory to be, and which we be only upon this condition, that we imitate her well doing.[2] Let us look therefore to our worthy pattern, noting withal, that she put herself to this work when she was very old, and so might the better have excused herself, than we younger women can: being also more able to hire, and keep a nurse, than any of us.[3] But why is she not followed by most in the practise of this duty? Even because they want her virtue, and piety.[4] This want is the common hindrance to this point of the woman's obedience; for this want makes them want love to God's precepts, want love to his doctrine, and like stepmothers, want due love to their own children.

And so much for proof of this office, and duty to be God's ordinance, by his own word according to the argument of examples: I hope I shall likewise prove it by the same word from plain precepts.[5] First from that precept, which willeth the younger women to marry, and to bear children, that is, not only to bear them in the womb, and to bring them forth; but also to bear them on their knee, in their arms, and at their breasts:[6] for this bearing a little before is called nourishing, and bringing up: and to enforce it the better upon women's consciences, it is numbered as the first of the good works, for which godly women should be well reported of. And well it may be the first, because if holy ministers, or other Christians do hear of a good woman to be brought to bed, and her child to be living; their first question usually is, whether she herself give it suck, yea, or no? If the answer be she doth, then they commend her: if the answer be she doth not, then they are sorry for her.

And thus I come to a second precept. I pray you, who that judges aright; doth not hold the suckling of her own child the part of a true mother, of an honest mother, of a just mother, of a sincere mother, of a mother worthy of love, of a mother deserving good report, of a virtuous mother, of a mother winning praise for it? All this is assented to by any of good understanding. Therefore this is also a precept, as for other duties, so for this of mothers to their children; which saith, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things be worthy of love, whatsoever things be of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things, these things do and the God of peace shall be with you.[7]

[1] Isaac suck "Gen. 21.7" (original marginalia).

[2] that we imitate her well doing "I Pet. 3.6" (original marginalia).

[3] she was very old In Genesis 18:11, Sarah is described as "old" and "stricken in age" when she is informed that she will bear a child. She was also post-menopausal ("and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women"). While her precise age is not given, we are told that "Abraham was an hundred years old, when his son Isaac was born unto him" (Genesis 21:5); nurse wet-nurse.

[4] want lack (OED want v 2a).

[5] plain precepts "I Tim. 5.14" (original marginalia).

[6] but also to bear...at their breasts "ver. 10" (original marginalia); that is, I Timothy 5:10.

[7] whatsoever things are true...be with you "Philip. 4.8" (original marginalia).

So far for my promise, to prove by the word of God, that it is his ordinance that women should nurse their own children: now I will endeavour to prove it by his works: First by his works of judgment; if it were not his ordinance for mothers to give their children suck, it were no judgment to bereave them of their milk, but it is specified to be a great judgment to bereave them hereof, and to give them dry breasts, therefore it is to be gathered, even from hence, that it is his ordinance, since to deprive them of means to do it, is a punishment of them.[1]

I add to this the work that God worketh in the very nature of mothers, which proveth also that he hath ordained that they should nurse their own children: for by his secret operation, the mother's affection is so knit by nature's law to her tender babe, as she finds no power to deny to suckle it, no not when she is in hazard to lose her own life, by attending on it; for in such a case it is not said, let the mother fly, and leave her infant to the peril, as if she were dispensed with: but only it is said woe to her, as if she were to be pitied, that for nature to her child, she must be unnatural to herself; now if any then being even at liberty, and in peace, with all plenty, shall deny to give suck to their own children, they go against nature and show that God hath not done so much for them as to work any good, no not in their nature, but left them more savage than the dragons, and as cruel to their little ones as the ostriches.[2]

Oh consider, how comes our milk? Is it not by the direct providence of God? Why provides he it, but for the child? The mothers then that refuse to nurse their own children, do they not despise God's providence? Do they not deny God's will? Do they not as it were say, I see, O God, by the means thou hast put into me, that thou wouldst have me nurse the child thou hast given me, but I will not do so much for thee. Oh impious, and impudent unthankfulness; yea monstrous unnaturalness, both to their own natural fruit born so near their breasts, and fed in their own wombs, and yet may not be suffered to suck their own milk.

And this unthankfulness, and unnaturalness is oftener the sin of the higher, and the richer sort, than of the meaner, and poorer, except some nice and proud idle dames, who will imitate their betters, till they make their poor husbands beggars. And this is one hurt which the better rank do by their ill example; egg, and embolden the lower ones to follow them to their loss: were it not better for us greater persons to keep God's ordinance, and to show the meaner their duty in our good example? I am sure we have more helps to perform it, and have fewer probable reasons to allege against it, than women that live by hard labour, and painful toil. If such mothers as refuse this office of love, and of nature to their children, should hereafter be refused, despised, and neglected of those their children, were they not justly requited according to their own unkind dealing?

And so I come to the last part of my promise; which is to answer objections made by divers against this duty of mothers to their children.[3]

. . . .

....It is objected, that it is troublesome; that it is noisome to one's clothes; that it makes one look old, &c.[4] All such reasons are uncomely, and unchristian to be objected: and therefore unworthy to be answered; they argue unmotherly affection, idleness, desire to have liberty to gad from home, pride, foolish fineness, lust, wantonness, and the like evils. Ask Sarah, Hannah, the blessed Virgin, and any modest loving mother, what trouble they accounted it to give their little ones suck: behold most nursing mothers, and they be as clean and sweet in their clothes, and carry their age, and hold their beauty, as well as those that suckle not: and most likely are they so to do; because keeping God's ordinance, they are sure of God's blessing: and it hath been observed in some women that they grew more beautiful, and better favoured, by very nursing their own children.

---

[1] But it is specified...dry breasts "Give them, O LORD: what wilt thou give? give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts" (Hosea 9:14).

[2] ll. 100–105 "Lam. 7.3" (original marginalia); actually Lamentations 4:3.

[3] divers sundry (people) (OED divers a 3).

[4] noisome harmful, injurious, ill-smelling (OED noisome a 1, 2).

But there are some women that object fear: saying that they are so weak, and so tender, that they are afraid to venture to give their children suck, lest they endanger their health thereby. Of these, I demand, why then they did venture to marry, and so to bear children; and if they say they could not choose, and that they thought not that marriage would impair their health: I answer, that for the same reasons they should set themselves to nurse their own children, because they should not choose but do what God would have them to do: and they should believe that this work will be for their health also, seeing it is ordinary with the Lord to give good stomach, health, and strength to almost all mothers that take this pains with their children.[1]

Now if any reading these few lines return against me, that it may be I myself have given my own children suck: and therefore am bolder, and more busy to meddle in urging this point, to the end to insult over, and to make them to be blamed that have not done it. I answer, that whether I have, or have not performed this my bounden duty, I will not deny to tell my own practice. I know and acknowledge that I should have done it, and having not done it, it was not for want of will in myself, but partly I was overruled by another's authority, and partly deceived by some's ill counsel, and partly I had not so well considered of my duty in this motherly office, as since I did, when it was too late for me to put it in execution.[2] Wherefore being pricked in heart for my undutifulness, this way I study to redeem my peace; first by repentance towards God, humbly and often craving his pardon for this my offence: secondly by studying how to show double love to my children to make them amends for neglect of this part of love to them, when they should have hung on my breasts, and have been nourished in mine own bosom: thirdly by doing my endeavour to prevent many Christian mothers from sinning in the same kind, against our most loving and gracious God.

Do you submit yourselves, to the pain and trouble of this ordinance of God, trust not other women, whom wages hires to do it, better than yourselves, whom God, and nature ties to do it. I have found by grievous experience, such dissembling in nurses, pretending sufficiency of milk, when indeed they had too much scarcity, pretending willingness, towardness, wakefulness, when indeed they have been most wilful, most froward, and most slothful, as I fear the death of one or two of my little babes came by the default of their nurses. Of all those which I had for eighteen children, I had but two which were thoroughly willing, and careful: divers have had their children miscarry in the nurse's hands, and are such mothers (if it were by the nurse's carelessness) guiltless? I know not how they should, since they will shut them out of the arms of nature, and leave them to the will of a stranger; yea to one that will seem to estrange herself from her own child, to give suck to the nurse-child. This she may fain to do upon a covetous composition, but she frets at it in her mind, if she have any natural affection.

[1] good stomach spirit, courage (OED stomach sb 8).

[2] overruled by another's authority Clinton may be alluding to her husband. As King notes, husbands often discouraged lactation because it had a known contraceptive effect and because "sexual intercourse was both forbidden and feared during lactation because it was universally thought that the milk would become corrupted by intercourse or a new conception and kill the child" (Women of the Renaissance, 1991:14).

Therefore be no longer at the trouble, and at the care to hire others to do your own work: be not so unnatural to thrust away your own children: be not so hardy as to venture a tender babe to a less tender heart: be not accessory to that disorder of causing a poorer woman to banish her own infant, for the entertaining of a richer woman's child, as it were, bidding her unlove her own to love yours. We have followed Eve in transgression, let us follow her in obedience. When God laid the sorrows of conception, of breeding, of bringing forth, and of bringing up her children upon her, and so upon us in her loins, did she reply any word against? Not a word; so I pray you all mine own daughters, and others that are still childbearing reply not against the duty of suckling them, when God has sent you them.

Indeed I see some, if the weather be wet, or cold; if the way be foul; if the church be far off, I see they are so coy, so nice, so lukewarm, they will not take pains for their own souls: alas, no marvel if these will not be at trouble, and pain to nourish their children's bodies, but fear God, be diligent to serve him; approve all his ordinances; seek to please him; account it no trouble, or pain to do anything that hath the promise of his blessing: and then you will, no doubt, do this good, laudable, natural, loving duty to your children. If yet you be not satisfied, inquire not of such as refuse to do this: consult not with your own conceit: advise not with flatterers: but ask counsel of sincere, and faithful preachers. If you be satisfied; then take this with you, to make you do it cheerfully. Think always, that having the child at your breast, and having it in your arms, you have God's blessing there. For children are God's blessings. Think again how your babe crying for your breast, sucking heartily the milk out of it, and growing by it, is the Lord's own instruction, every hour, and every day, that you are suckling it, instructing you to show that you are his new born babes, by your earnest desire after his word; and the sincere doctrine thereof, and by your daily growing in grace and goodness thereby, so shall you reap pleasure, and profit.[1] Again, you may consider, that when your child is at your breast, it is a fit occasion to move your heart to pray for a blessing upon that work; and to give thanks for your child, and for ability and freedom unto that, which many a mother would have done and could not; who have tried and ventured their health, and taken much pains, and yet have not obtained their desire. But they that are fitted every way for this commendable act, have certainly great cause to be thankful: and I much desire that God may have glory and praise for every good work, and you much comfort, that do seek to honour God in all things. Amen

Robert Burton

1577 – 1640

"I have been brought up a student in the most flourishing college of Europe," writes Burton of himself in The Anatomy; "for thirty years I have continued…a scholar." This is an accurate biographical summary. Burton was born in Lindley, Leicestershire, and educated at Nuneaton and Sutton Coldfield schools; he entered Brasenose College, Oxford in 1593, and transferred to Christ Church, Oxford (his "most flourishing college of Europe") in 1599. He proceeded to MA in 1605 and took the Bachelor of Divinity degree in 1614. Burton then stayed at Christ Church, as tutor and librarian, for the remainder of his life. He was given several ecclesiastical benefices, but did not perform any duties in these parishes.

Burton had a hand in a now lost pastoral play, and his Latin comedy Philosophaster was performed at his college. But after The Anatomy of Melancholy was published in 1621, he continued rewriting it for the rest of his life, enlarging it to almost half a million words in six successive editions through to 1651 (the changes in the final edition were based on an annotated copy Burton left at his death). Ostensibly a medical treatise, The Anatomy of Melancholy is a learned, affectionately satiric meditation on human learning and endeavour: the pseudonym he chose to publish under, Democritus Junior, hints at the kind of text that follows (his namesake Democritus was known as "the laughing philosopher"). Burton was an omnivorous reader, and he builds his argument on a foundation of citations from a remarkably wide range of authorities; only some are identified in the following selections. He also uses a great deal of Latin, most of which he either translates or paraphrases within his text. Translations are supplied within square brackets for any Latin Burton left without an explanatory gloss; most of these translations are from the edition of the Anatomy edited by A. R. Shilleto (London, 1893).

The Anatomy of Melancholy
(excerpts)

DEMOCRITUS JUNIOR
TO THE READER

Gentle Reader, I presume thou wilt be very inquisitive to know what antic or personate actor this is, that so insolently intrudes upon this common theatre, to the world's view, arrogating another man's name, whence he is, why he doth it, and what he hath to say? Although, as he [Seneca] said, Primum si noluero, non respondebo, quis coacturus est? I am a free man born, and may choose whether I will tell, who can compel me? If I be urged I will as readily reply as that Egyptian in Plutarch, when a curious fellow would needs know what he had in his basket, Quum vides velatam, quid inquiris in rem absconditam? It was therefore covered, because he should not know what was in it. Seek not after that which is hid, if the contents please thee, and be for thy use, suppose the Man in the Moon, or whom thou wilt to be the author; I would not willingly be known. Yet in some sort to give thee satisfaction, which is more than I need, I will show a reason, both of this usurped name, title, and subject. And first of the name of Democritus; lest any man by reason of it should be deceived, expecting a pasquil,[1] a satire, some ridiculous treatise (as I myself should have done), some prodigious tenet, or paradox of the earth's motion, of infinite worlds in infinito vacuo, ex fortuitâ atomorum collisione, in an infinite waste, so caused by an accidental collision of motes in the sun, all which Democritus held, Epicurus and their Master Leucippus of old maintained, and are lately revived by Copernicus, Brunus, and some others. Besides it hath been always an ordinary custom, as Gellius observes, for later writers and impostors to broach many absurd and insolent fictions, under the name of so noble a philosopher as Democritus, to get themselves credit, and by that means the more to be respected, as artificers usually do, Novo qui marmori ascribunt Praxitelem suo [who put Praxiteles' name on their new marble statue]. 'Tis not so with me.

[1] pasquil a libel or satire, named after a statue in Rome on which abusive verses were posted.

> Non hic Centauros, non Gorgonas, Harpyasque
> Invenies, hominem pagina nostra sapit.
> No centaurs here, or gorgons look to find,
> My subject is of Man, and humane kind.

Thou thy self art the subject of my discourse.

> Quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira,
> voluptas,
> Gaudia, discursus, nostri farrago libelli.
> What e're men do, vows, fears, in ire, in sport,
> Joys, wanderings, are the sum of my report.

My intent is no otherwise to use his name, than Mercurius Gallobelgicus, Mercurius Britannicus, use the name of Mercury,[1] Democritus Christianus, &c. Although there be some other circumstances, for which I have masked my self under this visard, and some peculiar respects, which I cannot so well express, until I have set down a brief character of this our Democritus, what he was, with an epitome of his life.

Democritus, as he is described by Hippocrates & Laertius, was a little wearish old man,[2] very melancholy by nature, averse from company in his latter days, and much given to solitariness, a famous philosopher in his age, coævus with Socrates,[3] wholly addicted to his studies at the last, and to a private life, writ many excellent works. A great divine, according to the divinity of those times, an expert physician, a politician, an excellent mathematician, as Diacosmus, and the rest of his works do witness. He was much delighted with the studies of husbandry, saith Columella, and often I find him cited by Constantinus and others treating of that subject. He knew the natures, differences of all beasts, plants, fishes, birds, and as some say, could understand the tunes and voices of them. In a word he was omnifariàm doctus, a general scholar, a great student; and to the intent he might better contemplate, I find it related by some, that he put out his eyes, and was in his old age voluntarily blind, yet saw more than all Greece besides, and writ of every subject, Nihil in toto opificio naturæ, de quo non scripsit. A man of an excellent wit, profound conceit; and to attain knowledge the better in his younger years he travelled to Egypt and Athens, to confer with learned men, admired of some, despised of others. After a wandering life he settled at Abdera a town in Thrace, and was sent for thither to be their lawmaker, recorder or town clerk, as some will, or as others, he was there bred and born. Howsoever it was, there he lived at last in a garden in the suburbs, wholly betaking himself to his studies, and a private life. Saving that sometimes he would walk down to the haven,[4] and laugh heartily at such variety of ridiculous objects, which there he saw. Such a one was Democritus.

[1] Burton cites the titles of contemporary newsbooks, which adopted these names because they, like Mercury, were messengers, delivering news of latest events.

[2] wearish sickly in health or appearance (OED wearish 2).

[3] coævus coeval, contemporary with. Socrates lived ca. 470–ca. 399 B.C.E.; Democritus, ca. 460–370 B.C.E.

[4] haven harbour.

But in the meantime, how doth this concern me, or upon what reference do I usurp his habit? I confess indeed that to compare myself unto him for ought I have yet said, were both impudency and arrogancy. I do not presume to make any parallel, Antistat mihi millibus trecentis, parvus sum, nullus sum, altum nec spiro, nec spero [He excels me in 300,000 ways, I am an insignificant person, a nobody, I have neither high aims nor hopes]. Yet thus much I will say of myself, and that I hope without all suspicion of pride, or self-conceit, I have lived a silent, sedentary, solitary, private life, mihi & musis [to myself and letters], in the University as long almost as Xenocrates in Athens, ad senectam ferè [to old age almost], to learn wisdom as he did, penned up most part in my study. For I have been brought up a student in the most flourishing college of Europe,[1] augustissimo collegio, and can brag with Jovius, almost, in eâ luce domicilii Vacicani, totius orbis celeberrimi, per 37 annos multa opportunaque didici; for 30 years I have continued (having the use of as good libraries as ever he had) a scholar, and would be therefore loath, either by living as a drone, to be an unprofitable or unworthy member of so learned and noble a society, or to write that which should be any way dishonourable to such a royal and ample foundation. Something I have done, though by my profession a divine, yet turbine raptus ingenii, as he [Scaliger] said, out of a running wit, an unconstant, unsettled mind, I had a great desire (not able to attain to a superficial skill in any) to have some smattering in all, to be aliquis in omnibus, nullus in singulis [something in everything, no authority in anything], which Plato commends, out of him Lipsius approves and furthers, as fit to be imprinted in all curious wits, not be a slave of one science, or dwell altogether in one subject, as most do, but to rove abroad, centum puer artium, to have an oar in every man's boat, to taste of every dish, and sip of every cup, which saith Montaigne, was well performed by Aristotle and his learned countryman Adrian Turnebus. This roving humor (though not with like success) I have ever had, and like a ranging spaniel, that barks at every bird he sees, leaving his game, I have followed all, saving that which I should, and may justly complain, and truly, qui ubique est, nusquam est [he who is everywhere is nowhere], which Gesner did in modesty, that I have read many books, but to little purpose, for want of good method, I have confusedly tumbled over divers authors in our libraries, with small profit, for want of art, order, memory, judgement. I never travelled but in map or card,[2] in which mine unconfined thoughts have freely expatiated, as having ever been especially delighted with the study of cosmography. Saturn was Lord of my geniture, culminating, &c. and Mars principal significator of manners, in partial conjunction with mine ascendent; both fortunate in their houses, &c. I am not poor, I am nor rich; nihil est, nihil deest, I have little, I want nothing: all my treasure is in Minerva's tower.[3] Greater preferment as I could never get, so am I not in debt for it, I have a competency (Laus Deo [God be praised]) from my noble and munificent patrons, though I live still a collegiate student, as Democritus in his garden, and lead a monastic life, ipse mihi Theatrum [a theatre to myself], sequestered from those tumults and troubles of the world, Et tanquam in speculâ positus (as he [Heinsius] said) in some high place above you all, like Stoicus Sapiens, omnia sæcula, præterita presentiaque videns, uno velut intuitu [seeing all ages, past and present, as at one glance], I hear and see what is done abroad, how others run, ride, turmoil, & macerate themselves in court and country,[4] far from those wrangling law suits, aulæ vanitatem, fori ambitionem, ridere mecum soleo: I laugh at all, only secure, lest my suit go amiss, my ships perish, corn and cattle miscarry, trade decay, I have no wife nor children, good or bad to provide for. A mere spectator of other men's fortunes and adventures, and how they act their parts, which me thinks are diversely presented unto me, as from a common theatre or scene. I hear new news every day, and those ordinary rumors of war, plagues, fires, inundations, thefts, murders, massacres, meteors, comets, spectrums, prodigies, apparitions, of towns taken, cities besieged in France, Germany, Turkey, Persia, Poland, &c. daily musters and preparations, and such like, which these tempestuous times afford, battles fought, so many men slain, monomachies,[1] shipwrecks, piracies, and sea-fights, peace, leagues, stratagems, and fresh alarums. A vast confusion of vows, wishes, actions, edicts, petitions, lawsuits, pleas, laws, proclamations, complaints, grievances, are daily brought to our ears. New books every day, pamphlets, currantoes,[2] stories, whole catalogues of volumes of all sorts, new paradoxes, opinions, schisms, heresies, controversies in philosophy, religion, &c. Now come tidings of weddings, maskings, mummeries,[3] entertainments, jubilees, embassies, tilts and tournaments, trophies, triumphs, revels, sports, plays: Then again, as in a new shifted scene, treasons, cheating tricks, robberies, enormous villainies in all kinds, funerals, burials, death of princes, new discoveries, expeditions; now comical, then tragical matters. Today we hear of new lords and officers created, tomorrow of some great men deposed, and then again of fresh honours conferred; one is let loose, another imprisoned; one purchaseth, another breaketh: he thrives, his neighbour turns bankrupt; now plenty, then again dearth and famine; one runs, another rides, wrangles, laughs, weeps, &c. Thus I daily hear, and suchlike, both private, and public news, amidst the gallantry and misery of the world; jollity, pride, perplexities and cares, simplicity and villainy; subtlety, knavery, candor and integrity, mutually mixed and offering themselves, I rub on privus privatus [in a strictly private life], as I have still lived, so I now continue, statu quo priùs, left to a solitary life, and mine own domestic discontents: Saving that sometimes, ne quid mentiar [not to tell a lie], as Diogenes went into the city, and Democritus to the haven to see fashions, I did for my recreation now and then walk abroad, look into the world, and could not choose but make some little observation, non tam sagax observator, ac simplex recitator [not so sagacious an observer as a simple narrator], not as they did to scoff or laugh at all, but with a mixed passion.

[2] card chart.

[3] Minerva was the Roman goddess of the arts and professions.

[4] macerate to cause the body to waste away, especially through fasting; more generally, to fret, vex or worry (OED macerate v 2, 3).

> Bilem sæpè, jocum vestri movêre tumultus.
> [Oft have your passions raised my rage or mirth.]

I did sometime laugh and scoff with Lucian, and satirically tax with Menippus, lament with Heraclitus, sometimes again I was petulanti splene cachinno [a laugher with a petulant spleen], and then again, urere bilis jecur, I was much moved to see that abuse which I could not amend. In which passion howsoever I may sympathise with him or them, 'tis for no such respect I shroud myself under his name, but either in an unknown habit, to assume a little more liberty and freedom of speech, or if you will needs know, for that reason and only respect, which Hippocrates relates at large in his Epistle to Damagetus, wherein he doth express, how coming to visit him one day, he found Democritus in his garden at Abdera, in the suburbs, under a shady bower, with a book on his knees, busy at his study, sometimes writing, sometime walking. The subject of his book was melancholy and madness, about him lay the carcasses of many several beasts, newly by him cut up and anatomized, not that he did contemn God's creatures, as he told Hippocrates, but to find out the seat of this atra bilis or melancholy, whence it proceeds, and how it was engendered in men's bodies, to the intent he might better cure it in himself, by his writings and observations, teach others how to prevent and avoid it. Which good intent of his, Hippocrates highly commended: Democritus Junior is therefore bold to imitate, and because he left it imperfect, and it is now lost, quasi succenturiator Democriti [as a substitute for Democritus], to revive again, prosecute and finish in this treatise.

[1] monomachies duels or combats between two people (OED).

[2] currantoes also corantos; short pamphlets containing current news (OED coranto^2).

[3] mummeries traditional masked mime shows; also a pejorative term for ceremonies thought ridiculous or hypocritical.

You have had a reason of the name, if the title and inscription offend your gravity, were it a sufficient justification to accuse others, I could produce many sober treatises, even sermons themselves, which in their fronts carry more fantastical names. Howsoever it is a kind of policy in these days, to prefix a fantastical title to a book which is to be sold: For as larks come down to a day-net, many vain readers will tarry and stand gazing like silly passengers, at an antic picture in a painter's shop, that will not look at a judicious piece. And indeed, as Scaliger observes, nothing more invites a reader than an argument unlooked for, unthought of, and sells better than a scurrile pamphlet, tum maximè cùm novitas excitat palatum [especially when its novelty whets the palate]. Many men, saith Gellius, are very conceited in their inscriptions, and able (as Pliny quotes out of Seneca) to make him loiter by the way, that went in haste to fetch a midwife for his daughter, now ready to lie down. For my part I have honourable precedents for this which I have done:[1] I will cite one for all, Anthony Zara Pap. Episc. his Anatomy of Wit, in four sections, members, subsections, &c. to be read in our libraries.

If any man except against the matter or manner of treating of this my subject, and will demand a reason of it, I can allege more than one, I write of melancholy, by being busy to avoid melancholy. There is no greater cause of melancholy than idleness, "no better cure than business," as Rhasis holds: and howbeit, stultus labor est ineptiarum, to be busied in toys is to small purpose, yet hear that divine Seneca, better aliud agere quàm nihil, better do to no end than nothing. I writ therefore, and busied myself in this playing labor, otiosâque diligentiâ ut vitarem torporem feriandi [that I might avoid the torpor of laziness], with Vectius in Macrobius, atque otium in utile verterem negotium [and turn my leisure to useful purposes].

> ——— Simul & jucunda & idonea dicere vitæ,
> Lectorem delectando simul atque monendo.
> [At once to say both useful things and pleasant so > as to please the reader, and instruct.]

To this end I write, like them, saith Lucian, "that recite to trees, and declaim to pillars for want of auditors": as Paulus Ægineta ingeniously confesseth, "not that anything was unknown or omitted, but to exercise myself," which course if some took, I think it would be good for their bodies, and much better for their souls, or peradventure as others do for fame, to show myself (Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc sciat alter). I might be of Thucydides' opinion, "to know a thing and not express it, is all one as if he knew it not." When I first took this task in hand, and quod ait ille, impellente Genio negotium suscepi [and, as he says, undertook the work, my genius impelling me], this I aimed at; vel ut lenirem animum scribendo, to ease my mind by writing, for I had gravidum cor, fœtum caput, a kind of impostume in my head, which I was very desirous to be unladen of, and could imagine no fitter evacuation than this. Besides I might not well refrain, for ubi dolor, ibi digitus, one must needs scratch where it itcheth. I was not a little offended with this malady, shall I say my Mistress Melancholy, my Ægeria,[1] or my malus Genius [evil genius], and for that cause as he that is stung with a scorpion, I would expel clavum clavo, comfort one sorrow with another, idleness with idleness, ut ex viperâ Theriacum, make an antidote out of that which was the prime cause of my disease. Or as he did, of whom Felix Plater speaks, that thought he had some of Aristophanes' frogs in his belly, still crying Brecec'ekex, coax, coax, oop, oop, oop, and for that cause studied physic seven years, and travelled over most part of Europe to ease himself: To do myself good I turned over such physicians as our libraries would afford, or my private friends impart, and have taken this pains. And why not? Cardan professeth he writ his book De Consolatione after his son's death, to comfort himself,[2] so did Tully write of the same subject with like intent, after his daughter's departure, if it be his at least, or some impostor's put out in his name, which Lipsius probably suspects. Concerning myself, I can peradventure affirm with Marius in Salust, "That which others hear or read of, I felt and practised myself, they get their knowledge by books, I mine by melancholizing," experto crede ROBERTO [believe Robert, who speaks from experience].[3] Something I can speak out of experience ærumnabilis experientia me docuit [painful experience has taught me], and with her in the poet, Haud ignara mali miseris succurrere disco [It is my acquaintance with evil that teaches me to help the miserable]. I would help others out of a fellow-feeling, and as that virtuous lady did of old, being a leper herself, bestow all her portion to build an hospital for lepers, I will spend my time and knowledge, which are my greatest fortunes, for the common good of all.

[1] Anatomy of Popery, Anatomy of Immortality, Angelus Scalas, Anatomy of Antimony, etc. [Burton's note].

Yea but you will infer, that this is actum agere, an unnecessary work, cramben bis coctam apponere, the same again and again in other words: To what purpose? "Nothing is omitted that may well be said," so thought Lucian in the like theme. How many excellent physicians have written just volumes and elaborate tracts of this subject? No news here, that which I have is stolen from others, Dicitque mihi mea pagina fur es [and my page says to me, you are a thief]. If that severe doom of Synesius be true, "It is a greater offence, to steal dead men's labours, than their clothes," what shall become of most writers? I hold up my hand at the bar amongst others, and am guilty of felony in this kind, habes confitentem reum, I am content to be pressed with the rest. 'Tis most true, tenet insanabile multos scribendi cacoëthes [many are possessed by an incurable itch to write], and "there is no end of writing of books,"[4] as the Wise-man found of old, in this scribbling age, especially wherein "the number of books is without number" (as a worthy man saith), presses be oppressed, and out of an itching humor, that every man hath to show himself, desirous of fame and honour (scribimus indocti doctique—[we write, learned and unlearned]) he will write no matter what, and scrape together it boots not whence. Bewitched with this desire of fame, etiam mediis in morbis, to the disparagement of their health, and scarce able to hold a pen, they must say something, have it out, "and get themselves a name," saith Scaliger, "though it be to the downfall and ruin of many others." To be counted writers, scriptores ut salutentur, to be thought and held Polymaths and Polyhistors, apud imperitum vulgus ob ventosæ nomen artis, to get a paper-kingdom: nulla spe quæstus sed amplâ famæ [from no hope of gain but great hope of fame], in this precipitate, ambitious age, nunc ut est sæculum, inter immaturam eruditionem ambitiosum & præceps, ('tis Scaliger's censure) and they that are scarce auditors, vix auditores, must be masters and teachers, before they be capable and fit hearers. They will rush into all learning, togatam, armatam, divine, humane authors, rake over all indexes and pamphlets for notes, as our merchants do strange havens for traffic, write great tomes, Cum non sint revera doctiores, sed loquaciores, when as they are not thereby better scholars, but greater praters. They commonly pretend public good, but as Gesner observes, 'tis pride and vanity that eggs them on, no news or ought worthy of note but the same in other terms. Ne feriarentur fortasse typographi, vel ideo scribendum est aliquid ut se vixisse testentur [they turn authors lest peradventure the printers should have a holiday, or they must write something to prove they have lived]. As apothecaries we make new mixtures every day, pour out of one vessel into another, and as those old Romans robbed all the cities of the world, to set out their bad sited Rome, we skim off the cream of other men's wits, pick the choice flowers of their tiled gardens to set out our own sterile plots. Castrant alios ut libros suos per se graciles alieno adipe suffarciant (so Jovius inveighs). They lard their lean books with the fat of other works. Ineruditi fures, &c [unskilful thieves]. A fault that every writer finds, as I do now, and yet faulty themselves, Trium literarum homines, all thieves, they pilfer out of old writers to stuff up their new comments, scrape Ennius's dung-hills, and out of Democritus' pit, as I have done. By which means it comes to pass, that not only libraries and shops are full of our putrid papers, but every close-stool and jakes, Scribunt carmina quæ legunt cacantes; they serve to put under pies, to lap spice in, and keep roast meat from burning. With us in France, saith Scaliger, "every man hath liberty to write, but few ability, heretofore learning was graced by judicious scholars, but now noble sciences are vilified by base and illiterate scribblers," that either write for vain-glory, need, to get money, or as parasites to flatter and collogue with some great men, they put out burras, quisquiliasque ineptiasque [trifles, rubbish, and trash]. "Amongst so many thousand authors you shall scarce find one by reading of whom you shall be any whit better, but rather much worse," quibus inficitur potius, quam perficitur, by which he is rather infected than anyway perfected.

> ——— Qui talia legit,
> Quid didicit tandem, quid scit nisi somnia, nugas?
> [What has anyone who reads such works learned, what does he know but dreams and trifling things?]

So that oftentimes it falls out (which Callimachus taxed of old) a great book is a great mischief. Cardan finds fault with Frenchmen and Germans, for their scribbling to no purpose, non inquit ab edendo deterreo, modo novum aliquid inveniant, he doth not bar them to write, so that it be some new invention of their own; but we weave the same web still, twist the same rope again and again, or if it be a new invention, 'tis but some bauble or toy, which idle fellows write, for as idle fellows to read, and who so cannot invent? "He must have a barren wit, that in this scribbling age can forge nothing." "Princes show their armies, rich men vaunt their buildings, soldiers their manhood, and scholars vent their toys," they must read, they must hear whether they will or no.

> Et quodcunque semel chartis illeverit, omnes
> Gestiet à furno redeuntes scire lacuque,
> Et pueros & anus——
> What once is said and writ, all men must know,
> Old wives and children as they come and go.

"What a company of poets hath this year brought out," as Pliny complains to Sossius Sinesius; "This April every day some or other have recited." What a catalogue of new books all this year, all this age (I say) have our Frankfurt marts,[1] our domestic marts brought out? Twice a year, Proferunt se nova ingenia & ostentant, we stretch our wits out and set them to sale, magno conatu nihil agimus [with mighty effort we attain nothing]. So that which Gesner much desires, if a speedy reformation be not had, by some prince's edicts and grave supervisors, to restrain this liberty, it will run on in infinitum. Quis tam avidus librorum helluo [what a glut of books!], Who can read them? As already, we shall have a vast chaos and confusion of books, we are oppressed with them, our eyes ache with reading, our fingers with turning. For my part I am one of the number, nos numerus sumus, I do not deny it, I have only this of Macrobius to say for myself, Omne meum, nihil meum, 'tis all mine and none mine. As a good housewife out of divers fleeces weaves one piece of cloth, a bee gathers wax and honey out of many flowers, and makes a new bundle of all,

> Floriferis ut apes in saltibus omnia libant,

I have laboriously collected this cento out of diverse writers,[2] and that sine injuriâ, I have wronged no authors, but given every man his own,[3] which Hierom so much commends in Nepotian, he stole not whole verses, pages, tracts, as some do nowadays, concealing their authors' names, but still said this was Cyprian's, that Lactantius, that Hilarius, so said Minutius Felix, so Victorinus, thus far Arnobius: I cite and quote mine authors (which howsoever some illiterate scribblers accompt pedantical, as a cloak of ignorance, and opposite to their affected fine style, I must and will use), sumpsi, non surripui [I have borrowed, not stolen], and what Varro lib. 6 De re rust. speaks of bees, minimè maleficæ nullius opus vellicantes faciunt deterius [that they are by no means malicious, because they injure nothing they extract honey from], I can say of myself, whom have I injured? The matter is theirs most part, and yet mine, apparet unde sumptum sit (which Seneca approves) aliud tamen quàm unde sumptum sit apparet [whence it is taken appears, yet it appears as something different from what it is taken from], which nature doth with the aliment of our bodies, incorporate, digest, assimilate, I do conquoquere quod hausi, dispose of what I take. I make them pay tribute, to set out this my Maceronicon,[4] the method only is mine own, I must usurp that of Wecker è Terentio, nihil dictum quod non dictum priùs, methodus sola artificem ostendit, we can say nothing but what hath been said, the composition and method is ours only, and shows a scholar. Oribasius, Ætius, Avicenna, have all out of Galen, but to their own method, diverso stylo, non diversa fide, our poets steal from Homer, he spews, saith Ælian, they lick it up. Divines use Austin's words verbatim still, and our story-dressers do as much, he that comes last is commonly best,

> —— donec quid grandius ætas
> Postera, sorsque ferat melior. ——
> [Until a later age and a happier lot produce something more truly grand]

Though there were many giants of old in physic and philosophy, yet I say with Didacus Stella, "A dwarf standing on the shoulders of a giant may see farther than a giant himself"; I may likely add, alter, and see farther than my predecessors; and it is no greater prejudice for me to indite after others, than for Ælianus Montaltus that famous physician, to write De morbis capitis [about diseases of the head] after Jason Pratensis, Heurnius, Hildesheim, &c. Many horses to run in a race, one logician, one rhetorician, after another. Oppose then what thou wilt,

[1] The annual book fair ("mart" or market) in Frankfurt was the largest in Europe.

[2] cento a composition formed by joining scraps from other authors (OED cento 2); originally, any patchwork material.

[3] In the original editions, Burton provided the names of the authors he cites in marginal notes.

[4] Maceronicon a jumble or medley, particularly used of works which consistently introduce words from other languages (especially Latin).

> Allatres licet usque nos & usque,
> Et gannitibus improbis lacessas.
> [Bark and snarl at me as wantonly as you choose]

I solve it thus. And for those other faults of barbarism, Doric dialect, extemporanean style, tautologies, apish imitation, a rhapsody of rags gathered together from several dung-hills, excrements of authors, toys and fopperies, confusedly tumbled out, without art, invention, judgement, wit, learning, harsh, raw, rude, fantastical, absurd, insolent, indiscreet, ill-composed, indigested, vain, scurrile, idle, dull and dry; I confess all ('tis partly affected) thou canst not think worse of me than I do of myself. 'Tis not worth the reading, I yield it, I desire thee not to lose time in perusing so vain a subject, I should be peradventure loath myself to read him or thee, so writing, 'tis not operæ pretium [worthwhile]. All I say, is this, that I have precedents for it, which Isocrates calls perfugium iis qui peccant [a windfall for sinners], others as absurd, vain, idle, illiterate, &c. Nonnulli alii idem fecerunt, others have done as much, it may be more, and perhaps thou thyself, Novimus & qui te, &c. we have all our faults, scimus & hanc veniam, &c. thou censurest me, so have I done others, and may do thee, Cædimus inque vicem, &c. 'tis lex talionis, quid pro quo. Go now censure, criticize, scoff, and rail.

> Nasutus sis usque licet, sis denique nasus:
> Non potes in nugas dicere plura meas,
> Ipse ego quam dixi, &c.
> Wer'st thou all scoffs and flouts, a very Momus,
> Then we ourselves, thou canst not say worse of us.

Thus as when women scold have I cried whore first, and in some men's censures, I am afraid I have over-shot myself, Laudare se vani, vituperare sulti [the vain praise themselves, the foolish blame themselves], as I do not arrogate, I will not derogate. Primus vestrûm non sum, nec imus, I am none of the best, I am none of the meanest of you. As I am an inch, or so many feet, so many parasangs,[1] after him or him, I may be peradventure an ace before thee. Be it therefore as it is, well or ill, I have assayed, put myself upon the stage, I must abide the censure, I may not escape it. It is most true, stylus virum arguit, our style bewrays us, and as hunters find their game by the trace, so is a man's genius descried by his works, Multò meliùs ex sermone quàm lineamentis, de moribus hominum judicamus [we judge better of a man's character by his conversation than his features]; 'twas old Cato's rule. I have laid myself open (I know it) in this treatise, turned mine inside outward, I shall be censured, I doubt not, for to say truth with Erasmus, nihil morosius hominum judiciis, there's naught so peevish as men's judgements, yet this is some comfort, ut palata, sic judicia, our censures are as various as our palates.

> Tres mihi convivæ prope dissentire videntur
> Poscentes vario multum diversa palato, &c.
> [They seem to me to differ like three guests
> Whose palates each require different food]

Our writings are as so many dishes, our readers guests; our books like beauty, that which one admires another rejects; so are we approved as men's fancies are inclined.

> Pro captu lectoris habent sua fata libelli
> [The reader's fancy makes the fate of books],

---

[1] parasangs A parasang was a Persian unit of length equal to about five kilometres.

That which is most pleasing to one is amaracum sui [marjoram to a sow], most harsh to another. Quot homines, tot sententiæ, so many men, so many minds: that which thou condemnest he commends.

> Quod petis, id sane est invisum acidumque duobus
> [What you wish, that the other two detest].

He respects matter, thou art wholly for words, he loves a loose and free style, thou art all for neat composition, strong lines, hyperboles, allegories; he desires a fine frontispiece, enticing pictures, such as Hieron: Natali the Jesuit hath cut to the Dominicals,[1] to draw on the reader's attention, which thou rejectest, that which one admires, another explodes as most absurd and ridiculous. If it be not point blank to his humour, his method, his conceit, Si quid forsan omissum, quod is animo conceperit, si quæ dictio, &c. If ought be omitted or added, which he likes or dislikes, thou art mancipium paucæ lectionis [a sorry fellow of little reading], an idiot, an ass, nullus es, or plagiarius [not worth reading, or a plagiarist], a trifler, a trivant,[2] thou art an idle fellow; or else 'tis a thing of mere industry, a collection without wit or invention, a very toy. Facilia sic putant omnes quæ jam facta, nec de salebris cogitant, ubi via strata [All people think things so easy that are already done, nor do they think of the trouble the road has taken to make when it is made], so men are valued, their labours vilified by fellows of no worth themselves; as things of nought, who could not have done as much: Unusquisque abundat sensu suo, every man abounds in his own sense, and whilst each particular party is so affected, how should one please all?

> Quid dem, quid non dem? Renuis tu quod jubet > ille?
> [What shall I give my guests? For you refuse what he demands.]

How shall I hope to express myself to each man's humour and conceit, or to give satisfaction to all? Some understand too little, some too much, Qui similitèr in legendos libros, atque in salutandos homines irruunt, non cogitantes quales, sed quibus vestibus induti sint [who value books by the authors as people judge of men by their clothes], as Austin observes, not regarding what, but who write, orexin habet Authoris celebritas [the author's fame sells the book], not valuing the metal, but stamp that is upon it, Cantharum aspiciunt, non quid in eo [they look at the tankard, and not the liquor in it]. If he be not rich, in great place, polite and brave, a great doctor, or full fraught with grand titles, though never so well qualified, he is a dunce, but as Baronius hath it of Cardinal Caraffa's works, he is a mere hog that rejects any man for his poverty. Some are too partial, as friends to overween, others come with a prejudice to carp, vilify, detract, and scoff (qui de me forsan, quicquid est omni contemptu contemptiùs judicant [who judge perhaps whatever I produce as unworthy of anything but contempt]); some as bees for honey, some as spiders to gather poison; What shall I do in this case? As a Dutch host, if you come to an inn in Germany, and dislike your fare, diet, lodging, &c. replies in a surly tone, aliud tibi quæras diversorium, if you like not this, get you to another inn; I resolve, if you like not my writing, go read something else. I do not much esteem thy censure, take thy course, 'tis not as thou wilt, nor as I will, but when we have both done, that of Plinius Secundus to Trajan, will prove true, "Every man's witty labour takes not, except the matter, subject, occasion, and some commending favourite happen to it." If I be taxed, exploded by thee and some such, I shall haply be approved and commended by others, and so have been (Expertus loquor [I speak from experience]) and may truly say with Jovius in like case (absit verbo jactantia) heroum quorundam, pontificum, & vivorum nobilium familiaritatem & amicitiam, gratasque gratias, & multorum benè laudatorum laudes sum indè promeritus [(let me not speak boastfully) I have had the intimacy and friendship of some eminent men, pontiffs, and noblemen, and had pleasant favours from them, and been praised by many who themselves were highly esteemed], as I have been honoured by some worthy men, so have I been vilified by others, and shall be. At the first publishing of this book (which Probus of Persius satires), editum librum continuò mirari homines, atque avidè deripere cœperunt [men began both to admire and eagerly carp at it], I may in some sort apply to this my work, the first, second, and third edition were suddenly gone, eagerly read, and as I have said, not so much approved by some, as scornfully rejected by others. But it was Democritus his fortune, Idem admirationi & irrisioni habitus [he was both admired and jeered at]. 'Twas Seneca's fate, that superintendent of wit, learning, judgement, ad stuporem doctus [learned to a marvel], the best of Greek and Latin writers, in Plutarch's opinion, that "renowned corrector of vice," as Fabius terms him, "and painful omniscious philosopher, that writ so excellently and admirably well," could not please all parties, or escape censure: How is he vilified by Caligula, Agellius, Fabius, and Lipsius himself, his chief propugner?[1] In eo pleraque pernitiosa, saith the same Fabius, many childish tracts and sentences he hath, sermo illaboratus, too negligent often, and remiss, as Agellius observes, oratio vulgaris & protrita, dicaces & ineptæ sententiæ, eruditio plebeia, an homely shallow writer as he is, In partibus spinas & fastidia habet [in some of his works he has difficulties and inspires disgust], saith Lipsius, and as in all his other works, so especially in his epistles, aliæ in argutiis & ineptiis occupantur, intricatus alicubi, & parum compositus, sine copiâ rerum hoc fecit, he jumbles up many things together immethodically, after the Stoics' fashion, parum ordinavit, multa accumulavit, &c. If Seneca be thus lashed, and many famous men that I could name, what shall I expect? How shall I that am vix umbra tanti Philosphi [scarce a shadow of so great a philosopher], hope to please? "No man so absolute," Erasmus holds, "to satisfy all, except antiquity, prescription, &c. set a bar." But as I have proved in Seneca, this will not always take place, how shall I evade? 'Tis the common doom of all writers, I must (I say) abide it, I seek not applause; Non ego ventosæ venor suffragià plebis [I court not the approval of the common people], again non sum adeò informis [I am not so ugly], I would not be vilified:

[1] In liturgical books, dominical letters were letters printed in a distinctive fashion (usually in red ink or in a larger type) to denote Sundays; Burton is referring to a folio published in Antwerp in 1607 with "cut" (engraved) illustrations.

[2] trivant a dialect variant of "truant," an idler (OED).

> —— laudatus abundè,
> Non fastiditus si tibi lector ero.
> [I shall have praise enough if, gentle reader, you > not despise me]

I fear good men's censures, and to their favourite acceptance I submit my labours,

> —— & linguas Mancipiorum
> Contemno, ——
> [But I despise the tongues of slaves]

As the barking of a dog, I securely contemn those malicious and scurrile obloquies, flouts, calumnies, of railers and detractors, I scorn the rest. What therefore I have said, pro tenuitate meâ [in my poor fashion], I have said.

One or two things yet I was desirous to have amended if I could, concerning the manner of handling this my subject, for which I must apologize, depracari, and upon better advice give the friendly reader notice. It was not mine intent to prostitute my Muse in English, or to divulge secreta

---

[1] propugner defender (OED propugner).

Minervæ [the secrets of Minerva], but to have exposed this more contract in Latin,[1] if I could have got it printed. Any scurrile pamphlet is welcome to our mercenary stationers in English, they print all,

> —— cuduntque libellos
> In quorum foliis vix simia nada cacaret.
> [and they print books upon whose pages a > naked ape would hardly shit.]

But in Latin they will not deal; which is one of the reasons Nicholas Car in his oration of the paucity of English writers, gives; that so many flourishing wits are smothered in oblivion, lie dead and buried in this our nation. Another main fault is, that I have not revised the copy, and amended the style, which now flows remissly, as it was first conceived, but my leisure would not permit, Feci nec quod potui, nec quod volui, I confess it is neither as I would, or as it should be.

> Cùm relego scripsisse pudet, quia plurima cerno
> Me quoque quæ fuerant judice digna lini.
> When I peruse this tract which I have writ,
> I am abash'd, and much I hold unfit.

Et quod gravissimum [and what is most important], in the matter itself, many things I disallow at this present, which then I writ, Non eadem est ætas non mens ['twas in my salad days, when I was green, not ripe in judgement], I would willingly retract much, &c. but 'tis too late, I can only crave pardon now for what is amiss.

I might indeed (had I wisely done) observed that precept of the poet,

> —— nomunque prematur in annum,
> [let a book wait nine years before it is printed]

And have taken more care: Or as Alexander the physician would have done by lapis lazuli, fifty times washed before it be used, I should have revised, corrected, and amended this tract; but I had not (as I said) that happy leisure, no amanuenses or assistants. Pancrates in Lucian, wanting a servant as he went from Memphis to Coptus in Egypt, took a door bar, and after some superstitious words pronounced (Eucrates the relator was then present) made it stand up like a serving-man, fetch him water, turn the spit, serve in supper, and what work he would besides; and when he had done that service he desired, turned his man to a stick again. I have no such skill to make new men at my pleasure, or means to hire them; no whistle to call like the master of a ship, and bid them run, &c. I have no such authority, no such benefactors as that noble Ambrosius was to Origen, allowing him six or seven amanuenses to write out his dictates, I must for that cause do my business myself, and was therefore enforced, as a bear doth her whelps, to bring forth this confused lump, I had not time to lick it into form, as she doth her young ones,[2] but even so to publish it, as it was first written quicquid in buccam venit [whatever came uppermost], in an extemporean style, as I do commonly all other exercises, effudi quicquid dictavit Genius meus [I poured forth whatever my genius dictated], out of a confused company of notes, and writ with as small deliberation as I do ordinarily speak, without all affectation of big words, fustian phrases, jingling terms, tropes, strong lines, that like Acestes' arrows caught fire as they flew; strains of wit, brave heats, elegies, hyperbolical exhortations, elegancies, &c. which many so much affect. I am aquæ potor [a water drinker], drink no wine at all, which so much improves our modern wits, a loose, plain, rude wri-ter, ficum voco ficum, & ligonem ligonem [I call a fig a fig and a spade a spade], and as free, as loose, idem calamo quod in mente, I call a spade a spade, animis hæc scribo, non auribus, I respect matter not words;

---

[1] more contract more briefly.

[2] According to classical and Renaissance natural history lore, bear cubs were born without form and licked into shape by their mother.

remembering that of Cardan, verba propter res, non res propter verba [words exist for things, not things for words]: and seeking with Seneca, quid scribam non quemadmodum, rather what, than how to write. For as Philo thinks, "he that is conversant about matter, neglects words, and those that excel in this art of speaking, have no profound learning,"

> Verba nitent phaleris, at nullas verba medullas
> Intus habent ——
> [Words may sound fine, but have no inner meaning]

Besides, it was the observation of that wise Seneca, "when you see a fellow careful about his words, and neat in his speech, know this for a certainty, that man's mind is busied about toys, there's no solidity in him." Non est ornamentum virile concinnitas [prettiness of style is not a manly distinction], as he said of a nightingale,

> —— vox es prætereà nihil, &c.
> [you are a voice, and nothing else].

I am therefore in this point a professed disciple of Apollonius, a scholar of Socrates, I neglect phrases, and labour wholly to inform my readers' understanding, not to please his ear; 'tis not my study or intent to compose neatly, which an orator requires, but to express myself readily and plainly as it happens. So that as a river runs sometimes precipitate and swift, then dull and slow; now direct, then per ambages [windingly]; now deep, then shallow; now muddy, then clear; now broad, then narrow; doth my style flow: now serious, then light; now comical, then satirical; now more elaborate, then remiss, as the present subject required, or as at that time I was affected. And if thou vouchsafe to read this treatise, it shall seem no otherwise to thee, than the way to an ordinary traveller, sometimes fair, sometimes foul; here champaign,[1] there enclosed; barren in one place, better soil in another: by woods, groves, hills, dales, plains, &c. I shall lead thee per ardua montium, & lubrica vallium, & roscida cespitum, & glebosa camporum, through variety of objects, that which thou shalt like and surely dislike...

The last and greatest exception is, that I being a divine, have meddled with physic,

> —— tantumne est ab re tuâ otii tibi,
> Aliena ut cures, eaque nihil quæ ad te attinent?

Which Menedemus objected to Chremes, have I so much leisure, or little business of mine own, as to look after other men's matters which concern me not? What have I to do with physic? quod mediocorum est promittant medici [let doctors attend to what concerns doctors]. The Lacedemonians were once in counsel about state matters, a debauched fellow spake excellent well, and to the purpose, his speech was generally approved. A grave senator steps up, and by all means would have it repealed, though good, because dehonestabatur pessimo Authore, it had no better an author; let some good man relate the same, and then it should pass. This counsel was embraced, factum est, and it was registered forthwith, Et sic bona sententia mansit, Malus Author mutatus est [and so the good advice was taken, the bad advisor was changed]. Thou sayest as much of me, stomachosus as thou art,[2] and grantest peradventure this which I have written in physic, not to be amiss, had another done it, a professed physician, or so; but why should I meddle with this tract? Hear me speak: There be many other subjects, I do easily grant, both in humanity and divinity, fit to be treated of, of which had I written ad ostentationem only, to show myself, I should have rather chosen, and in which I have been more conversant, I could have more willingly luxuriated, and better satisfied myself and others; but that at this time I was fatally driven upon this rock of melancholy, and carried away by this by-stream, which as a rillet, is deducted from the main channel of my studies, in which I have pleased and busied myself at idle hours, as a subject more necessary and commodious. Not that I prefer it before divinity, which I do acknowledge to be the queen of professions, and to which all the rest are as handmaids, but that in divinity I saw no such great need. For had I written positively, there be so many books in that kind, so many commentators, treatises, pamphlets, expositions, sermons, that whole teams of oxen cannot draw them; and had I been as forward and ambitious as some others, I might have haply printed a sermon at Paul's Cross, a sermon in St Maries Oxon[iensis], a sermon in Christ Church, or a sermon before the right Honorable, right Reverend, a sermon before the right Worshipful, a sermon in Latin, in English, a sermon with a name, a sermon without, a sermon, a sermon, &c. But I have ever been as desirous to suppress my labours in this kind, as others have been to press and publish theirs. To have written in controversy, had been to cut off an hydra's head, lis litem generat [litigation begets litigation], one begets another, so many duplications, triplications, and swarms of questions, In sacro bello hoc quod stili mucrone agitur [in this sacred war which is fought with the point of the pen], that having once begun, I should never make an end.

LOVE OF LEARNING, OR OVERMUCH STUDY. WITH A DIGRESSION OF THE MISERY OF SCHOLARS, AND WHY THE MUSES ARE MELANCHOLY

(pt. 1, sect. 2, memb. 3, subs. 15)

Leonartus Fuchsius Instit. lib. 3 sect. 1 cap. 1, Fælix Plater lib. 3 de mentis alienat., Herc. de Saxonia tract. post. de melanch. cap. 3 speak of a peculiar fury, which comes by overmuch study. Fernelius lib. 1 cap. 18 puts study, contemplation, and continual meditation, as an especial cause of madness: and in his 86 consul. cites the same words. Jo: Arculanus in lib. 9, Rhasis ad Almansorem cap. 16, amongst other causes, reckons up studium vehemens [overmuch study]: so doth Levinus Lemnius, lib. de occul. nat. mirac. lib. 1 cap. 16. "Many men" (saith he) "come to this malady by continual study, and night-waking, and of all other men, scholars are most subject to it": and such Rhasis adds, "that have commonly the finest wits," cont. lib. 1 tract. 9. Marsilius Ficinus de sanit. tuenda, lib. 1 cap. 7 puts melancholy amongst one of those five principal plagues of students, 'tis a common maul unto them all, and almost in some measure an inseparable companion. Varro belike for that cause calls Tristes Philosophos & severos [philosophers sad and severe], severe, sad, dry, tetrick,[1] are common epithets to scholars: And Patritius therefore in the Institution of Princes, would not have them to be great students. For (as Machiavel holds) study weakens their bodies, dulls the spirits, abates their strength and courage; and good scholars are never good soldiers; which a certain Goth well perceived, for when his countrymen came into Greece, and would have burned all their books, he cried out against it, by all means they should not do it, "leave them that plague, which in time will consume all their vigor, and martial spirits." The Turks abdicated Cornutus the next heir, from the Empire, because he was so much given to his books: and 'tis the common tenet of the world, that learning dulls and diminisheth the spirits, and so per consequens [consequently] produceth melancholy.

Two main reasons may be given of it, why students should be more subject to this malady than others. The one is, they live a sedentary, solitary life, sibi & musis [to themselves and letters], free from bodily exercise, and those ordinary disports which other men use: and many times if discontent and idleness concur with it, which is too frequent, they are precipitated into this gulf on a sudden: but the common cause is overmuch study; too much learning (as Festus told Paul) hath made thee mad; 'tis that other extreme which effects it. So did Trincavellius lib. 1 consil. 12 & 13 find by his experience, in two of his patients, a young baron, and another, that contracted this malady by too vehement study. So Forestus observat. lib. 10 observ. 13 in a young divine in Louvain, that was mad, and said, "he had a Bible in his head." Marsilius Ficinus de sanit. tuend. lib. 1 cap. 1, 3, 4 & lib. 2 cap. 16 gives many reasons, "why students dote more often than others." The first is their negligence: "Other men look to their tools, a painter will wash his pencils, a smith will look to his hammer, anvil, forge: an husbandman will mend his plough-irons, and grind his hatchet if it be dull; a falconer or huntsman will have an especial care of his hawks, hounds, horses, dogs, &c. a musician will string and unstring his lute, &c. only scholars neglect that instrument, their brain and spirits (I mean) which they daily use, and by which they range over all the world, which by much study is consumed." Vide (saith Lucian) ne funiculum nimis intendeno, aliquandò abrumpas: See thou twist not the rope so hard, till at length it break. Ficinus in his fourth cap. gives some other reasons; Saturn and Mercury, the patrons of learning, are both dry planets: and Origanus assigns the same cause, why Mercurialists are so poor, and most part beggars; for that their president Mercury had not better fortune himself. The destinies of old, put poverty upon him as a punishment; since when, poetry and beggary, are Gemelli, twin-born brats, inseparable companions:

[1] tetrick austere, harsh, morose (OED tetric a 1).

> And to this day is every scholar poor,
> Gross gold from them runs headlong to the > boor:[1]

Mercury can help them to knowledge but not to money.

The second is contemplation, which dries the brain, and extinguisheth natural heat; for whilst the spirits are intent to meditation above in the head, the stomach and liver are left destitute, and thence come black blood and crudities by defect of concoction, and for want of exercise, the superfluous vapours cannot exhale, &c. The same reasons are repeated by Gomesius lib. 4. cap. 1. de sale, Nymannus orat. de Imag. Jo. Voschius lib. 2. cap. 5. de peste: and something more they add, that hard students are commonly troubled with gouts, catarrhs, rheums, cachexia, bradiopepsia, bad eyes, stone and colic, crudities, oppilations, vertigo, winds, cramps, consumptions, and all such diseases as come by overmuch sitting;[2] they are most part lean, dry, ill coloured, spend their fortunes, lose their wits, and many times their lives, and all through immoderate pains, and extraordinary studies. If you will not believe the truth of this, look upon great Tostatus and Thomas Aquinas works, and tell me whether those men took pains? peruse Austin, Hierom, &c. and many thousands besides.

> Qui cupit optatam cursu contingere metam,
> Multa tulit, fecitque puer, sudavit & alsit.
> He that desires this wished goal to gain,
> Must sweat and freeze, before he can attain,

and labour hard for it. So did Seneca, by his own confession ep. 8. "Not a day that I spend idle, part of the night I keep mine eyes open tired with waking, and now slumbering to their continual task." Hear Tully pro Archia Poeta: "whilst others loitered, and took their pleasures, he was continually at his book": so they do that will be scholars, and that to the hazard (I say) of their healths, fortunes, wits, and lives. How much did Aristotle and Ptolemy spend? unius regni precium they say, more than a King's ransom, how many crowns per annum [per year], to perfect arts, the one about his history of creatures, the other on his Almagest? How much time did Thebet Benchorat employ, to find out the motion of the eighth sphere, 40 years and more, some write, how many poor scholars have lost their wits, or become dizards, neglecting all worldly affairs, and their own health, wealth, esse and benè esse, to gain knowledge? for which, after all their pains in the world's esteem they are accounted ridiculous and silly fools, idiots, asses, and (as oft they are) rejected, contemned, derided, doting, and mad. Look for examples in Hildesheim spicel. 2 de mania & delirio: read Trincavellius lib. 3 consil. 36 & consil. 17, Montanus consil. 233, Garcæus de Judic. genit. cap. 33, Mercurialis consil. 86 consil. 25, Prosper Calenus in his book de atrâ bile: Go to Bedlam and ask. Or if they keep their wits, yet they are esteemed scrubs and fools by reason of their carriage: after seven years study

> ——— statua taciturnius exit,
> Plerumque & risum populi quatit. ———
> [In general he's more silent than a statue,
> And makes the people shake their sides with laughter.]

Because they cannot ride an horse, which every clown can do; salute and court a gentlewoman, carve at table, cringe and make congies,[1] which every common swasher can do, hos populus ridet &c. they are laughed to scorn, and accounted silly fools by our gallants. Yea many times, such is their misery, they deserve it: a mere scholar, a mere ass.

> Obstipo capite, & figentes lumine terram,
> Murmura cùm secum, & rabiosa silentia rodunt,
> Atque exporrecto trutinantur verba labello,
> Ægroti veteris meditantes somnia, gigni
> De nihilo nihilum; in nihilum nil posse reverti.
> ——— who do lean awry
> Their heads, piercing the earth with a fixed eye:
> When by themselves they gnaw their murmuring,
> And furious silence, as 'twere balancing,
> Each word upon their outstretched lip, and when
> They meditate the dreams of old sick men,
> As, Out of nothing, nothing can be brought,
> And that which is; can ne're be turn'd to naught.

Thus they go commonly meditating unto themselves, thus they sit, such is their action and gesture. Fulgosus lib. 8 cap. 7 makes mention how Th. Aquinas supping with King Lewis of France, upon a sudden knocked his fist upon the table, and cried, conclusum est contra Manichæos [the Manichees are proved wrong], his wits were a woolgathering, as they say, and his head busied about other matters; when he perceived his error, he was much abashed. Such a story there is of Archimedes in Vitruvius, that having found out the means to know how much gold was mingled with the silver in King Hieron's crown, ran naked forth of the bath and cried εὕρηκα [eureka], I have found: "and was commonly so intent to his studies, that he never perceived what was done about him, when the city was taken, and the soldiers now ready to rifle his house, he took no notice of it." S. Bernard rode all day long by the Leman lake, and asked at last where he was, Marulus lib. 2. cap. 4. It was Democritus' carriage alone that made the Abderites suppose him to have been mad,[2] and send for Hippocrates to cure him: if he had been in any solemn company, he would upon all occasions fall a laughing. Theophrastus saith as much of Heraclitus, for that he continually wept, & Laertius of Menedemus Lampsacus, because he ran about like a mad man, "saying he came from hell as a spy, to tell the devils what mortal men did." Your greatest students are commonly no better, silly, soft fellows in their outward behaviour, absurd, ridiculous to others, and no whit experienced in worldly business; they can measure the heavens, range over the world, teach others wisdom, and yet in bargains and contracts they are circumvented by every base tradesman. Are not these men fools? and how should they be otherwise? "but as so many sots in schools, when (as he [Petronius] well observed), they neither hear nor see such things as are commonly practised abroad," how should they get experience, by what means? "I knew in my time many scholars," saith Ænæas Sylvius (in an Epistle of his to Gaspar Schlick, Chancellor to the Emperor) "excellent well learned, but so rude, so silly, that they had no common civility, nor knew how to manage their domestic or public affairs. Paglarensis was amazed, and said his farmer had surely cozened him, when he heard him tell that his sow had eleven pigs, and his ass had but one foal." To say the best of this profession, I can give no other testimony of them in general, than that of Pliny of Isæus; "He is yet a scholar, than which kind of men there is nothing so simple," so sincere none better, they are most part harmless, honest, upright, innocent, plain dealing men.

[2] carriage habitual conduct or behaviour (OED carriage 14).

Now because they are commonly subject to such hazards and inconveniences, as dotage, madness, simplicity, &c. Jo. Voschius would have good scholars to be highly rewarded, and had in some extraordinary respect above other men, "to have greater privileges than the rest, that adventure themselves and abbreviate their lives for the public good." But our patrons of learning are so far nowadays, from respecting the Muses, and giving that honour to scholars, or reward which they deserve, and are allowed by those indulgent privileges of many noble princes, that after all their pains taken in the universities, cost and charge, expenses, irksome hours, laborious tasks, wearisome days, dangers, hazards (barred interim from all pleasures which other men have, mewed up like hawks all their lives) if they chance to wade through them, they shall in the end be rejected, contemned, & which is their greatest misery, driven to their shifts, exposed to want, poverty and beggary.[1] Their familiar attendants are,

> Pallentes morbi, luctus, curæque laborque
> Et metus, & malesuada fames, & turpis egestas,
> Terribiles visu formæ ———
> Grief, labour, care, pale sickness, miseries,
> Fear, filthy poverty, hunger that cries,
> Terrible monsters to be seen with eyes.

If there were nothing else to trouble them, the conceit of this alone were enough to make them all melancholy. Most other trades and professions after some seven years prenticeship, are enabled by their craft to live of themselves. A merchant adventures his goods at sea, and though his hazard be great, yet if one ship return of four, he likely makes a saving voyage. An husbandman's gains are almost certain; quibus ipse Jupiter nocere non potest ('tis Cato's hyperbole, a great husband[man] himself) only scholars, methinks are most uncertain, unrespected, subject to all casualties, and hazards. For first, not one of a many proves to be a scholar, all are not capable and docile,[2] ex omni ligno non fit Mercurius: we can make Mayors and officers every year, but not scholars: Kings can invest Knights and Barons, as Sigismond the Emperor confessed; universities can give degrees; and Tu quod es, è populo quilibet

[2] docile teachable (OED docile 1).

esse potest [what you are, anyone in the world can be]; but he nor they, nor all the world can give learning, make philosophers, artists, orators, poets: we can soon say, as Seneca well notes, O virum bonum, ô divitem, point at a rich man, a good, an happy man, a proper man, sumptuosè vestitum, Calamistratum, bene olentem, magno temporis impendio constat hæc laudatio, ô virum literatum, but 'tis not so easily performed to find out a learned man. Learning is not so quickly got, though they may be willing to take pains, to that end sufficiently informed and liberally maintained by their patrons and parents, yet few can compass it. Or if they be docile, yet all men's wills are not answerable to their wits, they can apprehend, but will not take pains; they are either seduced by bad companions, vel in puellam impingunt, vel in poculum [they come to grief with women or wine], and so spend their time to their friends' grief and their own undoings. Or put case they be studious, industrious, of ripe wits, and perhaps good capacities, then how many diseases of body and mind must they encounter? No labour in the world like unto study. It may be, their temperature will not endure it,[1] but striving to be excellent to know all, they lose health, wealth, wit, life and all. Let him yet happily escape all these hazards, æneis intestinis, with a body of brass, and is now consummate and ripe, he hath profited in his studies, and proceeded with all applause: after many expenses, he is fit for preferment, where shall he have it? he is as far to seek it as he was (after twenty years standing) at the first day of his coming to the university. For what course shall he take, being now capable and ready? The most parable and easy,[2] and about which many are employed, is to teach a school, turn lecturer or curate, and for that he shall have falconer's wages, ten [pounds] per annum, and his diet, or some small stipend, so long as he can please his patron or the parish; if they approve him not (for usually they do but a year or two) as inconstant, as they that cried "Hosanna" one day, and "Crucify him" the other; serving-man like, he must go look a new master: if they do what is his reward?

> Hoc quoque te manet ut pueros elementa docentem
> Occupet extremis in vicis alba senectus.
> [This fate, too, awaits you, that stammering age > will come upon you as you teach boys their ABC
> in the city's outskirts]

Like an ass, he wears out his time for provender, and can show a stump rod,[3] togam tritam & laceram, saith Hædus, an old torn gown, an ensign of his infelicity, he hath his labour for his pain, a modicum to keep him till he be decrepit, and that is all. Grammaticus non est fœlix, &c. [a scholar is not a happy man]. If he be a trencher chaplain in a gentleman's house,[4] as it befell Euphormio, after some seven years service, he may perchance have a living to the halves,[5] or some small rectory with the mother of the maids at length, a poor kinswoman, or a cracked chamber-maid, to have and to hold during the time of his life. But if he offend his good patron, or displease his lady mistress in the meantime,

> Ducetur Plantâ velut ictus ab Hercule Cacus,
> Poneturque foras, si quid tentaverit unquam
> Hiscere ——

as Hercules did by Cacus, he shall be dragged forth of doors by the heels, away with him. If he bend his forces to some other studies, with an intent to be à secretis [a secretary] to some nobleman, or in such a place with an ambassador, he shall find that these persons rise like prentices one under another, as in so many trademen's shops, when the master is dead, the foreman of the shop commonly steps in his place. Now for poets, rhetoricians, historians, philosophers, mathematicians, sophisters, &c. they are like grasshoppers, sing they must in summer, and pine in the winter, for there is no preferment for them. Even so they were at first, if you will believe that pleasant tale of Socrates, which he told fair Phaedrus under a plane-tree, at the banks of the river Ilissus; about noon when it was hot, and the grasshoppers made a noise, he took that sweet occasion to tell him a tale, how grasshoppers were once scholars, musicians, poets, &c. before the Muses were born, and lived without meat and drink, and for that cause were turned by Jupiter into grasshoppers. And may be turned again, In Tythoni Cicadas, aut Lyciorum ranas [into Tithonius' grasshoppers, or frogs of the Lycians], for any reward I see they are like to have: or else in the meantime, I would they could live as they did without any viaticum,[1] like so many Manucodiatæ, those Indian birds of paradise, as we commonly call them, those I mean that live with the air, and dew of heaven and need no other food: for being as they are, their Rhetoric only serves them, to curse their bad fortunes, and many of them for want of means are driven to hard shifts, from grasshoppers they turn humblebees and wasps, plain parasites, and make the Muses, mules, to satisfy their hunger-starved paunches, and get a meal's meat. To say truth, 'tis the common fortune of most scholars, to be servile and poor, to complain pitifully, and lay open their wants to their respectless patrons, as Cardan doth, as Xilander, and many others: And which is too common in those dedicatory epistles, for hope of gain, to lie, flatter, and with hyperbolical elogiums and commendations, to magnify and extol an illiterate and unworthy idiot, for his excellent virtues, whom they should rather as Machiavel observes, vilify, and rail at downright for his most notorious villainies and vices. So they prostitute themselves as fiddlers, or mercenary tradesmen, to serve great men's turns for a small reward. They are like Indians, they have store of gold; but know not the worth of it, for I am of Synesius' opinion, "King Hieron got more by Simonides' acquaintance, than Simonides did by his": they have their best education, good institution, sole qualification from us, and when they have done well, their honour and immortality from us, we are the living tombs, registers, and as so many trumpeters of their fames: what was Achilles without Homer; Alexander without Arrian and Curtius; who had known the Cæsars, but for Suetonius and Dion?

[1] temperature bodily constitution (OED temperature 5).

[2] parable procurable (OED parable a).

[3] stump rod probably a rod worn to a stump by its use to punish the boys whom the impoverished old teacher is compelled to teach (OED stump a 1; this place cited).

[4] trencher chaplain a contemptuous term for a domestic chaplain, one who eats at his patron's table (OED trencher-chaplain).

[5] living to the halves receiving only half the income belonging to the position, with the other half being kept by the patron (see the note on the buying and selling of livings below).

> Vixerunt fortes ante Agamemnona
> Multi: sed omnes illachrimabiles
> Urgentur, ignotique longâ
> Nocte, carent quia vate sacro.
> [Many brave persons lived ere Agamemnon
> But all are buried in night's long obscurity
> Unwept, unknown, because they lacked a bard.]

They are more beholden to scholars, than scholars to them; but they undervalue themselves, and so by those great men are kept down. Let them have that Encyclopædian, all the learning in the world, they must keep it to themselves, "live in base esteem, and starve, except they will submit," as Budæus well hath it, "so many good parts, so many ensigns of arts, virtues, be slavishly obnoxious to some illiterate potentate, and live under his insolent worship, or honour, like parasites, qui tanquam mures alienum panem comedunt" [who like mice devour another man's bread]. For to say truth, artes hæ non sunt Lucrativæ, as Guido Bonat that great astrologer could foresee, they be not gainful arts these, sed esurientes & famelicæ, but poor and hungry.

[1] viaticum a supply of food, money or other necessaries for a journey (OED viaticum 2, 2c).

> Dat Galenus opes, dat Justinianus honores,
> Sed genus & species cogitur ire pedes:
> The rich physician, honour'd lawyers ride,
> Whil'st the poor scholar foots it by their side.

Poverty is the Muses' patrimony, and as that poetical divinity teacheth us, when Jupiter's daughters were each of them married to the Gods, the Muses alone were left solitary, Helicon forsaken of all suitors, and I believe it was, because they had no portion.

> Calliope longum cælebs cur vixit in ævum?
> Nempe nihil dotis, quod numeraret, erat.
> Why did Calliope live so long a maid?
> Because she had no dowry to be paid.

Ever since all their followers are poor, forsaken, and left unto themselves. In so much, that as Petronius argues, you shall likely know them by their clothes. "There came," saith he, "by chance into my company, a fellow not very spruce to look on, that I could perceive by that note alone he was a scholar, whom commonly rich men hate: I asked him what he was, he answered; a poet; I demanded again why he was so ragged, he told me this kind of learning never made any man rich."

> Qui Pelago credit, magno se fœnore tollit,
> Qui pugnas & rostra petit, præcingitur auro:
> Vilis adulator picto jacet ebrius ostro,
> Sola pruinosis horret facundia pannis.
> A merchant's gain is great that goes to sea,
>   A soldier embossed all in gold:
> A flatterer lies fox'd in brave array,
>   A scholar only ragged to behold.

All which our ordinary students, right well perceiving in the universities how unprofitable these poetical, mathematical, and philosophical studies are, how little respected, how few patrons; apply themselves in all haste to those three commodious professions of law, physic, and divinity, sharing themselves between them, rejecting these arts in the meantime, history, philosophy, philology, or lightly passing them over, as pleasant toys, fitting only table talk, and to furnish them with discourse. They are not so behoveful: he that can tell his money hath arithmetic enough: He is a true geometrician, can measure out a good fortune to himself; A perfect astrologer, that can cast the rise and fall of others, and mark their errant motions to his own use. The best optics are, to reflect the beams of some great men's favour and grace to shine upon him. He is a good engineer that alone can make an instrument to get preferment. This was the common tenet and practise of Poland, as Cromerus observed not long since, in the first book of his history, their universities were generally base, not a philosopher, a mathematician, an antiquary, &c. to be found of any note amongst them, because they had no set reward or stipend, but every man betook himself to divinity, hoc solum in votis habens, optimum sacerdotium, a good parsonage was their aim. This was the practise of some of our near neighbors, as Lipsius inveighs, "they thrust their children to the study of law and divinity, before they be informed aright, or capable of such studies." Scilicet omnibus artibus antistat spes lucri, & formosior est cumulus auri, quam quicquid Græci Latinique delirantes scripserunt. Ex hoc numero deinde veniunt ad gubernacula reipub. intersunt & præsunt consiliis regum o pater o patria! [in fact the hope of gain stands before all the arts, and a load of gold is more beautiful than all that Greek and Latin fools have written. Such monied men come to govern the helm of state, and are present and prominent at kings' councils. O my father! O my country!] so he [Ennius] complained, and so may others. For even so we find, to serve a great man, to get an office in some Bishop's court (to practise in some good town) or compass a benefice, is the mark we shoot at, as being so advantageous, the highway to preferment.

Although many times, for ought I can see, these men fail as often as the rest in their projects, and are as usually frustrate of their hopes. For let him be a doctor of the law, an excellent civilian of good worth, where shall he practise and expatiate? Their fields are so scant, the civil law with us so contracted with prohibitions, so few causes, by reason of those all devouring municipal laws, quibus nihil illiteratius, saith Erasmus, an illiterate and a barbarous study (for though they be never so well learned in it, I can hardly vouchsafe them the name of scholars, except they be otherwise qualified), and so few courts are left to that profession, such slender offices, and those commonly to be compassed at such dear rates, that I know not how an ingenuous man should thrive amongst them.[1] Now for physicians, there are in every village so many mountebanks, empirics, quacksalvers, Paracelsians,[2] as they call themselves, Causifici & sanicidæ [pretenders and killers of persons in good health], so Clenard terms them, wizards, alchemists, poor vicars, cast apothecaries, physicians' men, barbers, and goodwives, professing great skill, that I make great doubt how they shall be maintained, or who shall be their patients. Besides, there are so many of both sorts, and some of them such harpies, so covetous, so clamorous, so impudent; and as he said, litigious idiots,

Quibus loquacis affatim arrogantiæ est,
Peritiæ parùm aut nihil,
Nec ulla mica literariis salis,
Crumeni-mulga natio:
Loquuteleia turba, litium strophæ,
Maligna litigantium cohors, togati vultures,
Livernæ alumni, Agyrtæ, &c.
Which have no skill but prating arrogance,
No learning, such a purse-milking nation:
Gown'd vultures, thieves, and a litigious rout
Of cozeners, that haunt this occupation,

that they cannot well tell how to live one by another, but as he jested in the comedy of clocks,[3] they were so many, major pars populi aridâ reptant fame: they are almost starved a great part of them, and ready to devour their fellows, et noxiâ calliditate se corripere; such a multitude of pettifoggers and empirics; such impostors, that an honest man knows not in what sort to compose and behave himself in their society, to carry himself with credit in so vile a rout, scientiæ nomen, tot sumptibus partum & vigiliis profiteri dispudeat, postquam &c.

Last of all to come to our divines, the most noble profession and worthy of double honour, but of all others the most distressed and miserable. If you will not believe me, hear a brief of it, as it was not many years since, publicly preached at Paul's Cross, by a grave Minister then, and now a reverend Bishop of this land.[4] "We that are bred up in learning, and destinated by our parents to this end, we suffer our childhood in the Grammar school, which Austin calls magnam tyrannidem, & grave malum, and compares it to the torments of martyrdom, when we come to the university, if we live of the college allowance, as Phalaris objected to the Leontines πάντῶν ἐνδεεῖς πλὴν λιμοῦ καὶ φόϐου, needy of all things but hunger and fear; or if we be maintained but partly by our parent's cost, do expend in unnecessary maintenance, books and degrees, before we come to any perfection, five hundred pounds, or a thousand marks.[1] If by this price of the expense of time, our bodies and spirits, our substance and patrimonies, we cannot purchase those small rewards, which are ours by law, and the right of inheritance, a poor parsonage, or a vicarage of fifty [pounds] per annum but we must pay to the patron for the lease of a life (a spent and outworn life) either in annual pension, or above the rate of a copy hold, and that with the hazard and loss of our souls, by simony and perjury, and the forfeiture of all our spiritual preferments, in esse and posse, both present and to come.[2] What father after awhile will be so improvident, to bring up his son to his great charge, to this necessary beggary? What Christian will be so irreligious, to bring up his son in that course of life, which by all probability and necessity, cogit ad turpia, enforcing to sin, will entangle him in simony and perjury, when as the poet saith, Invitatus ad hæc aliquis de ponte negabit: a beggar's brat taken from the bridge where he sits a begging, if he knew the inconvenience, had cause to refuse it." This being thus, have not we fished fair all this while, that are initiate divines, to find no better fruits of our labours, hoc est cur palles, cur quis non prandeat hoc est? do we macerate ourselves for this? Is it for this we rise so early all the year long? "Leaping" (as he saith) "out of our beds, when we hear the bell ring, as if we had heard a thunder clap." If this be all the respect, reward and honour we shall have, frange leves calamos, & scinde Thalia libellos: let us give over our books, and betake ourselves to some other course of life. To what end should we study? Quid me litterulas stulti docuere parentes, what did our parents mean to make us scholars, to be as far to seek of preferment after twenty years study, as we were at first: why do we take such pains? Quid tantum insanis juvat impallescere chartis? If there be no more hope of reward, no better encouragement. I say again; Frange leves calamos, & scinde Thalia libellos; let's turn soldiers, sell our books, and buy swords, guns, and pikes, or stop bottles with them, turn our philosophers' gowns, as Cleanthes once did into millers' coats, leave all, and rather betake ourselves to any other course of life, than to continue longer in this misery. Præstat dentiscalpia radere, quàm literariis monumentis magnatum favorem emendicare [it would be better to make toothpicks, than by literary labours to try and get the favour of the great].

[1] ingenuous probably ingenious, that is, talented or clever; but possibly also ingenuous in the sense of noble or high-minded (OED ingenuous a 2, 6).

[2] Paracelsians followers of the Swiss physician, chemist, natural philosopher, and mage Paracelsus (ca. 1493–1541).

[4] John Howson, bishop of Oxford (1619–28) and Durham (1628–32).

Yea, but me thinks I hear some man except at these words, that though this be true which I have said of the estate of scholars, and especially of divines, that it is miserable and distressed at this time, that the church suffers shipwreck of her goods, and that they have just cause to complain; there is a fault, but whence proceeds it? If the cause were justly examined, it would be retorted upon ourselves, if we were cited at that tribunal of truth, we should be found guilty, and not able to excuse it. That there is a fault among us, I confess, and were there not a buyer, there would not be a seller: but to him that will consider better of it, it will more than manifestly appear, that the fountain of these miseries proceeds from these griping patrons. In accusing them, I do not altogether excuse us; both are faulty, they and we: yet in my judgement, theirs is the greater fault, more apparent causes, and much to be condemned. For my part, if it be not with me as I would, or as it should, I do ascribe the cause, as Cardan did in the like case; meo infortunio potiùs quam illorum sceleri, to mine own infelicity, rather than their naughtiness: Although I have been baffled in my time by some of them, and have as just cause to complain as another: or rather indeed to mine own negligence; for I was ever like that Alexander in Plutarch, Crassus his tutor in philosophy,[1] who though he lived many years familiarly with rich Crassus, was even as poor when from[2] (which many wondered at), as when he came first to him; he never asked, the other never gave him anything; when he travelled with Crassus he borrowed an hat of him, at his return restored it again; I have had some such noble friends' acquaintance and scholars, but most part (common courtesies and ordinary respects excepted), they and I parted as we met; they gave me as much as I requested, and that was— .[3] And as Alexander ab Alexandro Genial. Dier. lib. 6 cap. 16 made answer to Hieronimus Massainus, that wondered, quum plures ignavos & ignobiles ad dignitates & sacerdotia promotos quotidiè videret, when other men rose, still he was in the same state, eodem tenore & fortunâ cui mercedem laborum studiorumque deberi putaret, whom he thought to deserve as well as the rest. He made answer that he was content with his present estate, was not ambitious, and although objurgabundus suam segnitiem accusaret, cum obscuræ sortis homines ad sacerdotia & pontificatus evectos &c. he chid him for his backwardness, yet he was still the same, and for my part (though I be not worthy perhaps to carry Alexander's books) yet by some overweening and well-wishing friends, the like speeches have been used to me, but I replied still with Alexander that I had enough, and more peradventure than I deserved; and with Libanius Sophista that rather chose (when honours and offices by the Emperor were offered unto him) to be talis Sophista, quam talis magistratus, I had as lief be still Democritus Junior, and privus privatus, si mihi jam daretur optio, quam talis fortasse Doctor, talis Dominus.—Sed quorsum hæc? [And a private person, if I had the choice now, than a Doctor of Divinity or Lord Bishop. But to what purpose do I say all this?] For the rest, 'tis on both sides facinus detestandum [an abominable deed], to buy and sell livings,[4] to detain from the Church, that which God's and men's laws have bestowed on it;[5] but in them most, and that from the covetousness and ignorance of such as are interested in this business; I name covetousness in the first place, as the root of all these mischiefs, which Achan like,[6] compels them to commit sacrilege, and to make simoniacal compacts (and what not), to their own ends, that kindles God's wrath, brings a plague, vengeance, and an heavy visitation upon themselves and others. Some out of that insatiable desire of filthy lucre, to be enriched, care not how they come by it, per fas & nefas, hook or crook, so they have it. And others when they have with riot and prodigality, embezzled their estates, to recover themselves, make a prey of the Church, robbing it, as Julian the Apostate did,[7] spoil parsons of their revenues (in "keeping half back," as a great man amongst us observes, "and that maintenance on which they should live"[8]): by means whereof, barbarism is increased, and a great decay of Christian professors, for who will apply himself to these divine studies, his son, or friend, when after great pains taken, they shall have nothing whereupon to live? But with what event do they these things?

[1] marks monetary units used to keep track of accounts; one mark was equivalent to about two-thirds of a pound.

[2] copy hold a kind of land tenure in which tenants paid rent on manor lands according to manorial custom and the will of the lord of the manor (OED copyhold 2, copy sb 5b); simony the buying and selling of ecclesiastical privileges, in this case, of benefices (OED).

[1] that is, like that Alexander who was tutor to Crassus in philosophy.

[2] that is, was even as poor when he left Crassus.

[3] I had no money, I wanted impudence, I could not scamble, temporize, dissemble [Burton's note].

[4] livings A living was a position as church officer (vicar or rector usually) with income or property or both.

[5] As a result of the Reformation, many livings were "impropriate": tithes or other income that belonged to the living went to the lay patron who had bought or inherited the right; the patron then passed on only a percentage of that income to the incumbent.

[7] Julian the Apostate (Roman Emperor 361–363 C.E.) instituted a vigorous anti-Christian policy as part of his efforts to re-establish pagan worship.

[8] a great man Sir Edward Coke (1552–1634), the most prominent legal expert of the era.

Opesque totis viribus venamini,
At inde messis accidit miserrima.
[You pursue wealth with all your might,
but the result is miserable]

They toil and moil, but what reap they? They are commonly unfortunate families that use it, accursed in their progeny, and as common experience evinceth, accursed themselves in all their proceedings. "With what face" (as he [Sir Henry Spelman] quotes out of Austin) "can they expect a blessing or inheritance from Christ in Heaven, that defraud Christ of his inheritance here on earth?" I would all our simoniacal patrons, and such as detain tithes, would read those judicious tracts of Sir Henry Spelman, and Sir James Sempill Knights; those late elaborate and learned treatises of Dr Tilslye, and Mr Montague, which they have written of that subject.[1] But though they should read, it would be to small purpose, clames licet & mare cœlo Confundas; thunder, lighten, preach hell and damnation, tell them 'tis a sin, they will not believe it; denounce and terrify, they have "cauterized consciences," they do not attend, as the enchanted adder, they stop their ears. Call them base, irreligious, profane, barbarous, pagans, atheists, epicures (as some of them surely are), with the bawd in Plautus, Euge, optimè, they cry and applaud themselves, with that miser, simulac nummos contemplor in arcâ: say what you will, quocunque modo rem: as a dog barks at the moon, to no purpose are your sayings: Take you Heaven, let them have money. A base, profane, epicurean, hypocritical rout; for my part, let them pretend what zeal they will, counterfeit religion, blear the world's eyes, bombast themselves, and stuff out their greatness with Church spoils, shine like so many peacocks; so cold is my charity, so defective in this behalf, that I shall never think better of them, than that they are rotten at core, their bones are full of epicurean hypocrisy, and atheistical marrow, that they are worse than heathens. For as Dionysius Halicarnasseus observes antiq. Rom. lib. 7 Primum locum &c "Greeks and barbarians observe all religious rites, and dare not break them for fear of offending their Gods"; but our simoniacal contractors, our senseless Achans, our stupefied patrons, fear neither God nor devil, they have evasions for it, it is no sin, or not due jure divino [by divine right], or if a sin, no great sin, &c. And though they be daily punished for it, and they do manifestly perceive, that as he said, frost and fraud come to foul ends; yet as Chrysostome follows it, Nulla ex pœnâ sit correctio, & quasi adversis malitia hominum provocetur, crescit quotidiè quod puniatur: they are rather worse than better,—iram atque animos à crimine sumunt, and the more they are corrected, the more they offend: but let them take their course, Rode caper vites [gnaw, goat, the vines], go on still as they begin, 'tis no sin, let them rejoice secure, God's vengeance will overtake them in the end, and these ill gotten goods as an eagle's feathers, will consume the rest of their substance: It is aurum Tholosanum [the gold of Toulouse],[2] and will produce no better effects. "Let them lay it up safe, and make their conveyances never so close, lock and shut door," saith Chrysostome, "yet fraud and covetousness, two most violent thieves, are still included, and a little gain evil gotten, will subvert the rest of their goods." The eagle in Aesop, seeing a piece of flesh, now ready to be sacrificed, swept it away with her claws, and carried it to her nest; but there was a burning coal stuck to it by chance, which unawares consumed her, young ones, nest and all together. Let our simoniacal church-chopping patrons, and sacrilegious harpies, look for no better success.

[2] Referring to the pillaging of a temple in Toulouse by the commander of a Roman force in 106 B.C.E.; the phrase was proverbial for ill-gotten gains.

A second cause is ignorance, and from thence contempt, successit odium in literas ab ignorantiâ vulgi; which [Franciscus] Junius well perceived: this hatred and contempt of learning, proceeds out of ignorance, as they are themselves barbarous, idiots, dull, illiterate, and proud, so they esteem of others.

Sint Mecænates, non deerunt Flacce Marones:

Let there be bountiful patrons; and there will be painful scholars in all sciences. But when they contemn learning, and think themselves sufficiently qualified, if they can write and read, scamble at a piece of evidence,[1] or have so much Latin as that Emperor [Frederick Barbarossa] had, qui nescit dissimulare, nescit vivere [he that cannot dissemble, cannot live], they are unfit to do their country service, to perform or undertake any action or employment, which may tend to the good of a Commonwealth, except it be to fight, or to do country justice, with common sense, which every yeoman can likewise do. And so they bring up their children, rude as they are themselves, unqualified, untaught, uncivil most part. Quis è nostrâ juventute legitimè instituitur literis? Quis oratores aut Philosophos tangit? quis historiam legit, illam rerum agendarum quasi animam? præcipitant parentes vota sua, &c. [which of our youths is sufficiently instructed in letters? Who handles the orators or philosophers? Who reads history, the soul as it were of actions? Parents are in too great a hurry for their own views] 'twas Lipsius' complaint to his illiterate countrymen, it may be ours. Now shall these men judge of a scholar's worth, that have no worth, that know not what belongs to a student's labours, that cannot distinguish between a true scholar, and a drone? or him that by reason of a voluble tongue, a strong voice, a pleasing tone, and some trivantly polyanthean helps,[2] steals and gleans a few notes from other men's harvests, and so makes a fair show, and him that is truly learned indeed: that thinks it no more to preach, than to speak, "or to run away with an empty cart"; as a grave man [Dr John King] said; and thereupon vilify us, and our pains; scorn us, and all learning. Because they are rich, and have other means to live, they think it concerns them not to know, or to trouble themselves with it; a fitter task for younger brothers, or poor men's sons, to be pen and inkhorn men, pedantical slaves, and no whit beseeming the calling of a gentleman, as Frenchmen and Germans commonly do, neglect therefore all humane learning, what have they to do with it? Let mariners learn astronomy; merchant's factors study arithmetic; surveyors get them geometry; spectacle-makers optics; land-leapers geography;[3] town clerks rhetoric; what should he do with a spade, that hath no ground to dig; or they with learning, that have no use of it? Thus they reason, and are not ashamed to let mariners, prentices, and the basest servants be better qualified than themselves. In former times, Kings, Princes, and Emperors were the only scholars, excellent in all faculties. Julius Caesar mended the year, and writ his own commentaries,

—— media inter prælia semper,
Stellarum cœlique plagis, superisque vacavit.
[And, though for ever fighting, yet found time
To study the heavenly bodies.]

Antoninus, Adrian, Nero, Severus, Julian, &c. Michael the Emperor, and Isacius, were so much given to their studies, that no base fellow would take so much pains: Orion, Perseus, Alphonsus, Ptolomeus, famous astronomers: Sabor, Mithridates, Lysimachus, admired physicians: Plato's kings all: Evax that Arabian Prince, a most expert jeweller, and an exquisite philosopher; the kings of Egypt were priests of old, and chosen from thence,—Idem rex hominum, Phœbique sacerdos: but those heroical times are past; the Muses are now banished in this bastard age, ad sordida tuguriola, to meaner persons and confined alone almost to universities. In those days, scholars were highly beloved, honoured, esteemed; as old Ennius by Scipio Africanus, Virgil by Augustus; Horace by Mecænas: Princes' companions; dear to them as Anacreon to Polycrates; Philoxenus to Dionysius, and highly rewarded. Alexander sent Xenocrates the philosopher fifty talents, because he was poor, visu rerum aut eruditione præstantes viri, mensis olim regum adhibiti, as Philostratus relates of Adrian and Lampridius of Alexander Severus, famous clerks came to these Princes' courts,[1] velut in Lycæum, as to an university, and were admitted to their tables, quasi divûm epulis accumbentes; Archelaus that Macedonian King would not willingly sup without Euripides (amongst the rest he drank to him at supper one night and gave him a cup of gold for his pains), delectatus poetæ suavi sermone [being delighted with the agreeable conversation of the poet], and it was fit it should be so: Because as Plato in his Protagoras well saith, a good philosopher as much excels other men, as a great king doth the commons of his country; and again, quoniam illis nihil deest, & minimè egere solent, & disciplinas quas profitentur, soli à contemptu vindicare possunt, they needed not to beg so basely, as they compel scholars in our times to complain of poverty, or crouch to a rich chuff for a meal's meat,[2] but could vindicate themselves, and those arts which they professed. Now they would, and cannot: for it is held by some of them, as an axiom, that to keep them poor, will make them study; they must be dieted, as horses to a race, not pampered, Alendos volunt, non saginandos, ne melioris mentis flammula extinguatur; a fat bird will not sing, a fat dog cannot hunt; and so by this depression of theirs, some want means, others will, all want encouragement, as being forsaken almost: and generally contemned. 'Tis an old saying Sint Mæcenates non deerunt Flacce Marones [let there be Maecenases, Flaccus, and Virgils will not be wanting] and 'tis a true saying still.[3] Yet oftentimes I may not deny it the main fault is in ourselves. Our academics too frequently offend in neglecting patrons, as Erasmus well taxeth, or making ill choice of them negligimus oblatos aut amplectimur parum aptos, or if we get a good one, non studemus mutuis officiis favorem ejus alere, we do not ply and follow him as we should. Idem mihi accidit Adolescenti [the same happened to myself when I was a young man] (saith Erasmus) acknowledging his fault, & gravissimè peccavi, and so may I say myself, I have offended in this,[4] and so peradventure have many others. We did not spondere magnatum favoribus, qui ceperunt nos amplecti, apply ourselves with that readiness we should, idleness, love of liberty, immodicus amor libertatis effecit ut diù cum perfidis amicis, as he confesseth, & pertinaci paupertate colluctarer, bashfulness, melancholy, timorousness cause many of us to be too backward and remiss. So some offend in one extreme, but too many on the other, we are most part too forward, too solicitous, too ambitious; too impudent; we commonly complain deesse Mæcenates [that Maecenases are wanting], want of encouragement, want of means, when as the true defect is in our own want of worth, our insufficiency, did Mæcenas take notice of Horace or Virgil till they had showed themselves first, or had Bavius and Mevius any patrons? Egregium specimen dent, saith Erasmus, let them approve themselves worthy first, sufficiently qualified for learning and manners, before they presume or impudently intrude and put themselves on great men as too many do, with such base flattery, parasitical colloguing, such hyperbolical elogies they do usually insinuate,[1] that it is a shame to hear and see. Immodicæ laudes conciliant invidiam, potius quam laudem [immoderate panegyric raises envy rather than praise], and vain commendations derogate from truth, and we think in conclusion, non melius de laudato, pejus de laudante, ill of both, the commender and commended. So we offend, but the main fault is in their harshness, defect of patrons. How beloved of old, and how much respected was Plato to Dionysius? How dear to Alexander was Aristotle, Demeratus to Philip, Solon to Cræsus, Anaxarchus and Trebatius to Augustus, Cassius to Vespatian, Plutarch to Trajan? Seneca to Nero? Simonides to Hieron? how honoured?

as he [Juvenal] said of old, we may truly say now, he [King James I] is our amulet, our sun, our sole comfort and refuge, our Ptolemy, our common Mæcenas, Jacobus munificus, Jacobus pacificus, mysta Musarum, Rex Platonicus: Grande decus, columenque nostrum [James the munificent, James the peace-loving, the priest of the muses, the platonic king]. A famous scholar himself, and the sole patron, pillar, and sustainer of learning: but his worth in this kind is so well known, that as Paterculus of Cato, Jam ipsum laudare nefas sit [it would be monstrous to praise him]: and which Pliny to Trajan. Seria te carmina, honorque æternus annalium, non hæc brevis & pudenda prædicatio colet [thus serious poetry and the everlasting glory of our historic past pay you tribute in place of a moment's disgraceful publicity]. But he is now gone, the sun of ours set, and yet no night follows, and long may he [King Charles I] reign and flourish amongst us.

Let me not be malicious, and lie against my genius; I may not deny, but that we have a sprinkling of our gentry, here and there one, excellently well learned, like those Fuggeri in Germany, Du Bartas, Du Plessis, Sadael in France, Picus Mirandula, Schottus, Barotius in Italy;

> Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto.

But they are but few in respect of the multitude, the major part (and some again excepted, that are indifferent) are wholly bent for hawks and hounds, and carried away many times with intemperate lust, gaming, and drinking. If they read a book at any time (si quid est interim otii à venatu, poculis, aleâ, scortis [if they have any leisure from hunting, drinking, dicing, drabbing]) 'tis an English chronicle, Sir Huon of Burdeaux, Amadis de Gaule, &c. a play-book, or some pamphlet of news, and that at such seasons only, when they cannot stir abroad, to drive away time, their sole discourse is dogs, hawks, horses, and what news? If someone have been a traveller in Italy, or as far as the Emperor's court, wintered in Orleans, and can court his mistress in broken French, wear his clothes neatly in the newest fashion, sing some choice outlandish tunes, discourse of lords, ladies, towns, palaces, and cities, he is complete and to be admired: Otherwise he and they are much at one; no difference betwixt the master and the man, but worshipful titles: wink and choose betwixt him that sits down (clothes excepted) and him that holds the trencher behind him: yet these men must be our patrons, our governors too sometimes, statesmen, magistrates, noble, great, and wise by inheritance.

Mistake me not (I say again) Vos ô Patritius sanguis, you that are worthy Senators, Gentlemen, I honour your names and persons, and with all submissiveness, prostrate myself to your censure and service. There are amongst you, I do ingeniously confess, many well deserving patrons, and true patriots, of my knowledge, besides many hundreds which I never saw, no doubt, or heard of, pillars of our commonwealth, whose worth, bounty, learning, forwardness, true zeal in religion, and good esteem of all scholars, ought to be consecrated to all posterity: but of your rank there are a debauched, corrupt, covetous, illiterate crew again, no better than stocks,[1] merum pecus (testor Deum, non mihi videri dignos ingenui hominis appellatione) [mere cattle (I call God to witness, that they do not seem to me to deserve the name of free men)], barbarous Thracians, & quis ille Thrax qui hoc neget? [and what Thracian would deny this?], a sordid, profane, pernicious company, irreligious, impudent and stupid, I know not what epithets to give them, enemies to learning, confounders of the Church, and the ruin of a commonwealth: Patrons they are by right of inheritance, and put in trust freely to dispose of such livings to the Church's good; but (hard task-masters they prove) they take away their straw, and compel them to make their number of brick: they commonly respect their own ends, commodity is the steer of all their actions, and him they present in conclusion, as a man of greatest gifts, that will give most; no penny, no Pater noster,[2] as the saying is: Nisi preces auro fulcias ampliùs irritas: ut Cerberus offa, their attendants and officers must be bribed, fed and made, as Cerberus is with a sop by him that goes to hell. It was an old saying, Omnia Romæ venalia [all things are for sale at Rome], 'tis a rag of popery, which will never be rooted out, there is no hope, no good to be done without money. A clerk may offer himself, approve his worth, learning, honesty, religion, zeal, they will commend him for it; but—probitas laudatur & alget [virtue is commended, but not rewarded]. If he be a man of extraordinary parts, they will flock a far off to hear him, as they did in Apuleius, to see Psyche: multi mortales confluebant ad videndum sæculi decus, speculum gloriosum: laudatur ab omnibus, spectatur ab omnibus, nec quisquam non rex, non regius, cupidus ejus nuptiarum petitor accedit, mirantur quidem divinam formam omnes, sed ut simulacrum fabrè politum mirantur; many mortal men came to see fair Psyche the glory of her age, they did admire her, commend, desire her for her divine beauty, and gaze upon her; but as on a picture; none would marry her, quòd indotata [because without dowry], fair Psyche had no money. So they do by learning;

He shall have all the good words that may be given, a proper man, and 'tis pity he hath no preferment, all good wishes, but inexorable, indurate as he is, he will not prefer him, though it be in his power, because he is indotatus, he hath no money. Or if he do give him entertainment, let him be never so well qualified, plead affinity, consanguinity, sufficiency, he shall serve 7 years, as Jacob did for Rachel,[1] before he shall have it. If he will enter at first, he must get in at that simoniacal gate, come off soundly, and put in good security to perform all covenants, else he will not deal with, or admit him. But if some poor scholar, some parson chuff will offer himself; some trencher chaplain, that will take it to the halves, thirds, or accept of what he will give, he is welcome, be conformable, preach as he will have him, he likes him before a million of others; for the best is always best cheap: and then as Hierom said to Cromatius, patellâ dignum operculum [a worthy cover is added to the pan], such a patron, such a clerk; the cure is well supplied, and all parties pleased. So that is still verified in our age, which Chrysostome complained of in his time, Qui opulentiores sunt in ordinem parasitorum cogunt eos, & ipsos tanquam canes ad mensas suas enutriunt, eorumque impudentes Ventres iniquarum cœnarum reliquiis differtiunt, iisdem pro arbitrio abutentes: Rich men keep these lecturers, and fawning parasites, like so many dogs at their tables, and filling their hungry guts with the offals of their meat, they abuse them at their pleasure, and make them say what they propose. "As children do by a bird or a butterfly in a string, pull in and let him out as they list, do they by their trencher chaplains, prescribe, command their wits, let in and out as to them it seems best." If the patron be precise, so must his chaplain be; if he be papistical, his clerk must be so too, or else be turned out. These are those clerks which serve the turn, whom they commonly entertain, and present to church livings, whilst in the meantime we that are university men, like so many hide-bound calves in a pasture, tarry out our time, wither away as a flower ungathered in a garden, and are never used: or as so many candles, illuminate ourselves alone, obscuring one another's light, and are not discerned here at all; the least of which, translated to a dark room, or to some country benefice, where it might shine apart, would give a fair light, and be seen over all. Whilst we lie waiting here as those sick men did at the pool of Bethesda,[2] till the Angel stirred the water, expecting a good hour, they step between, and beguile us of our preferment. I have not yet said, if after long expectation, much expense, travel, earnest suit of ourselves and friends, we obtain a small benefice at last: our misery begins afresh, we are suddenly encountered with the flesh, world, and devil, with a new onset, we change a quiet life for an ocean of troubles, we come to a ruinous house, which before it be habitable, must be necessarily to our great damage repaired, we are compelled to sue for dilapidations,[3] or else sued ourselves, and scarce yet settled, we are called upon for our predecessor's arrearages; first fruits, tenths, subsidies, are instantly to be paid, benevolence, procurations, &c. and which is most to be feared, we light upon a cracked title, as it befell Clenard of Brabant, for his rectory and charge of his [the town of] Beginæ, he was no sooner inducted, but instantly sued, cepimusque (saith he) strenuè litigare, & implacabili bello confligere: at length after ten years suit, as long as Troy's siege, when he had tired himself, and spent his money, he was fain to leave all for quietness sake, and give it up to his adversary. Or else we are insulted over, and trampled on by domineering officers, fleeced by those greedy harpies to get more fees, we stand in fear of some precedent lapse; we fall amongst refractory, seditious sectaries, peevish puritans, perverse papists, a lascivious rout of atheistical epicures, that will not be reformed, or some litigious people ("those wild beasts of Ephesus," must be fought with), that will not pay their dues without much repining, or compelled by long suit; for Laici clericis oppido infesti [the laity hate the clergy], an old axiom, all they think well gotten that is had from the Church, and by such uncivil, harsh dealings, they make their poor minister weary of his place, if not his life: and put case they be quiet, honest men, make the best of it, as often it falls out, from a polite and terse academic, he must turn rustic, rude, melancholize alone, learn to forget, or else, as many do become maltsters, graziers, chapmen, &c. (now banished from the academy, all commerce of the Muses, and confined to a country village, as Ovid was from Rome to Pontus), and daily converse with a company of idiots and clowns.

The Overburian Character

A poet and courtier educated at Queen's College, Oxford and the Middle Temple, Sir Thomas Overbury (1581–1613) is best known in political history for being the victim of the most infamous scandal of the Jacobean court. His patron was the royal favourite Robert Carr (later Earl of Somerset); Overbury encouraged an intrigue between Carr and Frances Howard, the Countess of Essex, but opposed the marriage projected between the two after the Countess won a controversial divorce. On the pretext of his refusal of a diplomatic post, Overbury was imprisoned in the Tower and slowly poisoned to death by agents employed by Lady Essex. When the plot was discovered, four agents were hanged, and Carr and Lady Essex were both convicted of murder (Francis Bacon was the prosecutor) but pardoned.

The literary "characters" associated with Overbury first appeared in the second edition of Overbury's posthumously published poem "A Wife" (1614), where they are described as by Overbury and "other learned Gentlemen his friends." A year later, more than forty characters were added to this initial collection of twenty-two; by 1622 the collection totalled more than eighty. While not the first set of characters in English (the genre was introduced by Joseph Hall), the "Overburian" character inspired a succession of imitators through much of the seventeenth century. Depicting a social type with his or her habits, manners, and affectations, the Overburian character initiated the witty, playful, "conceited" language that became the hallmark of the genre. The authorship of individual characters is difficult to determine: they would have circulated in anonymous manuscript as a kind of literary parlour game. Of the selections below, "A Good Woman" is very likely by Overbury himself; "A Fair and Happy Milkmaid" and "A Waterman" are probably by the dramatist John Webster; and "A Prisoner" (part of a series of six characters dealing with the life of a debtor) is likely the work of dramatist and pamphleteer Thomas Dekker. For other examples of character-writing, see works by John Earle, Nicholas Breton, Owen Felltham, and Samuel Butler.

A Good Woman

A good woman is a comfort, like a man. She lacks of him nothing but heat. Thence is her sweetness of disposition, which meets his stoutness more pleasingly; so wool meets iron easier than iron, and turns resisting into embracing. Her greatest learning is religion, and her thoughts are on her own sex, or on men, without casting the difference. Dishonesty never comes nearer than her ears, and then wonder stops it out, and saves virtue the labour. She leaves the neat youth telling his luscious tales, and puts back the serving-man's putting forward with a frown: yet her kindness is free enough to be seen, for it hath no guilt about it; and her mirth is clear, that you may look through it into virtue, but not beyond. She hath not behaviour at a certain, but makes it to her occasion.[1] She hath so much knowledge as to love it; and if she have it not at home, she will fetch it, for this sometimes in a pleasant discontent she dares chide her sex, though she use it never the worse. She is much within, and frames outward things to her mind, not her mind to them. She wears good clothes, but never better; for she finds no degree beyond decency. She hath a content of her own, and so seeks not an husband, but finds him. She is indeed most, but not much of description, for she is direct and one, and hath not the

---

[1] She has not learned the behaviour appropriate to a situation by rote from a book of manners, but relies on natural discretion.

variety of ill. Now she is given fresh and alive to a husband, and she doth nothing more than love him, for she takes him to that purpose. So his good becomes the business of her actions, and she doth herself kindness upon him. After his, her chiefest virtue is a good husband, for she is he.

A Fair and Happy Milkmaid

Is a country wench, that is so far from making herself beautiful by art, that one look of hers is able to put all face-physic out of countenance.[1] She knows a fair look is but a dumb orator to commend virtue, therefore minds it not. All her excellences stand in her so silently, as if they had stolen upon her without her knowledge. The lining of her apparel (which is herself) is far better than outsides of tissue; for though she be not arrayed in the spoil of the silk-worm, she is decked in innocency, a far better wearing. She doth not, with lying long a-bed, spoil both her complexion and conditions; Nature hath taught her too immoderate sleep is rust to the soul; she rises therefore with chanticleer, her dame's cock, and at night makes lamb her curfew. In milking a cow and straining the teats through her fingers, it seems that so sweet a milk-press makes the milk the whiter or sweeter; for never came almond glove or aromatic ointment off her palm to taint it.[2] The golden ears of corn fall and kiss her feet when she reaps them, as if they wished to be bound and led prisoners by the same hand that felled them. Her breath is her own, which scents all the year long of June, like a new made haycock. She makes her hand hard with labour, and her heart soft with pity; and when winter's evenings fall early (sitting at her merry wheel) she sings a defiance to the giddy wheel of fortune. She doth all things with so sweet a grace, it seems ignorance will not suffer her to do ill, because her mind is to do well. She bestows her year's wages at next fair; and, in choosing her garments, counts no bravery in the world like decency. The garden and beehive are all her physic and chirurgery, and she lives the longer for it. She dares go alone and unfold sheep in the night,[3] and fears no manner of ill because she means none; yet, to say truth, she is never alone, for she is still accompanied with old songs, honest thoughts, and prayers, but short ones;[4] yet they have their efficacy, in that they are not palled with ensuing idle cogitations. Lastly, her dreams are so chaste that she dare tell them: only a Friday's dream is all her superstition;[5] that she conceals for fear of anger. Thus lives she, and all her care is that she may die in the springtime, to have store of flowers stuck upon her winding-sheet.

A Waterman[6]

Is one that hath learnt to speak well of himself, for always he names himself "the first man."[7] If he had betaken himself to some richer trade, he could not have choosed but done well; for in this, though a mean one, he is still plying it, and putting himself forward. He is evermore telling strange news, most commonly lies. If he be a sculler, ask him if he be married; he'll equivocate, and swear he's a single man. Little trust is to be given to him, for he thinks that day he does best when he fetches most men over.[1] His daily labour teaches him the art of dissembling, for, like a fellow that rides to the pillory,[2] he goes not that way he looks. He keeps such a bawling at Westminster, that, if the lawyers were not acquainted with it,[3] an order would be taken with him. When he is upon the water he is fair company; when he comes ashore he mutinies, and, contrary to all other trades, is most surly to gentlemen when they tender payment. The playhouses only keep him sober,[4] and as it doth many other gallants, make him an afternoon's man. London Bridge is the most terrible eyesore to him that can be.[5] And, to conclude, nothing but a great press makes him fly from the river, nor anything but a great frost can teach him any good manners.[6]

A Prisoner

Is one that hath been a monied man, and is still a very close fellow;[7] whosoever is of his acquaintance, let them make much of him, for they shall find him as fast a friend as any in England: he is a sure man, and you know where to find him. The corruption of a bankrupt is commonly the generation of this creature. He dwells on the back side of the world, or in the suburbs of society, and lives in a tenement which he is sure none will go about to take over his head. To a man that walks abroad, he is one of the antipodes; that goes on the top of the world, and this under it. At his first coming in, he is a piece of new coin, all sharking old prisoners lie sucking at his purse. An old man and he are much alike, neither of them both go far. They are still angry and peevish, and they sleep little. He was born at the fall of Babel, the confusion of languages is only in his mouth. All the vacations he speaks as good English as any man in England, but in term times he breaks out of that hopping one-legged pace into a racking trot of issues, bills, replications, rejoinders, demures, querelles, subpoenas,[8] etc., able to fright a simple country fellow, and make him believe he conjures. Whatsoever his complexion was before, it turns in this place to choler or deep melancholy, so that he needs every hour to take physic to loose his body; for that, like his estate, is very foul and corrupt, and extremely hard bound. The taking of an execution off his stomach gives him five or six stools, and leaves his body very soluble. The withdrawing of an action is a vomit. He is no sound man, and yet an utter barrister, nay, a sergeant of the case, will feed heartily upon him; he is very good picking meat for a lawyer. The barber-surgeons may, if they will, beg him for an anatomy after he hath suffered an execution. An excellent lecture may be made upon his body; for he is a kind of dead carcase—creditors, lawyers, and jailors devour it: creditors peck out his eyes with his own tears; lawyers flay off his own skin, and lap him in parchment; and jailors are the Promethean vultures that gnaw his very heart.[9] He is a bondslave to the law, and, albeit he were a shopkeeper in London, yet he cannot with safe conscience write himself a freeman. His religion is of five or six colours: this day he prays that God would turn the hearts of his creditors, and tomorrow he curseth the time that ever he saw them. His apparel is daubed commonly with statute lace, the suit itself of durance, and the hose full of long pains.[1] He hath many other lasting suits which he himself is never able to wear out, for they wear out him. The zodiac of his life is like that of the sun, marry not half so glorious. It begins in Aries and ends in Pisces.[2] Both head and feet are, all the year long, in troublesome and laborious motions, and Westminster Hall is his sphere. He lives between the two tropics of Cancer and Capricorn, and by that means is in double danger of crabbed creditors for his purse, and horns for his head, if his wife's heels be light. If he be a gentleman, he alters his arms so soon as he comes in. Few here carry fields or argent, but whatsoever they bear before, here they give only sables.[3] Whiles he lies by it, he is travelling over the Alps, and the hearts of his creditors are the snows that lie unmelted in the middle of summer. He is an almanac out of date; none of his days speak of fair weather. Of all the files of men, he marcheth in the last, and comes limping, for he is shot, and is no man of this world. He hath lost his way, and being benighted, strayed into a wood full of wolves, and nothing so hard as to get away without being devoured. He that walks from six to six in Paul's goes still but a quoit's cast before this man.[4]

[4] Most playhouses were in Southwark, across the Thames; the implication is that the business they provided kept him busy in the afternoons (performances began at about two o'clock) and out of the pubs.

[5] The narrow passages between the arches of London Bridge created a potentially dangerous rapid; to pass through, watermen had to ship oars and "shoot the bridge."

[1] Three puns play on the legal resonances of terms from fashion: Statute lace refers to the quality or quantity of lace prescribed by an Act of Apparel (frequently passed in the period); durance was a durable cloth but also imprisonment (OED durance 3, 5); hose of long pains were breeches with small panes or squares of silk or velvet.

[2] Aries was associated with the head, Pisces with the feet.

[3] Playing on terms from heraldry: field was the surface of a heraldic shield, argent the silver or white colour of the devices on it, sable the black. The prisoner of course lacks access to open spaces or money, and lives in the dark.

[4] St. Paul's churchyard, the information hub of London, was a popular place to meet and discuss business or news; the implication is that the possibility of imprisonment followed close on the heels of all.

Richard Corbett

1582 – 1635

Corbett was the only son of Vincent Corbett, a nurseryman of Ewell, Surrey. He was educated at Westminster School and then at Broadgates Hall, which later became Pembroke College, Oxford. He received his B.A. in 1602, his M.A. in 1605, and then took holy orders. In 1612, as Junior Proctor of the university, Corbett gave a funeral oration on the death of Prince Henry. After Corbett had served for some years as the vicar of Cassington, James I made him one of the royal chaplains. In 1617 he was admitted B.D. at Oxford, and in 1620 appointed Dean of Christ Church. In 1621 an embarrassing incident occurred which became a source of much amusement to Corbett's contemporaries. During a sermon before the King at Woodstock, Corbett became preoccupied by a ring that the King had given him and completely forgot his sermon. Corbett was made Bishop of Oxford in 1628 and Bishop of Norwich in 1632. He married Alice Hutton, a vicar's daughter, by whom he had two children. Aubrey's version is that "he married Alice Hutton, whom 'twas said that he begot. She was a very beautiful woman, and so was her mother." Aubrey's life of Corbett, reflecting the wit, humour, conviviality and love of fun we find in the verse, is highly entertaining, though not perhaps edifying. This is perhaps as it should be, since throughout his life Corbett expressed dislike of puritan theology and would not tolerate practices he perceived as puritan. He wrote in a wide variety of genres, including satires, epigrams, epistles, and elegies. His works were first published in 1647.

Upon an Unhandsome Gentlewoman, who made Love unto him

Have I renounc't my faith, or basely sold
Salvation, and my loyalty for gold?
Have I some foreign practice undertook
By poison, shot, sharp-knife, or sharper book
To kill my King? have I betrayed the state
To fire and fury, or some newer fate,
Which learned murderers, those grand destinies,
The Jesuits, have nurs'd? if all of these [1]
I guilty am, proceed; I am content
That Mallet take me for my punishment. [2]
For never sin was of so high a rate,
But one night's hell with her might expiate.
Although the law with Garnet, and the rest, [3]
Dealt far more mildly; hanging's but a jest
To this immortal torture. Had she been then
In Mary's torrid days engend'red, when [4]
Cruelty was witty, and invention free
Did live by blood, and thrive by cruelty,
She would have been more horrid engines far
Then fire or famine, racks, and halters are.
Whether her wit, form, talk, smile, tire I name,
Each is a stock of tyranny, and shame;
But for her breath, spectators come not nigh,
That lays about; God bless the company.
The man, in a bear's skin baited to death,

[1] Jesuits members of the Society of Jesus, a Roman Catholic order. Several Jesuits were suspected of involvement in the Gunpowder Plot of 1605, an unsuccessful attempt to blow up the houses of Parliament and kill James I and his heir.

[2] Mallet Mrs. Mallet, the widow of the servant of the Vice Chancellor, who had apparently made unwelcome amorous approaches to Corbett. Some of the manuscripts of this poem are entitled Mr. Corbett on Mrs Mallet; an ill favoured creature that would need be in love with the Author.

[3] Garnet Henry Garnet (1555–1606), the Superior of the English Jesuits, was implicated in the Gunpowder Plot and executed along with its primary instigators.

[4] Mary During the reign of Mary Tudor (1553–1558), there was intense persecution of Protestants.

Would choose the dogs much rather then her breath;
One kiss of hers, and eighteen words alone
Put down the Spanish Inquisition.
Thrice happy we (quoth I thinking thereon,)
That see no days of persecution;
For were it free to kill, this grisly elf
Would martyrs make in compass of herself;
And were she not prevented by our prayer,
By this time she corrupted had the air.
　And am I innocent? and is it true,
That thing (which poet Pliny never knew,
Nor Africk, Nile, nor ever Hackluyt's eyes [1]
Descried in all his East, West-voyages;
That thing, which poets were afraid to feign,
For fear her shadow should infect their brain;
This spouse of Antichrist, and his alone, [2]
She's dressed so like the Whore of Babylon;) [3]
Should dote on me? as if they did contrive,
The Devil and she, to damn a man alive.
Why doth not Welcome rather purchase her, [4]
And bear about this rare familiar?
Six market days, a wake, and a fair too't,
Would save his charges, and the ale to boot.
No tiger's like her; she feeds upon a man
Worse than a tigress or a leopard can.
　Let me go pray, and think upon some spell,
At once to bid the Devil and her farewell.

A Proper New Ballad Entitled The Fairies Farewell: Or God-a-Mercy Will

Farewell, rewards & Fairies,
　Good housewives now may say;
For now foul sluts in dairies
　Do fare as well as they;
And though they sweep their hearths no less
　Then maids were wont to do,
Yet who of late for cleanliness
　Finds six-pence in her shoe?

Lament, lament, old abbeys,
　The Fairies lost command:
They did but change priests' babies, [5]
　But some have changed your land;
And all your children sprung from thence
　Are now grown puritans: [6]
Who live as changelings ever since
　For love of your demains. [7]

At morning and at evening both
　You merry were and glad,
So little care of sleep or sloth
　These pretty ladies had.
When Tom came home from labour,
　Or Ciss to milking rose,
Then merrily, merrily went their tabor, [8]
　And nimbly went their toes .

[1] Hackluyt Richard Hakluyt (ca. 1522–1616), an English geographer and voluminous writer who promoted overseas expansion.

[2] Antichrist sometimes used to denote the title of a great personal opponent of Christ and his kingdom, expected by the early church to appear before the end of the world (OED antiChrist 2). At other times, used more generally to refer to an enemy of Christ (OED antiChrist 1). See I John 2:18–22.

[3] Whore of Babylon See Revelation 17:1–18:24, especially 17:4.

[4] Welcome J.A.W. Bennett and H.R. Trevor-Roper speculate that this may be the name of an itinerant showman (The Poems of Richard Corbett, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1955).

[5] change priest's babies According to legend, fairies would steal human infants, leaving their own in their place.

[6] puritans English Protestants who regarded the Reformation of Elizabeth I as incomplete and called for further "purification" of the English Church from what they considered to be unscriptural and corrupt forms and ceremonies (OED puritan *sb*1).

[7] demains domains (OED demain(e)).

[8] tabor the earlier name of the drum. In later use, a small drum, used chiefly as accompaniment to the pipe or trumpet (OED tabor sb^{1}).

Witness those rings and roundelays [1]
Of theirs, which yet remain,
Were footed in Queen Mary's days
On many a grassy plain;
But, since of late Elizabeth,
And later James, came in, [2]
They never danc'd on any heath
As when the time hath been.

By which we note the Fairies
Were of the old profession; [3]
Their songs were Ave Marias,
Their dances were procession.
But now, alas, they all are dead,
Or gone beyond the seas,
Or farther for religion fled,
Or else they take their ease.

A tell-tale in their company
They never could endure,
And who so kept not secretly
Their mirth, was punished sure.
It was a just and Christian deed
To pinch such black and blue.
O, how the Commonwealth doth need
Such justices as you!

Now they have left our quarters
A register they have,
Who looketh to their charters,
A man both wise and grave;
An hundred of their merry pranks
By one that I could name
Are kept in store, conn twenty thanks [4]
To William for the same. [5]

I marvel who his cloak would turn
When Puck had led him round, [6]
Or where those walking fires would burn, [7]
Where Cureton would be found;
How Broker would appear to be,
For whom this age doth mourn;
But that their spirits live in thee,
In thee, old William Chourne. [8]

To William Chourne of Staffordshire
Give laud and praises due,
Who every meal can mend your cheer
With tales both old and true.
To William all give audience,
And pray ye for his noddle, [9]
For all the Fairies' evidence
Were lost, if that were addle. [10]

The Distracted Puritan

Am I mad, o noble Festus, [11]
When zeal and godly knowledge
Have put me in hope
To deal with the Pope,
As well as the best in the College?

Boldly I preach, hate a cross, hate a surplice,
Miters, copes, and rochets: [1]
Come hear me pray nine times a day,
And fill your heads with crotchets. [2]

In the house of pure Emmanuel [3]
I had my education;
Where my friends surmise
I dazzled my eyes,
With the light of Revelation. [4]
Boldly I preach, &c.

They bound me like a bedlam, [5]
They lashed my four poor quarters;
Whilst this I endure
Faith makes me sure
To be one of Foxe's martyrs. [6]
Boldly I preach, &c.

These injuries I suffer
Through Anti-Christs' invasions.
Take of this chain,
Neither Rome nor Spain
Can resist my strong persuasions:
Boldly I preach, &c.

Of the beast's ten horns (God bless us) [7]
I have knocked off three already.
If they let me alone,
I'll leave him none;
But they say I am too heady.
Boldly I preach, &c.

When I sacked the Seven-Hilled city, [8]
I met the great red dragon: [9]
I kept him aloof
With the armor of proof,
Though here I have never a rag on.
Boldly I preach, &c.

With a fiery sword and target
There fought I with this monster:
But the sons of pride
My zeal deride,
And all my deeds misconster. [10]
Boldly I preach, &c.

I unhorsed the whore of Babel
With a lance of inspirations:
I made her stink,
And spill her drink
In the cup of abominations. [11]
Boldly I preach, &c.

I have seen two in a vision,
With a flying book between them: [12]
I have been in despair

Five times a year,
And cured by reading Greenham.[1]
Boldly I preach, &c.

I observ'd in Perkins' tables[2]
The black lines of damnation:
Those crooked veins
So stuck in my brains,
That I fear'd my reprobation.
Boldly I preach, &c.

In the holy tongue of Chanaan[3]
I plac'd my chiefest pleasure:
Till I pricked my foot
With an Hebrew root,
That I bled beyond all measure.
Boldly I preach, &c.

I appear'd before the Archbishop,
And all the high Commission:[4]
I gave him no grace,
But told him to his face
That he favour'd superstition.
Boldly I preach, hate a cross, hate a surplice,
Miters, copes, and rochets:
Come hear me pray nine time a day,
And fill your heads with crotchets.

[1] Greenham Richard Greenham (1535?–1594?), a Puritan theologian who published works on comforting an afflicted mind.

[2] Perkin's tables William Perkins (1558–1602), a Puritan systematic theologian; one of his works includes a table illustrating the causes of salvation and damnation.

[3] the holy tongue of Chanaan the Hebrew language.

[4] high Commission a court of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, founded under Elizabeth I, which gave the crown power to commission persons to try various offences against the ecclesiastical establishment, and to crush any resistance to the supremacy of the crown in these matters. Abolished in 1641 (OED commission sb^{1}7).

Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury

1582 – 1648

George Herbert's brother led an active, varied and studious life; he was a historian and a colourful autobiographer, and has a place in the history of philosophy. In George Herbert, Donne's influence expressed itself in religious verse; in Edward Herbert's in secular love poetry. As a young man Herbert travelled a good deal, and held some diplomatic appointments. In the Civil War he made an accommodation with Parliament in order to save his library.

An Ode upon a Question moved, Whether Love should continue for ever?

Having interr'd her infant-birth,
The wat'ry ground that late did mourn,
Was strew'd with flow'rs for the return
Of the wish'd bridegroom of the earth.

The well accorded birds did sing
Their hymns unto the pleasant time,
And in a sweet consorted chime
Did welcome in the cheerful spring.

To which, soft whistles of the wind,
And warbling murmurs of a brook,
And varied notes of leaves that shook,
An harmony of parts did bind.

While doubling joy unto each other,
All in so rare consent was shown,
No happiness that came alone,
Nor pleasure that was not another.

When with a love none can express,
That mutually happy pair,
Melander and Celinda fair,
The season with their loves did bless.

Walking thus towards a pleasant grove,
Which did, it seem'd, in new delight
The pleasures of the time unite,
To give a triumph to their love,

They stay'd at last, and on the grass
Reposed so, as o'r his breast
She bow'd her gracious head to rest,
Such a weight as no burden was.

While over either's compass'd waist
Their folded arms were so compos'd,
As if in straightest bonds enclos'd,
They suffer'd for joys they did taste.

Long their fixed eyes to Heaven bent,
Unchanged, they did never move,
As if so great and pure a love
No glass but it could represent.

When with a sweet, though troubled look,
She first brake silence, saying, Dear friend,
O that our love might take no end,
Or never had beginning took!

I speak not this with a false heart,
(Wherewith his hand she gently strain'd)
Or that would change a love maintain'd
With so much faith on either part.

Nay, I protest, though death with his
Worst counsel should divide us here,

His terrors could not make me fear,
To come where you lov'd presence is.

Only if love's fire with the breath
Of life be kindled, I doubt,
With our last air 'twill be breath'd out,
And quenched with the cold of death.

That if affection be a line,
Which is clos'd up in our last hour;
Oh how 'twould grieve me, any pow'r
Could force so dear a love as mine!

She scarce had done, when his shut eyes
An inward joy did represent,
To hear Celinda thus intent
To a love he so much did prize.

Then with a look, it seem'd, denied
All earthly pow'rs but hers, yet so,
As if to her breath he did owe
This borrowed life, he thus replied;

O you, wherein, they say, souls rest,
Till they descend pure heavenly fires,
Shall lustful and corrupt desires
With your immortal seed be blest?

And shall our love, so far beyond
That low and dying appetite,
And which so chaste desires unite,
Not hold in an eternal bond?

Is it, because we should decline,
And wholly from our thoughts exclude
Objects that may the sense delude,
And study only the divine?

No sure, for if none can ascend
Ev'n to the visible degree
Of things created, how should we
The invisible comprehend?

Or rather since that pow'r expressed
His greatness in his works alone,
B'ing here best in his creatures known,
Why is he not lov'd in them best?

But is't not true, which you pretend,
That since our love and knowledge here,
Only as parts of life appear,
So they with it should take their end.

O no, belov'd, I am most sure,
Those virtuous habits we acquire,
As being with the soul entire,
Must with it evermore endure.

For if when sins and vice reside,
We find so foul a guilt remain,
As never dying in his stain,
Still punish'd in the soul doth bide,

Much more that true and real joy,
Which in a virtuous love is found,
Must be more solid in its ground,
Then fate or death can e'r destroy.

Else should our souls in vain elect,
And vainer yet were Heaven's laws,
When to an everlasting cause
They gave a perishing effect.

Nor here on earth then, nor above,
Our good affection can impair,
For where God doth admit the fair,
Think you that he excludeth love?

These eyes again then, eyes shall see,
And hands again these hands enfold,

And all chaste pleasures can be told
Shall with us everlasting be.

For if no use of sense remain
When bodies once this life forsake,
Or they could no delight partake,
Why should they ever rise again?

And if every imperfect mind
Make love the end of knowledge here,
How perfect will our love be, where
All imperfection is refin'd?

Let then no doubt, Celinda, touch,
Much less your fairest mind invade,
Were not our souls immortal made,
Our equal loves can make them such.

So when one wing can make no way,
Two joinèd can themselves dilate,
So can two persons propagate,
When singly either would decay.

So when from hence we shall be gone,
And be no more, nor you, nor I,
As one another's mystery,
Each shall be both, yet both but one.

This said, in her up-lifted face,
Her eyes which did that beauty crown,
Were like two stars, that having faln down,
Look up again to find their place:

Which such a moveless silent peace
Did seize on their becalmed sense,
One would have thought some influence
Their ravish'd spirits did possess.

Lady Mary Wroth

ca. 1587 – ca. 1651-53

The poet and romance writer Lady Mary Wroth was the eldest child of Sir Robert Sidney, first Earl of Leicester, and Lady Barbara Gamage. Her father was the younger brother of Sir Philip Sidney. As a child, Wroth often accompanied her mother to the Continent to visit her father, then governor of Flushing in the Netherlands, returning home to the Penshurst estate. In a letter to her father, the estate manager Rowland Whyte wrote of Wroth's education: "God bless her, she is very forward in her learning, writing, and other exercises she is put to, as dancing and the virginals." Wroth's writings suggest that she was widely read in English and Continental romances and pastorals, and in English drama and poetry. In 1604, she married Sir Robert Wroth, who had been knighted by James I the previous year. Her husband's friendship with the King positioned Wroth within Queen Anne's circle of friends, and she participated in Jonson's court masque, The Masque of Blackness (1605).

During her marriage, Wroth was both patron and poet. The former role may explain why her work, circulated in manuscript, was praised by Ben Jonson and William Drummond. In February, 1614 her first son, James, was born, and the following month her husband died. Wroth was left greatly indebted, as her jointure of £1,200 was insufficient to reduce the £23,000 debt left her by her husband. Though the estate reverted to Sir Robert's uncle on the death of her son in 1616, she struggled for the remainder of her life to settle her husband's debts. Although Wroth never remarried, a manuscript history of the Herbert-Pembroke family records that she bore two illegitimate children by her first cousin, William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke.

In 1621, Wroth published her prose romance, The Countess of Montgomery's Urania. As the work alluded to contemporary court scandals, it evoked criticism. In a letter to the Duke of Buckingham, Wroth insisted that her work had not only been published without her permission but that it had been misconstrued: "the strange constructions which are made of my book [were] contrary to my imagination, and as far from my meaning as is possible for truth to be from conjecture"(December 15, 1621). She immediately withdrew Urania from circulation. Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, a sonnet sequence interspersed with songs, was appended to Urania. It was the first sonnet sequence published by a woman in England. Wroth revived the genre of the sonnet sequence to examine the theatre of female desire against the backdrop of the inconstant masculine "other." Wroth wrote, but did not publish, a pastoral play, Love's Victory, and died leaving unfinished a sequel to Urania.

Pamphilia to Amphilanthus [1]

A Sonnet Sequence [2]

I

When night's black mantle could most darkness prove,
And sleep, death's image, did my senses hire [3]
From knowledge of myself, then thoughts did move
Swifter than those most swiftness need require:

---

[1] Pamphilia and Amphilanthus the female and male protagonists of Wroth's Urania, to which these sonnets are appended. Pamphilia means "all-loving," while Amphilanthus signifies "the lover of two."

[2] The sequence and numbering of the songs and sonnets are based on that in Josephine A. Roberts's edition The Poems of Lady Mary Wroth (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State U P, 1983).

[3] hire engage (OED hire v 1a).

In sleep, a chariot drawn by winged desire [1]
I saw: where sat bright Venus, Queen of Love,
And at her feet her son, still adding fire
To burning hearts, which she did hold above, [2]

But one heart flaming more than all the rest
The goddess held, and put it to my breast, [3]
"Dear son, now shut," said she, "thus must we win;"

He her obeyed, and martyred my poor heart.
I, waking, hoped as dreams it would depart
Yet since: O me: a lover I have been.

Love, leave to urge, thou know'st thou hast the hand; [4]
'Tis cowardice, to strive where none resist:
Pray thee leave off, I yield unto thy band; [5]
Do not thus, still, in thine own power persist,

Behold I yield: let forces be dismissed;
I am thy subject, conquered, bound to stand,
Never thy foe, but did thy claim assist
Seeking thy due of those who did withstand;

But now, it seems, thou would'st I should thee love;
I do confess, 'twas thy will made me choose;
And thy fair shows made me a lover prove
When I my freedom did, for pain refuse.

Yet this, Sir God, your boyship I despise; [6]
Your charms I obey, but love not want of eyes. [7]

13

Cloyed with the torments of a tedious night
I wish for day; which come, I hope for joy: [8]
When cross I find new tortures to destroy
My woe-killed heart, first hurt by mischief's might, [9]

Then cry for night, and once more day takes flight
And brightness gone; what rest should here enjoy
Usurped is; Hate will her force employ;
Night cannot grief entomb though black as spite.

My thoughts are sad; her face as sad doth seem: [10]
My pains are long; her hours tedious are:
My grief is great, and endless is my care:
Her face, her force, and all of woe's esteem:

Then welcome night, and farewell flatt'ring day
Which all hopes breed, and yet our joys delay.

15

Dear famish not what you yourself gave food;
Destroy not what your glory is to save;
Kill not that soul to which you spirit gave;
In pity, not disdain, your triumph stood;

An easy thing it is to shed the blood
Of one who, at your will, yields to the grave;
But more you may true worth by mercy crave

---

[1] a chariot...winged desire Venus's chariot was often represented as drawn by doves.

[2] her son Cupid.

[3] But one heart...goddess held On the title page of Urania, Venus holds a flaming heart.

[4] hand upper hand (advantage).

[5] band custody, imprisonment (OED band sb^{1} I.1b).

[6] Sir God Pamphilia's mocking address to Cupid echos Astrophil's ("sir fool") in Sidney's Astrophil and Stella (53.7).

[7] want lack (OED want sb 2).

[8] Cloyed burdened (OED cloyed ppl.a).

[9] cross ill-tempered, out of humour (OED cross a 5b).

[10] her face Night's face.

When you preserve, not spoil, but nourish good;

Your sight is all the food I do desire;
Then sacrifice me not in hidden fire,
Or stop the breath which did your praises move: [1]

Think but how easy 'tis a sight to give;
Nay ev'n desert; since by it I do live, [2]
I but chameleon-like would live, and love. [3]

16

Am I thus conquered? Have I lost the powers
That to withstand, which joys to ruin me? [4]
Must I be still while it my strength devours
And captive leads me prisoner, bound, unfree?

Love first shall leave men's fant'sies to them free,
Desire shall quench love's flames, spring hate sweet showers,
Love shall loose all his darts, have sight, and see
His shame, and wishings hinder happy hours; [5]

Why should we not Love's purblind charms resist?
Must we be servile, doing what he list? [6]
No, seek some host to harbour thee: I fly

Thy babish tricks, and freedom do profess;
But O my hurt, makes my lost heart confess
I love, and must: So farewell liberty.

22

Come darkest night, becoming sorrow best;
Light; leave thy light; fit for a lightsome soul; [7]
Darkness doth truly suit with me oppressed
Whom absence' power doth from mirth control:

The very trees with hanging heads condole
Sweet summer's parting, and of leaves distressed
In dying colours make a grief-full role;
So much (alas) to sorrow are they pressed.

Thus of dead leaves her farewell carpet's made:
Their fall, their branches, all their mournings prove;
With leafless, naked bodies, whose hues vade
From hopeful green, to wither in their love, [8]

If trees and leaves, for absence, mourners be
No marvel that I grieve, who like want see.

25

Like to the Indians, scorched with the sun, [9]
The sun which they do as their god adore
So am I used by Love, for ever more
I worship him, less favours have I won,

Better are they who thus to blackness run,
And so can only whiteness' want deplore [10]
Than I who pale and white am with grief's store,
Nor can have hope, but to see hopes undone;

[1] move utter (OED move v I.4).

[2] desert deserved (OED desert sb^{1} 3).

[3] chameleon-like From their inanimate appearance, and power of existing for long periods without food, chameleons were formerly supposed to live on air (OED chameleon 1).

[4] Have I lost…ruin me Have I lost the power to withstand love ("That") which takes joy in ruining me?

[5] wishings longings (OED wishing vbl.sb).

[6] list desires (OED list v^{1} 1b).

[7] lightsome soul a soul not weighed down by care, pain or sorrow (OED lightsome a^{1} 2).

[8] vade fade (OED vade v^{1} *Obs.*1).

[9] Like to the Indians… In Ben Jonson's Masque of Blackness (1605) Wroth performed the role of one of the beautiful daughters of Niger who came to England to gain white skin from James I, the Sun-King.

[10] whiteness' want deplore grieve the lack of whiteness.

Besides their sacrifice received's in sight
Of their chose saint: mine hid as worthless rite;
Grant me to see where I my offerings give,

Then let me wear the mark of Cupid's might
In heart as they in skin of Phoebus' light [1]
Not ceasing off'rings to Love while I live.

26

When everyone to pleasing pastime hies, [2]
Some hunt, some hawk, some play, while some delight [3]
In sweet discourse, and music shows joy's might
Yet I my thoughts do far above these prize.

The joy which I take, is that free from eyes
I sit, and wonder at this daylike night
So to dispose themselves, as void of right; [4]
And leave true pleasure for poor vanities;

When others hunt, my thoughts I have in chase;
If hawk, my mind at wished end doth fly,
Discourse, I with my spirit talk, and cry
While others, music choose as greatest grace.

O God, say I, can these fond pleasures move?
Or music be but in sweet thoughts of love?

39

Take heed mine eyes, how you your looks do cast
Lest they betray my heart's most secret thought;
Be true unto yourselves for nothing's bought
More dear than doubt which brings a lover's fast.

Catch you all watching eyes, ere they be past,
Or take yours fixed where your best love hath sought
The pride of your desires; let them be taught
Their faults for shame, they could no truer last;

Then look, and look with joy for conquest won
Of those that searched your hurt in double kind;
So you kept safe, let them themselves look blind
Watch, gaze, and mark, till they to madness run,

While you, mine eyes, enjoy full sight of love
Contented that such happinesses move.

40

False hope which feeds but to destroy, and spill
What it first breeds; unnatural to the birth
Of thine own womb; conceiving but to kill, [5]
And plenty gives to make the greater dearth,

So tyrants do who falsely ruling earth
Outwardly grace them, and with profits fill [6]
Advance those who appointed are to death
To make their greater fall to please their will.

Thus shadow they their wicked vile intent
Colouring evil with a show of good
While in fair shows their malice so is spent;
Hope kills the heart, and tyrants shed the blood.

For hope deluding brings us to the pride
Of our desires the farther down to slide.

[1] Phoebus' light sunlight.

[2] hies hastens (OED hie v 2).

[3] play play cards, dice or another specified diversion.

[4] eyes the gaze of others; and wonder...void of right and wonder at the blindness of those who participate in such activities, conducting themselves as if deprived of reason or a sense of that which is morally due (OED void a A.II.13b; OED right sb[1] I.5,3).

[5] spill destroy by depriving of life (OED spill v I.1a); unnatural...kill an image of miscarriage.

[6] grace show favour to; confer honour upon (OED grace v 2,5).

48

If ever Love had force in human breast?
If ever he could move in pensive heart?
Or if that he such power could but impart
To breed those flames whose heat brings joy's unrest.

Then look on me; I am to these addressed,
I, am the soul that feels the greatest smart;
I, am that heartless trunk of heart's depart. [1]
And I, that one, by love, and grief oppressed.

None ever felt the truth of Love's great miss
Of eyes, till I deprived was of bliss;
For had he seen, he must have pity showed;

I should not have been made this stage of woe
Where sad disasters have their open show
O no, more pity he had sure bestowed.
Pamphilia. [2]

SONG 74

Love, a child, is ever crying,
Please him, and he straight is flying,
Give him, he the more is craving
Never satisfied with having;

His desires have no measure,
Endless folly is his treasure,
What he promiseth he breaketh
Trust not one word that he speaketh;

He vows nothing but false matter,
And to cozen you he'll flatter, [3]
Let him gain the hand he'll leave you,
And still glory to deceive you;

He will triumph in your wailing,
And yet cause be of your failing:
These his virtues are, and slighter
Are his gifts, his favours lighter,

Feathers are as firm in staying
Wolves no fiercer in their preying.
As a child then leave him crying
Nor seek him so given to flying.

A CROWN OF SONNETS DEDICATED TO LOVE [4]

77

In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?
Ways are on all sides while the way I miss: [5]
If to the right hand, there, in love I burn;
Let me go forward, therein danger is;

If to the left, suspicion hinders bliss,
Let me turn back, shame cries I ought return
Nor faint though crosses with my fortunes kiss; [6]
Stand still is harder, although sure to mourn.

Thus let me take the right, or left hand way;
Go forward, or stand still, or back retire;
I must these doubts endure without allay
Or help, but travail find for my best hire; [7]

Yet that which most my troubled sense doth move
Is to leave all, and take the thread of Love. [8]

---

[1] depart departure (OED depart sb Obs 1).

[2] Pamphilia. This concludes the first section of sonnets.

[3] cozen defraud by deceit (OED cozen v 1).

[4] A Crown of Sonnets sonnets 77–90; the corona (crown) is an Italian poetic form in which the last line of each of the sonnets is used as the first line of the succeeding sonnet.

[5] ways paths (OED way sb^1 I.1); the way the correct path.

[6] crosses troubles, adversity (OED cross sb B.I.10b).

[7] allay abatement (OED allay sb^1 II.8); travail "travel" in the 1621 text; labour or toil, esp. of a painful or oppressive nature (OED travail sb^1 I.1); hire reward (OED hire sb 3).

[8] thread of love an allusion to the thread given by Ariadne to Theseus to lead him out of the Labyrinth which enclosed the Minotaur.

78

Is to leave all, and take the thread of Love
Which line straight leads unto the soul's content
Where choice delights with pleasure's wings do move,
And idle phant'sy never room had lent,

When chaste thoughts guide us then our minds are bent
To take that good which ills from us remove,
Light of true love, brings fruit which none repent
But constant lovers seek, and wish to prove; [1]

Love is the shining star of blessing's light;
The fervent fire of zeal, the root of peace,
The lasting lamp fed with the oil of right;
Image of faith, and womb for joy's increase.[2]

Love is true virtue, and his ends delight;
His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might.

79

His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might,
No stain is there but pure, as purest white,
Where no cloud can appear to dim his light,
Nor spot defile, but shame will soon requite,

Here are affections, tried by Love's just might
As gold by fire, and black discerned by white,
Error by truth, and darkness known by light,
Where faith is valued for Love to requite,

Please him, and serve him, glory in his might,
And firm he'll be, as innocency white,
Clear as th'air, warm as sun beams, as day light,
Just as truth, constant as fate, joyed to requite,

Then Love obey, strive to observe his might,
And be in his brave court a glorious light.

80

And be in his brave court a glorious light,
Shine in the eyes of faith, and constancy,
Maintain the fires of love still burning bright
Not slightly sparkling but light flaming be

Never to slack till earth no stars can see,
Till sun, and moon do leave to us dark night,
And second chaos once again do free
Us, and the world from all division's spite, [3]

Till then, affections which his followers are
Govern our hearts, and prove his powers gain
To taste this pleasing sting seek with all care
For happy smarting is it with small pain,

Such as although, it pierce your tender heart
And burn, yet burning you will love the smart.

81

And burn, yet burning you will love the smart,
When you shall feel the weight of true desire,
So pleasing, as you would not wish your part
Of burden should be missing from that fire;

But faithful and unfeignèd heat aspire
Which sin abolisheth, and doth impart
Salves to all fear, with virtues which inspire
Souls with divine love, which shows his chaste art,

---

[1] prove experience (OED prove v. B.I.3).

[2] Love is…joy's increase Biblical echoes resound in this stanza. See Matthew 2:7, 3:10–11; Isaiah 53:2,5; I Kings 17:14,16; II Kings 4: 1–7; Matthew 25:1–13; Luke 1:44.

[3] second chaos In Neoplatonic theory, matter reverts to chaos at the world's end.

And guide he is to joyings; open eyes
He hath to happiness, and best can learn
Us means how to deserve, this he descries,
Who blind yet doth our hidenest thoughts discern.[1]

Thus we may gain since living in blest love
He may our prophet, and our tutor prove.[2]

82

He may our prophet, and our tutor prove
In whom alone we do this power find,
To join two hearts as in one frame to move;
Two bodies, but one soul to rule the mind;[3]

Eyes which must care to one dear object bind
Ears to each other's speech as if above
All else they sweet and learned were; this kind
Content of lovers witnesseth true love,

It doth enrich the wits, and make you see
That in yourself, which you knew not before,
Forcing you to admire such gifts should be
Hid from your knowledge, yet in you the store;

Millions of these adorn the throne of Love,
How blest be they then, who his favours prove.[4]

83

How blest be they then, who his favours prove
A life whereof the birth is just desire,
Breeding sweet flame which hearts invite to move
In these loved eyes which kindle Cupid's fire,

And nurse his longings with his thoughts entire,
Fixed on the heat of wishes formed by love,
Yet whereas fire destroys this doth aspire,[5]
Increase, and foster all delights above;

Love will a painter make you, such, as you
Shall able be to draw your only dear
More lively, perfect, lasting, and more true[6]
Than rarest workman, and to you more near,

These be the least, then all must needs confess
He that shuns love doth love himself the less.

84

He that shuns love doth love himself the less
And cursèd he whose spirit not admires
The worth of love, where endless blessedness
Reigns, and commands, maintained by heav'nly fires

Made of virtue, joined by truth, blown by desires
Strength'ned by worth, renewed by carefulness
Flaming in never changing thoughts, briars
Of jealousy shall here miss welcomeness;

Nor coldly pass in the pursuits of love
Like one long frozen in a sea of ice,
And yet but chastely let your passions move
No thought from virtuous love your minds entice.

Never to other ends your phant'sies place
But where they may return with honour's grace.

85

But where they may return with honour's grace
Where Venus' follies can no harbour win

But chased are as worthless of the face
Or style of Love who hath lascivious been.

Our hearts are subject to her son; where sin
Never did dwell, or rest one minute's space;
What faults he hath, in her, did still begin,
And from her breast he sucked his fleeting pace,

If lust be counted love 'tis falsely named
By wickedness a fairer gloss to set
Upon that vice, which else makes men ashamed
In the own phrase to warrant, but beget

This child for love, who ought like monster born
Be from the Court of Love, and Reason torn. [1]

86

Be from the Court of Love, and Reason torn
For Love in Reason now doth put his trust,
Desert, and liking are together born [2]
Children of Love, and Reason parents just,

Reason adviser is, Love ruler must
Be of the State which crown he long hath worn
Yet so as neither will in least mistrust
The government where no fear is of scorn,

Then reverence both their mights thus made of one,
But wantonness, and all those errors shun
Which wrongers be, impostures, and alone
Maintainers of all follies ill began;

Fruit of a sour, and unwholesome ground
Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound. [3]

87

Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound
When heaven gave liberty to frail dull earth
To bring forth plenty that in ills abound
Which ripest yet do bring a certain dearth. [4]

A timeless, and unseasonable birth
Planted in ill, in worse time springing found,
Which hemlock-like might feed a sick-wit's mirth
Where unruled vapours swim in endless round, [5]

Then joy we not in what we ought to shun
Where shady pleasures show, but true born fires
Are quite quenched out, or by poor ashes won
Awhile to keep those cool, and wan desires.

O no let Love his glory have and might
Be given to him who triumphs in his right.

88

Be given to him who triumphs in his right
Nor vading be, but like those blossoms fair [6]
Which fall for good, and lose their colours bright
Yet die not, but with fruit their loss repair

So may love make you pale with loving care
When sweet enjoying shall restore that light
More clear in beauty than we can compare
If not to Venus in her chosen night,

And who so give themselves in this dear kind
These happinesses shall attend them still
To be supplied with joys, enriched in mind
With treasures of content, and pleasures fill,

Thus Love to be divine doth here appear
Free from all fogs but shining fair, and clear.

89

Free from all fogs but shining fair, and clear
Wise in all good, and innocent in ill
Where holy friendship is esteemed dear
With truth in love, and justice in our will,

In Love these titles only have their fill
Of happy life maintainer, and the mere
Defence of right, the punisher of skill,
And fraud; from whence directions doth appear, [1]

To thee then lord commander of all hearts,
Ruler of our affections kind, and just Great King of Love, my soul from feignèd
smarts
Or thought of change I offer to your trust

This crown, my self, and all that I have more
Except my heart which you bestowed before.

90

Except my heart which you bestowed before,
And for a sign of conquest gave away
As worthless to be kept in your choice store
Yet one more spotless with you doth not stay.

The tribute which my heart doth truly pay
Is faith untouched, pure thoughts discharge
the score [2]
Of debts for me, where Constancy bears sway,
And rules as Lord, unharmed by envies sore,

Yet other mischiefs fail not to attend,
As enemies to you, my foes must be;
Cursed Jealousy doth all her forces bend
To my undoing; thus my harms I see.

So though in Love I fervently do burn,
In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?

103

My muse, now happy, lay thy self to rest,
Sleep in the quiet of a faithful love,
Write you no more, but let these fant'sies move
Some other hearts, wake not to new unrest,

But if you study, be those thoughts addressed [3]
To truth, which shall eternal goodness prove;
Enjoying of true joy, the most, and best,
The endless gain which never will remove;

Leave the discourse of Venus and her son
To young beginners, and their brains inspire
With stories of great love, and from that fire
Get heat to write the fortunes they have won,

And thus leave off, what's past shows you can love,
Now let your constancy your honour prove.
Pamphilia.

Thomas Hobbes

1588 – 1679

Educated in his home town of Malmesbury and at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, Hobbes in 1608 became tutor and secretary in the household of William Cavendish, the Earl of Devonshire, and would remain associated with the Cavendish family for more than thirty years. Hobbes spent eight years abroad during this period, accompanying his noble pupils on their grand tours; during these trips he met many of Europe's most important political and intellectual figures, including Descartes and Galileo. At one point, Hobbes acted as an amanuensis for Francis Bacon, helping translate some of the Essays into Latin. In addition to Bacon, other friends and admirers included Ben Jonson, John Aubrey, William Harvey, John Dryden, Lucius Carey, and Abraham Cowley. Hobbes spent the civil war decade in Paris, leaving England at the prospect of hostilities in 1640 and returning in 1652; in the later 1640s he acted as mathematical tutor to the exiled Charles II. It was while in Paris, hearing news of the wars at home, that Hobbes wrote Leviathan (published in London in 1651), the century's classic work of political philosophy. On his return to England Hobbes engaged in political, religious, philosophical, and mathematical controversy; his ideas usually managed to outrage representatives on all sides of most issues. After the Restoration he was awarded a pension from Charles II, and continued to write until the end of his long life, completing a translation of Homer at the age of 86.

In addition to Leviathan, Hobbes' writings include a translation of Thucydides (1629); De Cive (1642, in English 1651), treating ethics and politics; The Elements of Law (1650); De Corpore (1655), on metaphysics and physics; De Homine (1658), on human sensation and emotion; his own Latin translation of Leviathan (1668); Behemoth, or the Long Parliament (1679), a dialogue about the civil war; and works on politics, law, religion, rhetoric, geometry, ballistics, and other subjects. Leviathan, or The Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth

(excerpts)

THE INTRODUCTION

Nature (the art whereby God hath made and governs the world) is by the art of man, as in many other things, so in this also imitated, that it can make an artificial animal. For seeing life is but a motion of limbs, the beginning whereof is in some principal part within; why may we not say, that all automata (engines that move themselves by springs and wheels as doth a watch) have an artificial life? For what is the heart, but a spring; and the nerves, but so many strings; and the joints, but so many wheels, giving motion to the whole body, such as was intended by the artificer? Art goes yet further, imitating that rational and most excellent work of nature, Man. For by art is created that great Leviathan called a Commonwealth, or state (in Latin civitas), which is but an artificial man; though of greater stature and strength than the natural, for whose protection and defence it was intended; and in which, the sovereignty is an artificial soul, as giving life and motion to the whole body; the magistrates, and other officers of judicature and execution, artificial joints; reward and punishment (by which fastened to the seat of the sovereignty, every joint and member is moved to perform his duty) are the nerves, that do the same in the body natural; the wealth and riches of all the particular members, are the strength; salus populi (the people's safety) its business; counsellors, by whom all things needful for it to know, are suggested unto it, are the memory; equity and laws, an artificial reason and will; concord, health; sedition, sickness; and civil war, death. Lastly, the pacts and covenants, by which the parts of this body politic were at first made, set together, and united, resemble that fiat, or the "Let us make man," pronounced by God in the Creation [Genesis 1:26].

To describe the nature of this artificial man, I will consider

First, the matter thereof, and the artificer; both which is Man.
Secondly, how, and by what covenants it is made; what are the rights and just power or authority of a sovereign; and what it is that preserveth and dissolveth it.
Thirdly, what is a Christian Commonwealth.
Lastly, what is the Kingdom of Darkness.

Concerning the first, there is a saying much usurped of late, that wisdom is acquired not by reading of books, but of men. Consequently whereunto, those persons, that for the most part can give no other proof of being wise, take great delight to show what they think they have read in men, by uncharitable censures of one another behind their backs. But there is another saying not of late understood, by which they might learn truly to read one another, if they would take the pains; and that is, Nosce teipsum, "read thy self": which was not meant, as it is now used, to countenance either the barbarous state of men in power towards their inferiors; or to encourage men of low degree to a saucy behaviour towards their betters; but to teach us, that for the similitude of the thoughts and passions of one man, to the thoughts and passions of another, whosoever looketh into himself and considereth what he doth, when he does think, opine, reason, hope, fear, &c., and upon what grounds; he shall thereby read and know, what are the thoughts, and passions of all other men, upon the like occasions. I say the similitude of passions, which are the same in all men, desire, fear, hope, &c; not the similitude of the objects of the passions, which are the things desired, feared, hoped, &c: for these the constitution individual, and particular education do so vary, and they are so easy to be kept from our knowledge, that the characters of man's heart, blotted and confounded as they are, with dissembling, lying, counterfeiting, and erroneous doctrines, are legible only to him that searcheth hearts. And though by men's actions we do discover their design sometimes; yet to do it without comparing them with our own, and distinguishing all circumstances, by which the case may come to be altered, is to decipher without a key, and be for the most part deceived, by too much trust, or by too much diffidence; as he that reads, is himself a good or evil man.

But let one man read another by his actions never so perfectly, it serves him only with his acquaintance, which are but few. He that is to govern a whole nation, must read in himself, not this, or that particular man; but mankind: which though it be hard to do, harder than to learn any language, or science; yet, when I shall have set down my own reading orderly, and perspicuously, the pains left another, will be only to consider, if he also find not the same in himself. For this kind of doctrine, admitteth no other demonstration.

CHAPTER XIII
Of the Natural Condition of Mankind, as Concerning their Felicity, and Misery

Nature hath made men so equal, in the faculties of body, and mind; as that though there be found one man sometimes manifestly stronger in body, or of quicker mind than another; yet when all is reckoned together, the difference between man and man is not so considerable, as that one man can thereupon claim to himself any benefit, to which another may not pretend as well as he. For as to the strength of body, the weakest has strength enough to kill the strongest, either by secret machination, or by confederacy with others that are in the same danger with himself.

And as to the faculties of the mind (setting aside the arts grounded upon words, and especially that skill of proceeding upon general and infallible rules, called science; which very few have, and but in few things; as being not a native faculty, born with us; nor attained (as prudence), while we look after somewhat else), I find yet a greater equality amongst men, than that of strength. For prudence is but experience; which equal time, equally bestows on all men in those things they equally apply themselves unto. That which may perhaps make such equality incredible, is but a vain conceit of one's own wisdom, which almost all men think they have in a greater degree than the vulgar; that is, than all men but themselves, and a few others, whom by fame, or for concurring with themselves, they approve. For such is the nature of man, that howsoever they may acknowledge many others to be more witty, or more eloquent, or more learned; yet they will hardly believe there be many so wise as themselves: For they see their own wit at hand, and other men's at a distance. But this proveth rather that men are in that point equal, than unequal. For there is not ordinarily a greater sign of the equal distribution of any thing, than that every man is contented with his share.

From this equality of ability, ariseth equality of hope in the attaining of our ends. And therefore if any two men desire the same thing, which nevertheless they cannot both enjoy, they become enemies; and in the way to their end (which is principally their own conservation, and sometimes their delectation only), endeavour to destroy, or subdue one another. And from hence it comes to pass, that where an invader hath no more to fear, than another man's single power; if one plant, sow, build, or possess a convenient seat, others may probably be expected to come prepared with forces united, to dispossess and deprive him, not only of the fruit of his labour, but also of his life, or liberty. And the invader again is in the like danger of another.

And from this diffidence of one another, there is no way for any man to secure himself, so reasonable, as anticipation; that is, by force, or wiles, to master the persons of all men he can, so long, till he see no other power great enough to endanger him: And this is no more than his own conservation requireth, and is generally allowed. Also because there be some, that taking pleasure in contemplating their own power in the acts of conquest, which they pursue farther than their security requires; if others, that otherwise would be glad to be at ease within modest bounds, should not by invasion increase their power, they would not be able, long time, by standing only on their defence, to subsist. And by consequence, such augmentation of dominion over men, being necessary to a man's conservation, it ought to be allowed him.

Again, men have no pleasure (but on the contrary a great deal of grief), in keeping company, where there is no power able to overawe them all. For every man looketh that his companion should value him at the same rate he sets upon himself: And upon all signs of contempt, or undervaluing, naturally endeavours, as far as he dares (which amongst them that have no common power to keep them in quiet, is far enough to make them destroy each other) to extort a greater value from his contemnors, by damage; and from others, by the example.

So that in the nature of man, we find three principal causes of quarrel. First, competition; secondly, diffidence; thirdly, glory.

The first, maketh men invade for gain; the second, for safety; and the third, for reputation. The first use violence, to make themselves masters of other men's persons, wives, children, and chattel; the second, to defend them; the third, for trifles, as a word, a smile, a different opinion, and any other sign of undervalue, either direct in their persons, or by reflexion in their kindred, their friends, their nation, their profession, or their name.

Hereby it is manifest, that during the time men live without a common power to keep them all in awe, they are in that condition which is called war; and such a war, as is of every man against every man. For war consisteth not in battle only, or the act of fighting; but in a tract of time, wherein the will to contend by battle is sufficiently known: and therefore the notion of time is to be considered in the nature of war; as it is in the nature of weather. For as the nature of foul weather lieth not in a shower or two of rain, but in an inclination thereto of many days together: So the nature of war, consisteth not in actual fighting, but in the known disposition thereto, during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. All other time is peace.

Whatsoever therefore is consequent to a time of war, where every man is enemy to every man; the same is consequent to the time, wherein men live without other security than what their own strength and their own invention shall furnish them withal. In such condition, there is no place for industry; because the fruit thereof is uncertain: and consequently no culture of the earth; no navigation, nor use of the commodities that may be imported by sea; no commodious building; no instruments of moving, and removing such things as require much force; no knowledge of the face of the earth; no account of time; no arts; no letters; no society; and which is worst of all, continual fear, and danger of violent death; and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short.

It may seem strange to some man, that has not well weighed these things, that nature should thus dissociate, and render men apt to invade, and destroy one another: and he may therefore, not trusting to this inference, made from the passions, desire perhaps to have the same confirmed by experience. Let him therefore consider with himself, when taking a journey, he arms himself, and seeks to go well accompanied; when going to sleep, he locks his doors; when even in his house he locks his chests; and this when he knows there be laws, and public officers, armed, to revenge all injuries shall be done him; what opinion he has of his fellow subjects, when he rides armed; of his fellow citizens, when he locks his doors; and of his children, and servants, when he locks his chests. Does he not there as much accuse mankind by his actions, as I do by my words? But neither of us accuse man's nature in it. The desires and other passions of man are in themselves no sin. No more are the actions that proceed from those passions, till they know a law that forbids them: which till laws be made they cannot know: nor can any law be made, till they have agreed upon the person that shall make it.

It may peradventure be thought, there was never such a time, nor condition of war as this; and I believe it was never generally so, over all the world: but there are many places where they live so now. For the savage people in many places of America, except the government of small families, the concord whereof dependeth on natural lust, have no government at all; and live at this day in that brutish manner, as I said before. Howsoever, it may be perceived what manner of life there would be, where there were no common power to fear, by the manner of life which men that have formerly lived under a peaceful government, use to degenerate into, in a civil war.

But though there had never been any time wherein particular men were in a condition of war one against another; yet in all times, kings, and persons of sovereign authority, because of their independency, are in continual jealousies, and in the state and posture of gladiators; having their weapons pointing, and their eyes fixed on one another; that is, their forts, garrisons, and guns upon the frontiers of their kingdoms; and continual spies upon their neighbours, which is a posture of war. But because they uphold thereby the industry of their subjects; there does not follow from it that misery which accompanies the liberty of particular men.

To this war of every man against every man, this also is consequent; that nothing can be unjust. The notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice have there no place. Where there is no common power, there is no law: where no law, no injustice. Force and fraud are in war the two cardinal virtues. Justice and injustice are none of the faculties neither of the body, nor mind. If they were, they might be in a man that were alone in the world, as well as his senses, and passions. They are qualities that relate to men in society, not in solitude. It is consequent also to the same condition, that there be no propriety, no dominion, no mine and thine distinct; but only that to be every man's, that he can get; and for so long, as he can keep it. And thus much for the ill condition which man by mere nature is actually placed in; though with a possibility to come out of it, consisting partly in the passions, partly in his reason.

The passions that incline men to peace are fear of death; desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living; and a hope by their industry to obtain them. And reason suggesteth convenient articles of peace, upon which men may be drawn to agreement. These articles are they which otherwise are called the Laws of Nature: whereof I shall speak more particularly in the two following chapters.[1]

. . . .

CHAPTER XVII
Of the Causes, Generation, and Definition of a Commonwealth

The final cause, end, or design of men (who naturally love liberty, and dominion over others), in the introduction of that restraint upon themselves (in which we see them live in Commonwealths), is the foresight of their own preservation, and of a more contented life thereby; that is to say, of getting themselves out from that miserable condition of war, which is necessarily consequent (as hath been shown) to the natural passions of men, when there is no visible power to keep them in awe, and tie them by fear of punishment to the performance of their covenants, and observation of those Laws of Nature set down in the fourteen and fifteenth chapters.

For the Laws of Nature (as justice, equity, modesty, mercy, and (in sum), doing to others, as we would be done to) of themselves, without the terror of some power, to cause them to be observed, are contrary to our natural passions, that carry us to partiality, pride, revenge, and the like. And covenants, without the sword, are but words, and of no strength to secure a man at all. Therefore notwithstanding the Laws of Nature (which everyone hath then kept, when he has the will to keep them, when he can do it safely), if there be no power erected, or not great enough for our security; every man will and may lawfully rely on his own strength and art, for caution against all other men. And in all places where men have lived by small families, to rob and spoil one another, has been a trade, and so far from being reputed against the Law of Nature, that the greater spoils they gained, the greater was their honour; and men observed no other laws therein, but the laws of honour; that is, to abstain from cruelty, leaving to men their lives, and instruments of husbandry. And as small families did then; so now do cities and kingdoms which are but greater families (for their own security) enlarge their dominions, upon all pretences of danger, and fear of invasion, or assistance that may be given to invaders, endeavour as much as they can, to subdue, or weaken their neighbours, by open force, and secret arts, for want of other caution, justly; and are remembered for it in after ages with honour.

[1] not included in this selection, but summarized in the second paragraph of Chapter 17 below. For Hobbes, self-preservation is the fundamental right of nature; the laws of nature are those rules or precepts conducive to this right of self-preservation. The primary law of nature is to seek peace, as a safer alternative to the war of all against all. Other laws, such as willingness to make contracts or covenants, justice, gratitude, mutual accommodation, equity, and mercy, all contribute to the maintenance of peace.

Nor is it the joining together of a final number of men that gives them this security; because in small numbers, small additions on the one side or the other, make the advantage of strength so great, as is sufficient to carry the victory; and therefore gives encouragement to an invasion. The multitude sufficient to confide in for our security is not determined by any certain number, but by comparison with the enemy we fear; and is then sufficient, when the odds of the enemy is not of so visible and conspicuous moment, to determine the event of war, as to move him to attempt.

And be there never so great a multitude; yet if their actions be directed according to their particular judgments, and particular appetites, they can expect thereby no defence, nor protection, neither against a common enemy, nor against the injuries of one another. For being distracted in opinions concerning the best use and application of their strength, they do not help, but hinder one another; and reduce their strength by mutual opposition to nothing: whereby they are easily not only subdued by a very few that agree together; but also when there is no common enemy, they make war upon each other, for their particular interests. For if we could suppose a great multitude of men to consent in the observation of justice, and other Laws of Nature, without a common power to keep them all in awe; we might as well suppose all mankind to do the same; and then there neither would be, or need to be any civil government, or Commonwealth at all; because there would be peace without subjection.

Nor is it enough for the security, which men desire should last all the time of their life, that they be governed, and directed by one judgment, for a limited time; as in one battle, or one war. For though they obtain a victory by their unanimous endeavour against a foreign enemy; yet afterwards, when either they have no common enemy, or he that by one part is held for an enemy, is by another part held for a friend, they must needs by the difference of their interests dissolve, and fall again into a war amongst themselves.

It is true that certain living creatures, as bees, and ants, live sociably one with another (which are therefore by Aristotle numbered amongst political creatures), and yet have no other direction, than their particular judgments and appetites; nor speech, whereby one of them can signify to another, what he thinks expedient for the common benefit: and therefore some man may perhaps desire to know, why mankind cannot do the same. To which I answer,

First, that men are continually in competition for honour and dignity, which these creatures are not; and consequently amongst men there ariseth on that ground, envy and hatred, and finally war; but amongst these not so.

Secondly, that amongst these creatures, the common good differeth not from the private; and being by nature inclined to their private, they procure thereby the common benefit. But man, whose joy consisteth in comparing himself with other men, can relish nothing but what is eminent.

Thirdly, that these creatures, having not (as man) the use of reason, do not see, nor think they see any fault, in the administration of their common business: whereas amongst men, there are very many that think themselves wiser, and abler to govern the public, better than the rest; and these strive to reform and innovate, one this way, another that way; and thereby bring it into distraction and civil war.

Fourthly, that these creatures, though they have some use of voice, in making known to one another their desires and other affections; yet they want that art of words, by which some men can represent to others that which is good, in the likeness of evil; and evil, in the likeness of good; and augment, or diminish the apparent greatness of good and evil; discontenting men, and troubling their peace at their pleasure.

Fifthly, irrational creatures cannot distinguish between injury, and damage; and therefore as long as they be at ease, they are not offended with their fellows: whereas man is then most troublesome, when he is most at ease: for then it is that he loves to show his wisdom, and control the actions of them that govern the Commonwealth.

Lastly, the agreement of these creatures is natural; that of men, is by covenant only, which is artificial: and therefore it is no wonder if there be somewhat else required (besides covenant) to make their agreement constant and lasting; which is a common power, to keep them in awe, and to direct their actions to the common benefit.

The only way to erect such a common power, as may be able to defend them from the invasion of foreigners, and the injuries of one another, and thereby to secure them in such sort, as that by their own industry and by the fruits of the earth, they may nourish themselves and live contentedly; is, to confer all their power and strength upon one man, or upon one assembly of men, that may reduce all their wills, by plurality of voices, unto one will: which is as much as to say, to appoint one man, or assembly of men, to bear their person;[1] and everyone to own, and acknowledge himself to be author of whatsoever he that so beareth their person, shall act, or cause to be acted, in those things which concern the common peace and safety; and therein to submit their wills, everyone to his will, and their judgments, to his judgment. This is more than consent, or concord; it is a real unity of them all, in one and the same person, made by covenant of every man with every man, in such manner, as if every man should say to every man, "I authorize and give up my right of governing myself, to this man, or to this assembly of men, on this condition, that thou give up thy right to him, and authorize all his actions in like manner." This done, the multitude so united in one person is called a Commonwealth, in Latin Civitas. This is the generation of that great Leviathan, or rather (to speak more reverently) of that mortal God, to which we owe under the immortal God, our peace and defence. For by this authority, given him by every particular man in the Commonwealth, he hath the use of so much power and strength conferred on him, that by terror thereof, he is enabled to conform the wills of them all, to peace at home, and mutual aid against their enemies abroad. And in him consisteth the essence of the Commonwealth; which (to define it) is one person, of whose acts a great multitude, by mutual covenants one with another, have made themselves every one the author, to the end he may use the strength and means of them all, as he shall think expedient, for their peace and common defence.

And he that carryeth this person, is called sovereign, and said to have sovereign power; and everyone besides, his subject.

The attaining to this sovereign power, is by two ways. One, by natural force; as when a man maketh his children to submit themselves and their children to his government, as being able to destroy them if they refuse; or by war subdueth his enemies to his will, giving them their lives on that condition. The other, is when men agree amongst themselves, to submit to some man, or assembly of men, voluntarily, on confidence to be protected by him against all others. This latter, may be called a political Commonwealth, or Commonwealth by institution; and the former, a Commonwealth by acquisition. And first, I shall speak of a Commonwealth by institution.

CHAPTER XVIII
Of the Rights of Sovereigns by Institution

A Commonwealth is said to be instituted, when a multitude of men do agree, and covenant, everyone, with everyone, that to whatsoever man, or assembly of men, shall be given by the major part the right to present the person of them all (that is to say, to be their representative), every one, as well he that voted for it, as he that voted against it, shall authorize all the actions and judgments of that man, or assembly of men, in the same manner, as if they were his own, to the end, to live peaceably amongst themselves, and be protected against other men.

From this institution of a Commonwealth are derived all the rights and faculties of him, or them, on whom the sovereign power is conferred by the consent of the people assembled.

First, because they covenant, it is to be understood, they are not obliged by former covenant to anything repugnant hereunto. And consequently they that have already instituted a Commonwealth, being thereby bound by covenant, to own the actions and judgments of one, cannot lawfully make a new covenant amongst themselves, to be obedient to any other, in anything whatsoever, without his permission. And therefore, they that are subjects to a monarch, cannot without his leave cast off monarchy, and return to the confusion of a disunited multitude; nor transfer their person from him that beareth it, to another man, or other assembly of men: for they are bound, every man to every man, to own, and be reputed author of all, that he that already is their sovereign, shall do, and judge fit to be done: so that any one man dissenting, all the rest should break their covenant made to that man, which is injustice: and they have also every man given the sovereignty to him that beareth their person; and therefore if they depose him, they take from him that which is his own, and so again it is injustice. Besides, if he that attempteth to depose his sovereign be killed, or punished by him for such attempt, he is author of his own punishment, as being by the institution, author of all his sovereign shall do: And because it is injustice for a man to do anything for which he may be punished by his own authority, he is also upon that title, unjust. And whereas some men have pretended for their disobedience to their sovereign, a new covenant, made, not with men, but with God; this also is unjust: for there is no covenant with God, but by mediation of somebody that representeth God's person; which none doth but God's Lieutenant, who hath the sovereignty under God. But this pretence of covenant with God is so evident a lie, even in the pretenders' own consciences, that it is not only an act of an unjust, but also of a vile, and unmanly disposition.

Secondly, because the right of bearing the person of them all is given to him they make sovereign, by covenant only of one to another, and not of him to any of them; there can happen no breach of covenant on the part of the sovereign; and consequently none of his subjects, by any pretence of forfeiture, can be freed from his subjection. That he which is made sovereign maketh no covenant with his subjects beforehand, is manifest; because either he must make it with the whole multitude, as one party to the covenant; or he must make a several covenant with every man. With the whole, as one party, it is impossible; because as yet they are not one person: and if he make so many several covenants as there be men, those covenants after he hath the sovereignty are void, because what act soever can be pretended by anyone of them for breach thereof, is the act both of himself, and of all the rest, because done in the person, and by the right of everyone of them in particular. Besides, if any one, or more of them, pretend a breach of the covenant made by the sovereign at his institution; and others, or one other of his subjects, or himself alone, pretend there was no such breach, there is in this case, no judge to decide the controversy: it returns therefore to the sword again; and every man recovereth the right of protecting himself by his own strength, contrary to the design they had in the institution. It is therefore in vain to grant sovereignty by way of precedent covenant. The opinion that any monarch receiveth his power by covenant, that is to say on condition, proceedeth from want of understanding this easy truth, that covenants being but words, and breath, have no force to oblige, contain, constrain, or protect any man, but what it has from the public sword; that is, from the untied hands of that man, or assembly of men that hath the sovereignty, and whose actions are avouched by them all, and performed by the strength of them all, in him united. But when an assembly of men is made sovereign; then no man imagineth any such covenant to have passed in the institution; for no man is so dull as to say, for example, the people of Rome made a covenant with the Romans, to hold the sovereignty on such or such conditions; which not performed, the Romans might lawfully depose the Roman people. That people see not the reason to be alike in a monarchy, and in a popular government, proceedeth from the ambition of some, that are kinder to the government of an assembly, whereof they may hope to participate, than of monarchy, which they despair to enjoy.

Thirdly, because the major part hath by consenting voices declared a sovereign; he that dissented must now consent with the rest; that is, be contented to avow all the actions he shall do, or else justly be destroyed by the rest. For if he voluntarily entered into the congregation of them that were assembled, he sufficiently declared thereby his will (and therefore tacitly covenanted) to stand to what the major part should ordain: and therefore if he refuse to stand thereto, or make protestation against any of their decrees, he does contrary to his covenant, and therefore unjustly. And whether he be of the congregation, or not; and whether his consent be asked, or not, he must either submit to their decrees, or be left in the condition of war he was in before; wherein he might without injustice be destroyed by any man whatsoever.

Fourthly, because every subject is by this institution author of all the actions, and judgments of the sovereign instituted; it follows, that whatsoever he doth, it can be no injury to any of his subjects; nor ought he to be by any of them accused of injustice. For he that doth anything by authority from another, doth therein no injury to him by whose authority he acteth: But by this institution of a Commonwealth, every particular man is author of all the sovereign doth; and consequently he that complaineth of injury from his sovereign, complaineth of that whereof he himself is author; and therefore ought not to accuse any man but himself; no nor himself of injury; because to do injury to one's self, is impossible. It is true that they that have sovereign power, may commit iniquity; but not injustice, or injury in the proper signification.

Fifthly, and consequently to that which was said last, no man that hath sovereign power can justly be put to death, or otherwise in any manner by his subjects punished. For seeing every subject is author of the actions of his sovereign; he punisheth another, for the actions committed by himself.

And because the end of this institution is the peace and defence of them all; and whosoever has right to the end, has right to the means; it belongeth of right, to whatsoever man, or assembly that hath the sovereignty, to be judge both of the means of peace and defence; and also of the hindrances, and disturbances of the same; and to do whatsoever he shall think necessary to be done, both before hand, for the preserving of peace and security, by prevention of discord at home, and hostility from abroad; and, when peace and security are lost, for the recovery of the same. And therefore,

Sixthly, it is annexed to the sovereignty to be judge of what opinions and doctrines are averse, and what conducing to peace; and consequently, on what occasions, how far, and what, men are to be trusted withal, in speaking to multitudes of people; and who shall examine the doctrines of all books before they be published. For the actions of men proceed from their opinions; and in the well governing of opinions, consisteth the well governing of men's actions, in order to their peace, and concord. And though in matter of doctrine, nothing ought to be regarded but the truth; yet this is not repugnant to regulating of the same by peace. For doctrine repugnant to peace can no more be true, than peace and concord can be against the Law of Nature. It is true, that in a Commonwealth, where by the negligence, or unskilfulness of governors, and teachers, false doctrines are by time generally received; the contrary truths may be generally offensive: Yet the most sudden, and rough bustling in of a new truth, that can be, does never break the peace, but only sometimes awake the war. For those men that are so remissly governed that they dare take up arms, to defend, or introduce an opinion, are still in war; and their condition not peace, but only a cessation of arms for fear of one another; and they live as it were, in the precincts of battle continually. It belongeth therefore to him that hath the sovereign power, to be judge, or constitute all judges of opinions and doctrines, as a thing necessary to peace; thereby to prevent discord and civil war.

Seventhly, is annexed to the sovereign the whole power of prescribing the rules, whereby every man may know what goods he may enjoy, and what actions he may do, without being molested by any of his fellow subjects: And this is it men call propriety. For before constitution of sovereign power (as hath already been shown) all men had right to all things; which necessarily causeth war: and therefore this propriety, being necessary to peace, and depending on sovereign power, is the act of that power, in order to the public peace. These rules of propriety (or Meum and Tuum [mine and thine]) and of good, evil, lawful, and unlawful in the actions of subjects, are the civil laws; that is to say, the laws of each Commonwealth in particular; though the name of civil law be now restrained to the ancient civil laws of the city of Rome; which being the head of a great part of the world, her laws at that time were in these parts the civil law.

Eighthly, is annexed to the sovereignty the right of judicature; that is to say, of hearing and deciding all controversies which may arise concerning law, either civil, or natural, or concerning fact. For without the decision of controversies, there is no protection of one subject against the injuries of another; the laws concerning Meum and Tuum are in vain; and to every man remaineth, from the natural and necessary appetite of his own conservation, the right of protecting himself by his private strength, which is the condition of war; and contrary to the end for which every Commonwealth is instituted.

Ninthly, is annexed to the sovereignty the right of making war and peace with other nations, and Commonwealths; that is to say, of judging when it is for the public good, and how great forces are to be assembled, armed, and paid for that end; and to levy money upon the subjects, to defray the expenses thereof. For the power by which the people are to be defended consisteth in their armies; and the strength of an army, in the union of their strength under one command; which command the sovereign instituted, therefore hath; because the command of the militia, without other institution, maketh him that hath it sovereign. And therefore whosoever is made general of an army, he that hath the sovereign power is always generalissimo.

Tenthly, is annexed to the sovereignty the choosing of all counsellors, ministers, magistrates, and officers, both in peace, and war. For seeing the sovereign is charged with the end, which is the common peace and defence; he is understood to have power to use such means, as he shall think most fit for his discharge.

Eleventhly, to the sovereign is committed the power of rewarding with riches, or honour; and of punishing with corporal, or pecuniary punishment, or with ignominy every subject according to the law he hath formerly made; or if there be no law made, according as he shall judge most to conduce to the encouraging of men to serve the Commonwealth, or deterring of them from doing disservice to the same.

Lastly, considering what values men are naturally apt to set upon themselves; what respect they look for from others; and how little they value other men; from whence continually arise amongst them emulation, quarrels, factions, and at last war, to the destroying of one another, and diminution of their strength against a common enemy; it is necessary that there be laws of honour, and a public rate of the worth of such men as have deserved, or are able to deserve well of the Commonwealth; and that there be force in the hands of some or other, to put those laws in execution. But it hath already been shown, that not only the whole militia, or forces of the Commonwealth; but also the judicature of all controversies is annexed to the sovereignty. To the sovereign therefore it belongeth also to give titles of honour; and to appoint what order of place and dignity each man shall hold; and what signs of respect, in public or private meetings, they shall give to one another.

These are the rights which make the essence of sovereignty; and which are the marks whereby a man may discern in what man, or assembly of men, the sovereign power is placed, and resideth. For these are incommunicable, and inseparable. The power to coin money; to dispose of the estate and persons of infant heirs; to have preemption in markets; and all other statute prerogatives, may be transferred by the sovereign; and yet the power to protect his subjects be retained. But if he transfer the militia, he retains the judicature in vain, for want of execution of the laws: Or if he grant away the power of raising money, the militia is in vain: or if he give away the government of doctrines, men will be frighted into rebellion with the fear of spirits. And so if we consider any one of the said rights, we shall presently see that the holding of all the rest will produce no effect in the conservation of peace and justice, the end for which all Commonwealths are instituted. And this division is it, whereof it is said, "a Kingdom divided in itself cannot stand":[1] For unless this division precede, division into opposite armies can never happen. If there had not first been an opinion received of the greatest part of England, that these powers were divided between the King, and the Lords, and the House of Commons, the people had never been divided, and fallen into this civil war; first between those that disagreed in politics; and after between the dissenters about the liberty of religion; which have so instructed men in this point of sovereign right, that there be few now (in England) that do not see, that these rights are inseparable, and will be so generally acknowledged, at the next return of peace; and so continue, till their miseries are forgotten; and no longer, except the vulgar be better taught than they have hitherto been.

[1] Matthew 12:25; Mark 3:24; Luke 11:17.

And because they are essential and inseparable rights, it follows necessarily, that in whatsoever words any of them seem to be granted away, yet if the sovereign power itself be not in direct terms renounced, and the name of sovereign no more given by the grantees to him that grants them, the grant is void: for when he has granted all he can, if we grant back the sovereignty, all is restored, as inseparably annexed thereunto.

This great authority being indivisible, and inseparably annexed to the sovereignty, there is little ground for the opinion of them, that say of sovereign kings, though they be singulis majores, of greater power than every one of their subjects, yet they be universis minores, of less power than them all together. For if by all together, they mean not the collective body as one person, then all together, and every one, signify the same; and the speech is absurd. But if by all together, they understand them as one person (whose person the sovereign bears), then the power of all together is the same with the sovereign's power; and so again the speech is absurd: which absurdity they see well enough, when the sovereignty is in an assembly of the people; but in a monarch they see it not; and yet the power of sovereignty is the same in whomsoever it be placed.

And as the power, so also the honour of the sovereign, ought to be greater, than that of any, or all the subjects. For in the sovereignty is the fountain of honour. The dignities of Lord, Earl, Duke, and Prince are his creatures. As in the presence of the master, the servants are equal, and without any honour at all; so are the subjects, in the presence of the sovereign. And though they shine some more, some less, when they are out of his sight; yet in his presence, they shine no more than the stars in presence of the sun.

But a man may here object, that the condition of subjects is very miserable; as being obnoxious to the lusts, and other irregular passions of him, or them that have so unlimited a power in their hands. And commonly they that live under a monarch, think it the fault of monarchy; and they that live under the government of democracy, or other sovereign assembly, attribute all the inconvenience to that form of Commonwealth; whereas the power in all forms, if they be perfect enough to protect them, is the same; not considering that the estate of man can never be without some incommodity or other; and that the greatest, that in any form of government can possibly happen to the people in general, is scarce sensible, in respect of the miseries, and horrible calamities, that accompany a civil war; or that dissolute condition of masterless men, without subjection to laws, and a coercive power to tie their hands from rapine, and revenge: nor considering that the greatest pressure of sovereign governors proceedeth not from any delight, or profit they can expect in the damage, or weakening of their subjects, in whose vigor consisteth their own strength and glory; but in the restiveness of themselves, that unwillingly contributing to their own defence, make it necessary for their governors to draw from them what they can in time of peace, that they may have means on any emergent occasion, or sudden need, to resist, or take advantage of their enemies. For all men are by nature provided of notable multiplying glasses (that is their passions and self-love), through which every little payment appeareth a great grievance; but are destitute of those prospective glasses (namely moral and civil science), to see afar off the miseries that hang over them, and cannot without such payments be avoided.

CHAPTER XIX

Of the Several Kinds of Commonwealth by Institution, and of Succession to the Sovereign Power

The difference of Commonwealths consisteth in the difference of the sovereign, or the person representative of all and every one of the multitude. And because the sovereignty is either in one man, or in an assembly of more than one; and into that assembly either every man hath right to enter, or not every one, but certain men distinguished from the rest; it is manifest, there can be but three kinds of Commonwealth. For the representative must needs be one man, or more: and if more, then it is the assembly of all, or but of a part. When the representative is one man, then is the Commonwealth a monarchy: when an assembly of all that will come together, then it is a democracy, or popular Commonwealth: when an assembly of a part only, then it is called an aristocracy. Other kind of Commonwealth there can be none: for either one, or more, or all, must have the sovereign power (which I have shown to be indivisible) entire.

There be other names of government in the histories, and books of policy, as tyranny, and oligarchy: But they are not the names of other forms of government, but of the same forms misliked. For they that are discontented under monarchy, call it tyranny; and they that are displeased with aristocracy, called it oligarchy: So also, they which find themselves grieved under a democracy, call it anarchy (which signifies want of government), and yet I think no man believes that want of government is any new kind of government: nor by the same reason ought they to believe, that the government is of one kind, when they like it, and another, when they mislike it, or are oppressed by the governors.

It is manifest, that men who are in absolute liberty, may, if they please, give authority to one man, to represent them every one; as well as give such authority to any assembly of men whatsoever; and consequently may subject themselves, if they think good, to a monarch, as absolutely, as to any other representative. Therefore, where there is already erected a sovereign power, there can be no other representative of the same people, but only to certain particular ends, by the sovereign limited. For that were to erect two sovereigns; and every man to have his person represented by two actors, that by opposing one another must needs divide that power, which (if men will live in peace) is indivisible; and thereby reduce the multitude into the condition of war, contrary to the end for which all sovereignty is instituted. And therefore as it is absurd to think that a sovereign assembly, inviting the people of their dominion, to send up their deputies, with power to make known their advice, or desires, should therefore hold such deputies, rather than themselves, for the absolute representative of the people: so it is absurd also, to think the same in a monarchy. And I know not how this so manifest a truth, should of late be so little observed; that in a monarchy, he that had the sovereignty from a descent of 600 years, was alone called sovereign, had the title of majesty from every one of his subjects, and was unquestionably taken by them for their king, was notwithstanding never considered as their representative; that name without contradiction passing for the title of those men, which at his command were sent up by the people to carry their petitions, and give him (if he permitted it) their advice. Which may serve as an admonition, for those that are the true, and absolute representative of a people, to instruct men in the nature of that office, and to take heed how they admit of any other general representation upon any occasion whatsoever, if they mean to discharge the trust committed to them.

The difference between these three kinds of Commonwealth consisteth not in the difference of power; but in the difference of convenience, or aptitude to produce the peace, and security of the people; for which end they were instituted. And to compare monarchy with the other two, we may observe; first, that whosoever beareth the person of the people, or is one of that assembly that bears it, beareth also his own natural person. And though he be careful in his politic person to procure the common interest; yet he is more, or no less careful to procure the private good of himself, his family, kindred and friends; and for the most part, if the public interest chance to cross the private, he prefers the private: for the passions of men are commonly more potent than their reason. From whence it follows, that where the public and private interest are most closely united, there is the public most advanced. Now in monarchy, the private interest is the same with the public. The riches, power, and honour of a monarch arise only from the riches, strength and reputation of his subjects. For no king can be rich, nor glorious, nor secure; whose subjects are either poor, or contemptible, or too weak through want, or dissension, to maintain a war against their enemies: Whereas in a democracy, or aristocracy, the public prosperity confers not so much to the private fortune of one that is corrupt, or ambitious, as doth many times a perfidious advice, a treacherous action, or a civil war.

Secondly, that a monarch receiveth counsel of whom, when, and where he pleaseth; and consequently may hear the opinion of men versed in the matter about which he deliberates, of what rank or quality soever, and as long before the time of action, and with as much secrecy, as he will. But when a sovereign assembly has need of counsel, none are admitted but such as have a right thereto from the beginning; which for the most part are of those who have been versed more in the acquisition of wealth than of knowledge; and are to give their advice in long discourses, which may, and do commonly excite men to action, but not govern them in it. For the understanding is by the flame of the passions, never enlightened, but dazzled: Nor is there any place, or time, wherein an assembly can receive counsel with secrecy, because of their own multitude.

Thirdly, that the resolutions of a monarch, are subject to no other inconstancy, than that of human nature; but in assemblies, besides that of nature, there ariseth an inconstancy from the number. For the absence of a few, that would have the resolution once taken, continue firm (which may happen by security, negligence, or private impediments), or the diligent appearance of a few of the contrary opinion, undoes today, all that was concluded yesterday.

Fourthly, that a monarch cannot disagree with himself, out of envy, or interest; but an assembly may; and that to such a height, as may produce a civil war.

Fifthly, that in monarchy there is this inconvenience; that any subject, by the power of one man, for the enriching of a favourite or flatterer, may be deprived of all he possesseth; which I confess is a great and inevitable inconvenience. But the same may as well happen, where the sovereign power is in an assembly: For their power is the same; and they are as subject to evil counsel, and to be seduced by orators, as a monarch by flatterers; and becoming one another's flatterers, serve one another's covetousness and ambition by turns. And whereas the favourites of monarchs, are few, and they have none else to advance but their own kindred; the favourites of an assembly, are many; and the kindred much more numerous, than of any monarch. Besides, there is no favourite of a monarch, which cannot as well succour his friends, as hurt his enemies: But orators, that is to say, favourites of sovereign assemblies, though they have great power to hurt, have little to save. For to accuse, requires less eloquence (such is man's nature) than to excuse; and condemnation, than absolution more resembles justice.

Sixthly, that it is an inconvenience in monarchy, that the sovereignty may descend upon an infant, or one that cannot discern between good and evil: and consisteth in this, that the use of his power, must be in the hand of another man, or of some assembly of men, which are to govern by his right, and in his name; as curators, and protectors of his person, and authority. But to say there is inconvenience, in putting the use of the sovereign power, into the hand of a man, or an assembly of men; is to say that all government is more inconvenient, than confusion, and civil war. And therefore all the danger that can be pretended, must arise from the contention of those, that for an office of so great honour, and profit, may become competitors. To make it appear, that this inconvenience, proceedeth not from that form of government we call monarchy, we are to consider, that the precedent monarch, hath appointed who shall have the tuition of his infant successor, either expressly by testament, or tacitly, by not controlling the custom in that case received: And then such inconvenience (if it happen) is to be attributed, not to the monarchy, but to the ambition, and injustice of the subjects; which in all kinds of government, where the people are not well instructed in their duty, and the rights of sovereignty, is the same. Or else the precedent monarch, hath not at all taken order for such tuition; and then the Law of Nature hath provided this sufficient rule, That the tuition shall be in him, that hath by nature most interest in the preservation of the authority of the infant, and to whom least benefit can accrue by his death, or diminution. For seeing every man by nature seeketh his own benefit, and promotion; to put an infant into the power of those, that can promote themselves by his destruction, or damage, is not tuition, but treachery. So that sufficient provision being taken, against all just quarrel, about the government under a child, if any contention arise to the disturbance of the public peace, it is not to be attributed to the form of monarchy, but to the ambition of subjects, and ignorance of their duty. On the other side, there is no great Commonwealth, the sovereignty whereof is in a great assembly, which is not, as to consultations of peace, and war, and making of laws, in the same condition, as if the government were in a child. For as a child wants the judgment to dissent from counsel given him, and is thereby necessitated to take the advice of them, or him, to whom he is committed: So an assembly wanteth the liberty, to dissent from the counsel of the major part, be it good, or bad. And as a child has need of a tutor, or protector, to preserve his person, and authority: So also (in great Commonwealths) the sovereign assembly, in all great dangers and troubles, have need of Custodes libertatis; that is of dictators, or protectors of their authority; which are as much as temporary monarchs; to whom for a time, they may commit the entire exercise of their power; and have (at the end of that time) been oftener deprived thereof, than infant kings, by their protectors, regents, or any other tutors.

Though the kinds of sovereignty be, as I have now shown, but three; that is to say, monarchy, where one man has it; or democracy, where the general assembly of subjects hath it; or aristocracy, where it is an assembly of certain persons nominated, or otherwise distinguished from the rest: Yet he that shall consider the particular Commonwealths that have been, and are in the world, will not perhaps easily reduce them to three, and may thereby be inclined to think there be other forms, arising from these mingled together. As for example, elective kingdoms; where kings have the sovereign power put into their hands for a time; or kingdoms, wherein the king hath a power limited: which governments, are nevertheless by most writers called monarchy. Likewise if a popular, or aristocratical Commonwealth, subdue an enemy's country, and govern the same, by a president, procurator, or other magistrate; this may seem perhaps at first sight, to be a democratical, or aristocratical government. But it is not so. For elective kings are not sovereigns, but ministers of the sovereign; not limited kings, sovereigns, but ministers of them that have the sovereign power: Nor are those provinces which are in subjection to a democracy, or aristocracy of another Commonwealth, democratically or aristocratically governed, but monarchically.

And first, concerning an elective king, whose power is limited to his life, as it is in many places of Christendom at this day; or to certain years or months, as the dictator's power amongst the Romans; if he have right to appoint his successor, he is no more elective but hereditary. But if he have no power to elect his successor, then there is some other man, or assembly known, which after his decease may elect a new, or else the Commonwealth dieth, and dissolveth with him, and returneth to the condition of war. If it be known who have the power to give the sovereignty after his death, it is known also that the sovereignty was in them before: For none have right to give that which they have not right to possess, and keep to themselves, if they think good. But if there be none that can give the sovereignty, after the decease of him that was first elected; then has he power, nay he is obliged by the Law of Nature, to provide, by establishing his successor, to keep those that had trusted him with the government, from relapsing into the miserable condition of civil war. And consequently he was, when elected, a sovereign absolute.

Secondly, that king whose power is limited, is not superior to him, or them that have the power to limit it; and he that is not superior, is not supreme; that is to say not sovereign. The sovereignty therefore was always in that assembly which had the right to limit him; and by consequence the government not monarchy, but either democracy, or aristocracy; as of old time in Sparta; where the kings had a privilege to lead their armies; but the sovereignty was in the Ephori.[1]

Thirdly, whereas heretofore the Roman people, governed the land of Judea (for example) by a president; yet was not Judea therefore a democracy; because they were not governed by an assembly, into the which, any of them, had right to enter; nor by an aristocracy; because they were not governed by any assembly, into which, any man could enter by their election: but they were governed by one person, which though as to the people of Rome was an assembly of the people, or democracy; yet as to people of Judea, which had no right at all of participating in the government, was a monarch. For though where the people are governed by an assembly, chosen by themselves out of their own number, the government is called a democracy, or aristocracy; yet when they are governed by an assembly, not of their own choosing, 'tis a monarchy; not of one man, over another man; but of one people, over another people.

Of all these forms of government, the matter being mortal, so that not only monarchs, but also whole assemblies die, it is necessary for the conservation of the peace of men, that as there was order taken for an artificial man, so there be order also taken, for an artificial eternity of life; without which, men that are governed by an assembly, should return into the condition of war in every age; and they that are governed by one man, as soon as their governor dieth. This artificial eternity, is that which men call the Right of Succession.

There is no perfect form of government, where the disposing of the succession is not in the present sovereign. For if it be in any other particular man, or private assembly, it is in a person subject, and may be assumed by the sovereign at his pleasure; and consequently the right is in himself. And if it be in no particular man, but left to a new choice; then is the Commonwealth dissolved; and the right is in him that can get it; contrary to the intention of them that did institute the Commonwealth, for their perpetual, and not temporary security.

In a democracy, the whole assembly cannot fail, unless the multitude that are to be governed fail. And therefore questions of the right of succession, have in that form of government no place at all.

In an aristocracy, when any of the assembly dieth, the election of another into his room belongeth to the assembly, as the sovereign, to whom belongeth the choosing of all counsellors, and officers. For that which the representative doth, as actor, every one of the subjects doth, as author. And though the sovereign assembly, may give power to others, to elect new men, for supply of their court; yet it is still by their authority, that the election is made; and by the same it may (when the public shall require it) be recalled.

[1] Ephori the Spartan magistrates, who had the power to restrain the authority of the kings.

The greatest difficulty about the right of succession, is in monarchy: And the difficulty ariseth from this, that at first sight, it is not manifest who is to appoint the successor; nor many times, who it is whom he hath appointed. For in both these cases, there is required a more exact ratiocination, than every man is accustomed to use. As to the question, who shall appoint the successor, of a monarch that hath the sovereign authority; that is to say, who shall determine of the right of inheritance (for elective kings and princes have not the sovereign power in propriety, but in use only), we are to consider, that either he that is in possession, has right to dispose of the succession, or else that right is again in the dissolved multitude. For the death of him that hath the sovereign power in propriety, leaves the multitude without any sovereign at all; that is, without any representative in whom they should be united, and be capable of doing any one action at all: And therefore they are incapable of election of any new monarch; every man having equal right to submit himself to such as he thinks best able to protect him; or if he can, protect himself by his own sword; which is a return to confusion, and to the condition of a war of every man against every man, contrary to the end for which monarchy had its first institution. Therefore it is manifest, that by the institution of monarchy, the disposing of the successor, is always left to the judgment and will of the present possessor.

And for the question (which may arise sometimes) who it is that the monarch in possession, hath designed to the succession and inheritance of his power; it is determined by his express words, and testament; or by other tacit signs sufficient.

By express words, or testament, which it is declared by him in his life time, viva voce [with the living voice; orally], or by writing; as the first emperors of Rome declared who should be their heirs. For the word heir does not of itself imply the children, or nearest kindred of a man; but whomsoever a man shall any way declare, he would have to succeed him in his estate. If therefore a monarch declare expressly, that such a man shall be his heir, either by word or writing, then is that man immediately after the decease of his predecessor, invested in the right of being monarch.

But where testament, and express words are wanting, other natural signs of the will are to be allowed: whereof the one is custom. And therefore where the custom is, that the next of kindred absolutely succeedeth, there also the next of kindred hath right to the succession; for that, if the will of him that was in possession had been otherwise, he might easily have declared the same in his life time. And likewise where the custom is, that the next of the male kindred succeedeth, there also the right of succession is in the next of the kindred male, for the same reason. And so it is if the custom were to advance the female. For whatsoever custom a man may by a word control, and does not, it is a natural sign he would have that custom stand.

But where neither custom, nor testament hath preceded, there it is to be understood, first, that a monarch's will is, that the government remain monarchical; because he hath approved that government in himself. Secondly, that a child of his own, male, or female, be preferred before any other; because men are presumed to be more inclined by nature, to advance their own children, than the children of other men; and of their own, rather a male than a female; because men, are naturally fitter than women, for actions of labour and danger.

Thirdly, where his own issue faileth, rather a brother than a stranger; and so still the nearer in blood, rather than the more remote; because it is always presumed that the nearer of kin, is the nearer in affection; and 'tis evident that a man receives always, by reflection, the most honour from the greatness of his nearest kindred.

But if it be lawful for a monarch to dispose of the succession by words of contract, or testament, men may perhaps object a great inconvenience: for he may sell, or give his right of governing to a stranger; which, because strangers (that is, men not used to live under the same government, nor speaking the same language) do commonly undervalue one another, may turn to the oppression of his subjects; which is indeed a great inconvenience: but it proceedeth not necessarily from the subjection to a stranger's government, but from the unskilfulness of the governors, ignorant of the true rules of politics. And therefore the Romans when they had subdued many nations, to make their government digestible, were wont to take away that grievance, as much as they thought necessary, by giving sometimes to whole nations, and sometimes to principal men of every nation they conquered, not only the privileges, but also the name of Romans; and took many of them into the Senate, and offices of charge, in the Roman city. And this was it our most wise King James aimed at, in endeavouring the union of his two realms of England and Scotland. Which if he could have obtained, had in all likelihood prevented the civil wars, which make both those kingdoms, at this present, miserable. It is not therefore any injury to the people, for a monarch to dispose of the succession by will; though by the fault of many princes, it hath been sometimes found inconvenient. Of the lawfulness of it, this also is an argument, that whatsoever inconvenience can arrive by giving a kingdom to a stranger, may arrive also by so marrying with strangers, as the Right of Succession may descend upon them: yet this by all men is accounted lawful.

CHAPTER XX

Of Dominion Paternal, and Despotical

. . . .

Dominion is acquired two ways; by generation, and by conquest. The right of dominion by generation, is that, which the parent hath over his children; and is called paternal. And is not so derived from the generation, as if therefore the parent had dominion over his child because he begat him; but from the child's consent, either express, or by other sufficient argument declared. For as to the generation, God hath ordained to man a helper; and there be always two that are equally parents: the dominion therefore over the child, should belong equally to both; and he be equally subject to both, which is impossible; for no man can obey two masters. And whereas some have attributed the dominion to the man only, as being of the more excellent sex; they misreckon in it. For there is not always that difference of strength, or prudence between the man and the woman, as that the right can be determined without war. In Commonwealths, this controversy is decided by the civil law: and for the most part (but not always), the sentence is in favour of the father; because for the most part Commonwealths have been erected by the fathers, not by the mothers of families. But the question lieth now in the state of mere nature; where there are supposed no laws of matrimony; no laws for the education of children; but the Law of Nature, and the natural inclination of the sexes one to another, and to their children. In this condition of mere nature, either the parents between themselves dispose of the dominion over the child by contract; or do not dispose thereof at all. If they dispose thereof, the right passeth according to the contract. We find in history that the Amazons contracted with the men of the neighbouring countries, to whom they had recourse for issue, that the issue male should be sent back, but the female remain with themselves: so that the dominion of the females was in the mother.

If there be no contract, the dominion is in the mother. For in the condition of mere nature, where there are no matrimonial laws, it cannot be known who is the father, unless it be declared by the mother: and therefore the right of dominion over the child dependeth on her will, and is consequently hers. Again, seeing the infant is first in the power of the mother, so as she may either nourish, or expose it; if she nourish it, it oweth its life to the mother; and is therefore obliged to obey her, rather than any other; and by consequence the dominion over it is hers. But if she expose it, and another find, and nourish it, the dominion is in him that nourisheth it. For it ought to obey him by whom it is preserved; because preservation of life being the end, for which one man becomes subject to another, every man is supposed to promise obedience, to him, in whose power it is to save, or destroy him.

Dominion acquired by conquest, or victory in war, is that which some writers call despotical, from Δεσπότης, which signifieth a lord, or master; and is the dominion of the master over his servant. And this dominion is then acquired to the victor, when the vanquished, to avoid the present stroke of death, covenanteth either in express words, or by other sufficient signs of the will, that so long as his life, and the liberty of his body is allowed him, the victor shall have the use thereof, at his pleasure. And after such covenant made, the vanquished is a servant, and not before: for by the word servant (whether it be derived from servire, to serve, or from servare, to save, which I leave to grammarians to dispute) is not meant a captive, which is kept in prison, or bonds, till the owner of him that took him, or bought him of one that did, shall consider what to do with him (for such men (commonly called slaves), have no obligation at all; but may break their bonds, or the prison; and kill, or carry away captive their master, justly): but one, that being taken, hath corporal liberty allowed him; and upon promise not to run away, nor to do violence to his master, is trusted by him.

It is not therefore the victory that giveth the right of dominion over the vanquished, but his own covenant. Nor is he obliged because he is conquered; that is to say, beaten, and taken, or put to flight; but because he cometh in, and submitteth to the victor; nor is the victor obliged by an enemy's rendering himself (without promise of life), to spare him for this his yielding to discretion; which obliges not the victor longer, than in his own discretion he shall think fit.

The master of the servant, is master also of all he hath; and may exact the use thereof; that is to say, of his goods, of his labour, of his servants, and of his children, as often as he shall think fit. For he holdeth his life of his master, by the convenant of obedience; that is, of owning, and authorising whatsoever the master shall do. And in case the master, if he refuse, kill him, or cast him into bonds, or otherwise punish him for his disobedience, he is himself the author of the same; and cannot accuse him of injury.

In sum, the rights and consequences of both paternal and despotical dominion, are the very same with those of a sovereign by institution; and for the same reasons: which reasons are set down in the precedent chapter. So that for a man that is monarch of divers nations, whereof he hath, in one the sovereignty by institution of the people assembled, and in another by conquest, that is by the submission of each particular, to avoid death or bonds; to demand of one nation more than of the other, from the title of conquest, or as being a conquered nation, is an act of ignorance of the rights of sovereignty. For the sovereign is absolute over both alike; or else there is no sovereignty at all; and so every man may lawfully protect himself, if he can, with his own sword, which is the condition of war.

By this it appears, that a great family if it be not part of some Commonwealth, is of itself, as to the rights of sovereignty, a little monarchy; whether that family consist of a man and his children; or of a man and his servants; or of a man, and his children, and servants together: wherein the father or master is the sovereign. But yet a family is not properly a Commonwealth; unless it be of that power by its own number, or by other opportunities, as not to be subdued without the hazard of war. For where a number of men are manifestly too weak to defend themselves united, every one may use his own reason in time of danger, to save his own life, either by flight, or by submission to the enemy, as he shall think best; in the same manner as a very small company of soldiers, surprised by an army, may cast down their armies, and demand quarter, or run away, rather than be put to the sword. And thus much shall suffice; concerning what I find by speculation, and deduction, of sovereign rights, from the nature, need, and designs of men, in erecting of Commonwealths, and putting themselves under monarchs, or assemblies, entrusted with power enough for their protection.

So that it appeareth plainly, to my understanding, both from reason, and Scripture, that the sovereign power, whether placed in one man, as in monarchy, or in one assembly of men, as in popular, and aristocratical Commonwealths, is as great, as possibly men can be imagined to make it. And though of so unlimited a power, men may fancy many evil consequences, yet the consequences of the want of it, which is perpetual war of every man against his neighbour, are much worse. The condition of man in this life shall never be without inconveniences; but there happeneth in no Commonwealth any great inconvenience, but what proceeds from the subject's disobedience, and breach of those covenants, from which the Commonwealth hath its being. And whosoever thinking sovereign power too great, will seek to make it less; must subject himself, to the power, that can limit it; that is to say, to a greater.

The greatest objection is, that of the practise; when men ask, where, and when, such power has by subjects been acknowledged. But one may ask them again, when, or where has there been a kingdom long free from sedition and civil war. In those nations, whose Commonwealths have been long-lived, and not been destroyed, but by foreign war, the subjects never did dispute of the sovereign power. But howsoever, an argument from the practise of men, that have not sifted to the bottom, and with exact reason weighed the causes and nature of Commonwealths, and suffer daily those miseries that proceed from the ignorance thereof, is invalid. For though in all places of the world, men should lay the foundation of their houses on the sand, it could not thence be inferred, that so it ought to be. The skill of making and maintaining Commonwealths consisteth in certain rules, as doth arithmetic and geometry; not (as tennis-play) on practise only: which rules, neither poor men have the leisure, nor men that have had the leisure, have hitherto had the curiosity, or the method to find out.

Chapter XXI

Of the Liberty of Subjects

Liberty, or freedom, signifieth (properly) the absence of opposition (by opposition, I mean external impediments of motion); and may be applied no less to irrational, and inanimate creatures, than to rational. For whatsoever is so tied, or environed, as it cannot move, but within a certain space, which space is determined by the opposition of some external body, we say it hath not liberty to go further. And so of all living creatures, whilst they are imprisoned, or restrained, with walls, or chains; and of the water whilst it is kept in by banks, or vessels, that otherwise would spread itself into a larger space, we use to say, they are not at liberty, to move in such manner, as without those external impediments they would. But when the impediment of motion, is the constitution of the thing itself, we use not to say, it wants the liberty; but the power to move; as when a stone lieth still, or a man is fastened to his bed by sickness.

And according to this proper, and generally receiving meaning of the word, a free man, is he, that in those things, which by his strength and wit he is able to do, is not hindered to do what he has a will to.

But as men, for the attaining of peace, and conservation of themselves thereby, have made an artificial man, which we call a Commonwealth; so also have they made artificial chains, called Civil Laws, which they themselves, by mutual covenants, have fastened at one end, to the lips of that man, or assembly, to whom they have given the sovereign power; and at the other end to their own ears. These bonds in their own nature but weak, may nevertheless be made to hold, by the danger, though not by the difficulty of breaking them.

In relation to these bonds only it is, that I am to speak now, of the liberty of subjects. For seeing there is no Commonwealth in the world, wherein there be rules enough set down, for the regulating of all the actions, and words of men (as being a thing impossible), it followeth necessarily, that in all kinds of actions, by the laws pretermitted,[1] men have the liberty, of doing what their own reasons shall suggest, for the most profitable to themselves. For if we take liberty in the proper sense, for corporal liberty; that is to say, freedom from chains, and prison, it were very absurd for men to clamor as they do, for the liberty they so manifestly enjoy. Again, if we take liberty, for an exemption from laws, it is no less absurd, for men to demand as they do, that liberty, by which all other men may be masters of their lives. And yet as absurd as it is, this is it they demand; not knowing that the laws are of no power to protect them, without a sword in the hands of a man, or men, to cause those laws to be put in execution. The liberty of a subject, lieth therefore only in those things, which in regulating their actions, the sovereign hath pretermitted: such as is the liberty to buy, and sell, and otherwise contract with one another; to choose their own abode, their own diet, their own trade of life, and institute their children as they themselves think fit; and the like.

Nevertheless we are not to understand, that by such liberty, the sovereign power of life, and death, is either abolished, or limited. For it has been already shown, that nothing the sovereign representative can do to a subject, on what pretence soever, can properly be called injustice, or injury; because every subject is author of every act the sovereign doth; so that he never wanted right to anything, otherwise, than as he himself is the subject of God, and bound thereby to observe the laws of nature. And therefore it may, and doth often happen in Commonwealths, that a subject may be put to death, by the command of the sovereign power; and yet neither do the other wrong: As when Jeptha caused his daughter to be sacrificed [Judges 11:30–39]: In which, and the like cases, he that so dieth, had liberty to do the action, for which he is nevertheless, without injury put to death. And the same holdeth also in a sovereign prince, that putteth to death an innocent subject. For though the action be against the law of nature, as being contrary to equity (as was the killing of Uriah, by David), yet it was not an injury to Uriah; but to God. Not to Uriah, because the right to do what he pleased, was given him by Uriah himself: And yet to God, because David was God's subject; and prohibited all iniquity by the law of nature. Which distinction, David himself, when he repented the fact, evidently confirmed, saying, "To thee only have I sinned" [II Samuel 11:1–27, 12:1–13].

[1] pretermitted passed over, omitted, not mentioned (OED).

. . . .

But it is an easy thing, for men to be deceived, by the specious name of liberty; and for want of judgment to distinguish, mistake that for their private inheritance, and birthright, which is the right of the public only. And when the same error is confirmed by the authority of men in reputation for their writings in this subject, it is no wonder if it produce sedition, and change of government. In these western parts of the world, we are made to receive our opinions concerning the institution, and rights of Commonwealths, from Aristotle, Cicero, and other men, Greeks and Romans, that living under popular states, derived those rights, not from the principles of nature, but transcribed them into their books, out of the practise of their own Commonwealths, which were popular; as the grammarians describe the rules of language, out of the practise of the time; or the rules of poetry, out of the poems of Homer and Virgil. And because the Athenians were taught (to keep them from desire of changing their government), that they were free men, and all that lived under monarchy were slaves; therefore Aristotle puts it down in his Politics (lib.6, cap.2 [actually VI.i.6]), "In democracy, liberty is to be supposed: for 'tis commonly held, that no man is free in any other government." And as Aristotle; so Cicero, and other writers have grounded their civil doctrine, on the opinions of the Romans, who were taught to hate monarchy, at first, by them that having deposed their sovereign, shared amongst them the sovereignty of Rome; and afterwards by their successors. And by reading of these Greek, and Latin authors, men from their childhood have gotten a habit (under a false show of liberty) of favouring tumults, and of licentious controlling the actions of their sovereigns; and again of controlling those controllers, with the effusion of so much blood; as I think I may truly say, there was never anything so dearly bought, as these western parts have bought the learning of the Greek and Latin tongues.

To come now to the particulars of the true liberty of a subject; that is to say, what are the things, which though commanded by the sovereign, he may nevertheless, without injustice, refuse to do; we are to consider, what rights we pass away, when we make a Commonwealth; or (which is all one), what liberty we deny ourselves, by owning all the actions (without exception) of the man, or assembly we make our sovereign....

First therefore, seeing sovereignty by institution, is by covenant of everyone to everyone; and sovereignty by acquisition, by covenants of the vanquished to the victor, or child to the parent; it is manifest, that every subject has liberty in all those things, the right whereof cannot by covenant be transferred. I have shown before in the 14th Chapter, that covenants, not to defend a man's own body, are void. Therefore,

If the sovereign command a man (though justly condemned) to kill, wound, or maim himself; or not to resist those that assault him; or to abstain from the use of food, air, medicine, or any other thing, without which he cannot live; yet hath that man the liberty to disobey.

If a man be interrogated by the sovereign, or his authority, concerning a crime done by himself, he is not bound (without assurance of pardon) to confess it; because no man (as I have shown in the same Chapter) can be obliged by covenant to accuse himself.

To resist the sword of the Commonwealth, in defence of another man, guilty, or innocent, no man hath liberty; because such liberty, takes away from the sovereign, the means of protecting us; and is therefore destructive of the very essence of government. But in case a great many men together, have already resisted the sovereign power unjustly, or committed some capital crime, for which everyone of them expecteth death, whether have they not the liberty then to join together, and assist, and defend one another? Certainly they have: For they but defend their lives, which the guilty man may as well do, as the innocent. There was indeed injustice in the first breach of their duty; their bearing of arms subsequent to it, though it be to maintain what they have done, is no new unjust act. And if it be only to defend their persons, it is not unjust at all. But the offer of pardon taketh from them, to whom it is offered, the plea of self-defence, and maketh their perseverance in assisting, or defending the rest, unlawful.

As for other liberties, they depend on the silence of the law. In cases where the sovereign has prescribed no rule, there the subject hath the liberty to do, or forbear, according to his own discretion. And therefore such liberty is in some places more, and in some less; and in some times more, in other times less, according as they that have the sovereignty shall think most convenient. As for example, there was a time, when in England a man might enter in to his own land (and dispossess such as wrongfully possessed it), by force. But in after-times, that liberty of forcible entry, was taken away by a statute made (by the King) in Parliament. And in some places of the world, men have the liberty of many wives: in other places, such liberty is not allowed.

The obligation of subjects to the sovereign, is understood to last as long, and no longer, than the power lasteth, by which he is able to protect them. For the right men have by nature to protect themselves, when none else can protect them, can by no covenant be relinquished. The sovereignty is the soul of the Commonwealth; which once departed from the body, the members do no more receive their motion from it. The end of obedience is protection; which, wheresoever a man seeth it, either in his own, or in another's sword, nature applieth his obedience to it, and his endeavour to maintain it. And though sovereignty, in the intention of them that make it, be immortal; yet is it in its own nature, not only subject to violent death, by foreign war; but also through the ignorance, and passions of men, it hath in it, from the very institution, many seeds of natural mortality, by intestine discord.

CHAPTER XLVII
Of the Benefit that Proceedeth from such Darkness,[1] and to Whom it Accrueth.

Cicero maketh honorable mention of one of the Cassii, a severe judge amongst the Romans, for a custom he had in criminal causes (when the testimony of the witnesses was not sufficient), to ask the accusers, Cui bono [who stands to gain]; that is to say, what profit, honor, or other contentment, the accused obtained, or expected by the fact. For amongst presumptions, there is none that so evidently declareth the author, as doth the benefit of the action. By the same rule I intend in this place to examine, who they may be, that have possessed the people so long in this part of Christendom, with these doctrines, contrary to the peaceable societies of mankind.

And first, to this error, that the present Church now militant on earth, is the Kingdom of God (that is, the kingdom of glory, or the land of promise; not the kingdom of grace, which is but a promise of the land), are annexed these worldly benefits; first, that the pastors, and teachers of the church, are entitled thereby, as God's public ministers, to a right of governing the church; and consequently (because the church, and Commonwealth are the same persons) to be rectors, and governors of the Commonwealth. By this title it is, that the Pope prevailed with the subjects of all Christian princes, to believe, that to disobey him was to disobey Christ himself; and in all differences between him and other princes (charmed with the word Power Spiritual), to abandon their lawful sovereigns; which is in effect an universal monarch over all Christendom. For though they were first invested in the right of being supreme teachers of Christian doctrine, by, and under Christian emperors, within the limits of the Roman Empire (as it is acknowledged by themselves) by the title of Pontifex Maximus [supreme pontiff], who was an officer subject to the civil state; yet after the Empire was divided, and dissolved, it was not hard to obtrude upon the people already subject to them, under title, namely, the right of St. Peter; not only to save entire their pretended power; but also to extend the same over the same Christian provinces, though no more united in the Empire of Rome. This benefit of an universal monarch (considering the desire of men to bear rule), is a sufficient presumption, that the Popes that pretended to it, and for a long time enjoyed it, were the authors of the doctrine, by which it was obtained; namely, that the church now on earth, is the Kingdom of Christ. For that granted, it must be understood, that Christ hath some lieutenant amongst us, by whom we are to be told what are his commandments.

[1] The previous chapter is entitled "Of Darkness from Vain Philosophy, and Fabulous Traditions."

After that certain churches had renounced this universal power of the Pope, one would expect in reason, that the civil sovereigns in all those churches, should have recovered so much of it, as (before they had unadvisedly let it go), was their own right, and in their own hands. And in England it was so in effect; saving that they, by whom the kings administered the government of religion, by maintaining their employment to be in God's right, seemed to usurp, if not a supremacy, yet an independency on the civil power: and they but seemed to usurp it, in as much as they acknowledged a right in the king, to deprive them of the exercise of their functions at his pleasure.

But in those places where the presbytery took that office, though many other doctrines of the Church of Rome were forbidden to be taught; yet this doctrine, that the Kingdom of Christ is already come, and that it began at the Resurrection of our Saviour, was still retained. But cui bono? What profit did they expect from it? The same which the Popes expected: to have a sovereign power over the people. For what is it for men to excommunicate their lawful king, but to keep him from all places of God's public service in his own kingdom? and with force to resist him, when he with force endeavoureth to correct them? Or what is it, without authority from the civil sovereign, to excommunicate any person, but to take from him his lawful liberty, that is, to usurp an unlawful power over their brethren? The authors therefore of this darkness in religion, are the Roman, and the Presbyterian clergy.

To this head, I refer also all those doctrines, that serve them to keep the possession of this spiritual sovereignty after it is gotten. As first, that the Pope in his public capacity cannot err. For who is there, that believing this to be true, will not readily obey him in whatsoever he commands?

Secondly, that all other bishops, in what Commonwealth soever, have not their right, neither immediately from God, nor mediately from their civil sovereigns, but from the Pope, is a doctrine, by which there comes to be in every Christian Commonwealth many potent men (for so are bishops), that have their dependence on the Pope, and owe obedience to him, though he be a foreign prince; by which means he is able (as he hath done many times), to raise a civil war against the state that submits not itself to be governed according to his pleasure and interest.

Thirdly, the exemption of these, and of all other priests, and of all monks, and friars, from the power of the civil laws. For by this means, there is a great part of every Commonwealth, that enjoy the benefit of the laws, and are protected by the power of the civil state, which nevertheless pay no part of the public expense; nor are liable to the penalties, as other subjects, due to their crimes; and consequently, stand not in fear of any man, but the Pope; and adhere to him only, to uphold his universal monarchy.

Fourthly, the giving to their priests (which is no more in the New Testament but presbyters, that is, elders) the name of Sacerdotes, that is, sacrificers, which was the title of the civil sovereign, and his public ministers, amongst the Jews, whilst God was their King. Also, the making the Lord's supper a sacrifice, serveth to make the people believe the Pope hath the same power over all Christians, that Moses and Aaron had over the Jews; that is to say, all power, both civil and ecclesiastical, as the high priest then had.

Fifthly, the teaching that matrimony is a sacrament, giveth to the clergy the judging of the lawfulness of marriages; and thereby, of what children are legitimate; and consequently, of the right of succession to hereditary kingdoms.

Sixthly, the denial of marriage to priests, serveth to assure this power of the Pope over kings. For if a king be a priest, he cannot marry, and transmit his kingdom to his posterity; if he be not a priest then the Pope pretendeth this authority ecclesiastical over him, and over his people.

Seventhly, from auricular confession, they obtain, for the assurance of their power, better intelligence of the designs of princes, and great persons in the civil state, than these can have of the designs of the state ecclesiastical.

Eighthly, by the canonization of saints, and declaring who are martyrs, they assure their power, in that they induce simple men into an obstinacy against the laws and commands of their civil sovereigns even to death, if by the Pope's excommunication, they be declared heretics or enemies to the church; that is (as they interpret it), to the Pope.

Ninthly, they assure the same, by the power they ascribe to every priest, of making Christ; and by the power of ordaining penance; and of remitting, and retaining of sins.

Tenthly, by the doctrine of purgatory, of justification by external works, and of indulgences, the clergy is enriched.

Eleventhly, by their demonology, and the use of exorcism, and other things appertaining thereto, they keep (or think they keep) the people more in awe of their power.

Lastly, the metaphysics, ethics, and politics of Aristotle, the frivolous distinctions, barbarous terms, and obscure language of the schoolmen, taught in the universities (which have been all erected and regulated by the Pope's authority), serve them to keep these errors from being detected, and to make men mistake the ignis fatuus of vain philosophy, for the light of the gospel.

To these, if they sufficed not, might be added other of their dark doctrines, the profit whereof redoundeth manifestly, to the setting up of an unlawful power over the lawful sovereigns of Christian people; or for the sustaining of the same, when it is set up; or to the worldly riches, honour and authority of those that sustain it. And therefore by the aforesaid rule, of Cui bono, we may justly pronounce for the authors of all this spiritual darkness, the Pope, and Roman clergy; and all those besides that endeavour to settle in the minds of men this erroneous doctrine, that the church now on earth, is that Kingdom of God mentioned in the Old and New Testament.

But the emperors, and other Christian sovereigns, under whose government these errors, and the like encroachments of ecclesiastics upon their office, at first crept in, to the disturbance of their possessions, and of the tranquillity of their subjects, though they suffered the same for want of foresight of the sequel, and of insight into the designs of their teachers, may nevertheless be esteemed accessaries to their own, and the public damage: For without their authority there could at first no seditious doctrine have been publicly preached. I say they might have hindered the same in the beginning: But when the people were once possessed by those spiritual men, there was no human remedy to be applied, that any man could invent: And for the remedies that God should provide, who never faileth in his good time to destroy all the machinations of men against the truth, we are to attend his good pleasure, that suffereth many times the prosperity of his enemies, together with their ambition, to grow to such a height, as the violence thereof openeth the eyes, which the wariness of their predecessors had before sealed up, and makes men by too much grasping let go all, as Peter's net was broken, by the struggling of too great a multitude of fishes; whereas the impatience of those, that strive to resist such encroachment, before their subject's eyes were opened, did but increase the power they resisted. I do not therefore blame the Emperor Frederick for holding the stirrup to our countryman Pope Adrian;[1] for such was the disposition of his subjects then, as if he had not done it, he was not likely to have succeeded in the Empire: But I blame those, that in the beginning, when their power was entire, by suffering such doctrines to be forged in the universities of their own dominions, have holden the stirrup to all the succeeding Popes, whilst they mounted into the thrones of all Christian sovereigns, to ride, and tire, both them, and their people, at their pleasure.

But as the inventions of men are woven, so also are they ravelled out; the way is the same, but the order is inverted: The web begins at the first elements of power, which are wisdom, humility, sincerity, and other virtues of the Apostles, whom the people converted, obeyed, out of reverence, not by obligation: Their consciences were free, and their words and actions subject to none but the civil power. Afterwards the presbyters (as the flocks of Christ increased) assembling to consider what they should teach, and thereby obliging themselves to teach nothing against the decrees of their assemblies, made it to be thought the people were thereby obliged to follow their doctrine, and when they refused, refused to keep them company (that was then called excommunication), not as being infidels, but as being disobedient: And this was the first knot upon their liberty. And the number of presbyters increasing, the presbyters of the chief city of a province, got themselves an authority over the parochial presbyters, and appropriated to themselves the names of bishops: And this was a second knot on Christian liberty. Lastly, the Bishop of Rome, in regard of the imperial city, took upon him an authority (partly by the wills of the emperors themselves, and by the title of Pontifex Maximus, and at last when the emperors were grown weak, by the privileges of St. Peter) over all other bishops of the Empire: Which was the third and last knot, and the whole synthesis and construction of the pontifical power.

And therefore the analysis, or resolution is by the same way; but beginneth with the knot that was last tied; as we may see in the dissolution of the praetorpolitical church government in England.[2] First, the power of the Popes was dissolved totally by Queen Elizabeth; and the bishops, who before exercised their functions in right of the Pope, did afterwards exercise the same in right of the Queen and her successors; though by retaining the phrase of Jure Divino [divine right], they were thought to demand it by immediate right from God: And so was untied the first knot. After this, the Presbyterians lately in England obtained the putting down of Episcopacy: And so was the second knot dissolved: And almost at the same time, the power was taken also from the Presbyterians: And so we are reduced to the independency of the primitive Christians to follow Paul, or Cephas, or Apollos, every man as he liketh best: Which, if it be without contention, and without measuring the doctrine of Christ, by our affection to the person of his minister (the fault which the Apostle reprehended in the Corinthians),[1] is perhaps the best: First, because there ought to be no power over the consciences of men, but of the word itself, working faith in every one, not always according to the purpose of them that plant and water, but of God himself, that giveth the increase: and secondly, because it is unreasonable in them, who teach there is such danger in every little error, to require of a man endued with reason of his own, to follow the reason of any other man, or of the most voices of many other men; which is little better, than to venture his salvation at cross and pile.[2] Nor ought those teachers to be displeased with this loss of their ancient authority: For there is none should know better than they, that power is preserved by the same virtues by which it is acquired; that is to say, by wisdom, humility, clearness of doctrine, and sincerity of conversation; and not by suppression of the natural sciences, and of the morality of natural reason; nor by obscure language; nor by arrogating to themselves more knowledge than they make appear; nor by pious frauds; nor by such other faults, as in the pastors of God's church are not only faults, but also scandals, apt to make men stumble one time or other upon the suppression of their authority.

[1] Frederick I (ca. 1123–1190), German King and Holy Roman Emperor; Pope Adrian IV (ca. 1100–1159), the only English Pope, crowned Frederick Emperor on the condition that he maintain the superiority of Popes over Emperors.

[2] praetorpolitical "hierarchical-political" (a word possibly invented by Hobbes).

But after this doctrine, that the church now militant, is the Kingdom of God spoken of in the Old and New Testament, was received in the world; the ambition, and canvassing for the offices that belong thereunto, and especially for that great office of being Christ's lieutenant, and the pomp of them that obtained therein the principal public charges, became by degrees so evident, that they lost the inward reverence due to the pastoral function: in so much as the wisest men, of them that had any power in the civil state, needed nothing but the authority of the princes, to deny them any further obedience. For, from the time that the Bishop of Rome had gotten to be acknowledged for Bishop Universal, by pretence of succession to St. Peter, their whole hierarchy, or kingdom of darkness, may be compared not unfitly to the kingdom of fairies; that is, to the old wives' fables in England, concerning ghosts and spirits, and the feats they play in the night. And if a man consider the original of this great ecclesiastical dominion, he will easily perceive, that the papacy is no other than the ghost of the deceased Roman Empire, sitting crowned upon the grave thereof: For so did the papacy start up on a sudden out of the ruins of that heathen power.

The language also, which they use, both in the churches, and in their public acts, being Latin, which is not commonly used by any nation now in the world, what is it but the ghost of the old Roman language?

The fairies in what nation soever they converse, have but one universal king, which some poets of ours call King Oberon; but the Scripture calls Beelzebub, prince of demons. The ecclesiastics likewise, in whose dominions soever they be found, acknowledge but one universal king, the Pope.

[1] the apostle Paul, in I Corinthians 1:11 ff.

[2] cross and pile the obverse and reverse sides of a coin (OED pile sb^{4} 2); by "heads or tails."

The ecclesiastics are spiritual men, and ghostly fathers. The fairies are spirits, and ghosts. Fairies and ghosts inhabit darkness, solitudes, and graves. The ecclesiastics walk in obscurity of doctrine, in monasteries, churches, and churchyards.

The ecclesiastics have their cathedral churches; which, in what town soever they be erected, by virtue of holy water, and certain charms called exorcisms, have the power to make those towns, cities, that is to say, seats of empire. The fairies also have their enchanted castles, and certain gigantic ghosts, that domineer over the regions round about them.

The fairies are not to be seized on; and brought to answer for the hurt they do. So also the ecclesiastics vanish away from the tribunals of civil justice.

The ecclesiastics take from young men the use of reason, by certain charms compounded of metaphysics, and miracles, and traditions, and abused Scripture, whereby they are good for nothing else, but to execute what they command them. The fairies likewise are said to take young children out of their cradles, and to change them into natural fools, which common people do therefore call elves, and are apt to mischief.

In what shop, or operatory the fairies make their enchantment, the old wives have not determined. But the operatories of the clergy are well enough known to be the universities, that received their discipline from authority pontifical.

When the fairies are displeased with anybody, they are said to send their elves to pinch them. The ecclesiastics, when they are displeased with any civil state, make also their elves, that is, superstitious, enchanted subjects, to pinch their princes, by preaching sedition; or one prince enchanted with promises, to pinch another.

The fairies marry not; but there be amongst them incubi, that have copulation with flesh and blood. The priests also marry not.

The ecclesiastics take the cream of the land, by donations of ignorant men, that stand in awe of them, and by tithes: So also it is in the fable of fairies, that they enter into the dairies, and feast upon the cream, which they skim from the milk.

What kind of money is current in the kingdom of fairies, is not recorded in the story. But the ecclesiastics in their receipts accept of the same money that we do; though when they are to make any payment, it is in canonizations, indulgences, and masses.

To this, and such like resemblances between the papacy, and the kingdom of fairies, may be added this, that as the fairies have no existence, but in the fancies of ignorant people, rising from the traditions of old wives, or old poets: so the spiritual power of the Pope (without the bounds of his own civil dominion) consisteth only in the fear that seduced people stand in, of their excommunication; upon hearing of false miracles, false traditions, and false interpretations of the Scripture.

It was not therefore a very difficult matter, for Henry 8th by his exorcism; nor for Queen Elizabeth by hers, to cast them out. But who knows that this spirit of Rome, now gone out, and walking by missions through the dry places of China, Japan, and the Indies, that yield him little fruit, may not return, or rather an assembly of spirits worse than he, enter, and inhabit this clean swept house, and make the end thereof worse than the beginning? For it is not the Roman clergy only, that pretends the Kingdom of God to be of this world, and thereby to have a power therein, distinct from that of the civil state. And this is all I had a design to say, concerning the doctrine of the politics. Which when I have reviewed, I shall willingly expose it to the censure of my country.

A REVIEW, AND CONCLUSION

From the contrariety of some of the natural faculties of the mind, one to another, as also of one passion to another, and from their reference to conversation, there has been an argument taken, to infer an impossibility that any one man should be sufficiently disposed to all sorts of civil duty. The severity of judgment, they say, makes men censorious, and unapt to pardon the errors and infirmities of other men: and on the other side, celerity of fancy, makes the thoughts less steady than is necessary, to discern exactly between right and wrong. Again, in all deliberations, and in all pleadings, the faculty of solid reasoning, is necessary: for without it, the resolutions of men are rash, and their sentences unjust: and yet if there be not powerful eloquence, which procureth attention and consent, the effect of reason will be little. But these are contrary faculties; the former being grounded upon principles of truth; the other upon opinions already received, true, or false; and upon the passions and interests of men, which are different, and mutable.

And amongst the passions, courage (by which I mean the contempt of wounds, and violent death), inclineth men to private revenges, and sometimes to endeavour the unsettling of the public peace: And timorousness, many times disposeth to the desertion of the public defence. Both these they say cannot stand together in the same person.

And to consider the contrariety of men's opinions, and manners in general, it is they say, impossible to entertain a constant civil amity with all those, with whom the business of the world constrains us to converse: Which business, consisteth almost in nothing else but a perpetual contention for honor, riches, and authority.

To which I answer, that these are indeed great difficulties, but not impossibilities: For by education, and discipline, they may be, and are sometimes reconciled. Judgment, and fancy may have place in the same man; but by turns; as the end which he aimeth at requireth. As the Israelites in Egypt, were sometimes fastened to their labour of making bricks, and other times were ranging abroad to gather straw: So also may the judgment sometimes be fixed upon one certain consideration, and the fancy at another time wandering about the world. So also reason, and eloquence (though not perhaps in the natural sciences, yet in the moral) may stand very well together. For wheresoever there is place for adorning and preferring of error, there is much more place for adorning and preferring of truth, if they have it to adorn. Nor is there any repugnancy between fearing the laws, and not fearing a public enemy; nor between abstaining from injury, and pardoning it in others. There is therefore no such inconsistence of human nature, with civil duties, as some think. I have known clearness of judgment, and largeness of fancy; strength of reason, and graceful elocution; a courage for the war, and a fear for the laws, and all eminently in one man; and that was my most noble and honoured friend Mr. Sidney Godolphin; who hating no man, nor hated of any, was unfortunately slain in the beginning of the late civil war, in the public quarrel, by an undiscerned, and an undiscerning hand.

To the laws of nature, declared in the 15th Chapter, I would have this added, That every man is bound by nature, as much as in him lieth, to protect in war, the authority, by which he is himself protected in time of peace. For he that pretendeth a right of nature to preserve his own body, cannot pretend a right of nature to destroy him, by whose strength he is preserved: It is a manifest contradiction of himself. And though this law may be drawn by consequence, from some of those that are there already mentioned; yet the times require to have it inculcated, and remembered.

And because I find by divers English books lately printed, that the civil wars have not yet sufficiently taught men, in what point of time it is, that a subject becomes obliged to the conqueror; nor what is conquest; nor how it comes about, that it obliges men to obey his laws: Therefore for farther satisfaction of men therein, I say, the point of time, wherein a man becomes subject to a conqueror, is that point, wherein having liberty to submit to him, he consenteth, either by express words, or by other sufficient sign, to be his subject. When it is that a man hath the liberty to submit, I have showed before in the end of the 21st Chapter; namely, that for him that hath no obligation to his former sovereign but that of an ordinary subject, it is then, when the means of his life is within the guards and garrisons of the enemy; for it is then, that he hath no longer protection from him, but is protected by the adverse party for his contribution. Seeing therefore such contribution is everywhere, as a thing inevitable (not withstanding it be an assistance to the enemy), esteemed lawful; a total submission, which is but an assistance to the enemy, cannot be esteemed unlawful. Besides, if a man consider that they who submit, assist the enemy but with part of their estates, whereas they that refuse, assist him with the whole, there is no reason to call their submission, or composition an assistance; but rather a detriment to the enemy. But if a man, besides the obligation of a subject, hath taken upon him a new obligation of a soldier, then he hath not the liberty to submit to a new power, as long as the old one keeps the field, and giveth him means of subsistence, either in his armies, or garrisons: for in this case, he cannot complain of want of protection, and means to live as a soldier: But when that also fails, a soldier also may seek his protection wheresoever he has most hope to have it; and may lawfully submit himself to his new master. And so much for the time when he may do it lawfully, if he will. If therefore he do it, he is undoubtedly bound to be a true subject: For a contract lawfully made, cannot lawfully be broken.

By this also a man may understand, when it is, that men may be said to be conquered; and in what the nature of conquest, and the right of a conqueror consisteth: For this submission is it that implieth them all. Conquest, is not the victory itself; but the acquisition by victory, of a right, over the persons of men. He therefore that is slain, is overcome, but not conquered: He that is taken, and put into prison, or chains, is not conquered, though overcome; for he is still an enemy, and may save himself if he can: But he that upon promise of obedience, hath his life and liberty allowed him, is then conquered, and a subject; and not before. The Romans used to say, that their general had pacified such a province, that is to say, in English, conquered it; and that the country was pacified by victory, when the people of it had promised Imperata facere, that is, To do what the Roman people commanded them: this was to be conquered. But this promise may be either express, or tacit: Express, by promise: Tacit, by other signs. As for example, a man that hath not been called to make such an express promise (because he is one whose power perhaps is not considerable); yet if he live under their protection openly, he is understood to submit himself to the government: But if he live there secretly, he is liable to anything that may be done to a spy, and enemy of the state. I say not, he does any injustice (for acts of open hostility bear not that name); but that he may be justly put to death. Likewise, if a man, when his country is conquered, be out of it, he is not conquered, nor subject: but if at his return, he submit to the government, he is bound to obey it. So that conquest (to define it) is the acquiring of the right of sovereignty by victory. Which right, is acquired, in the people's submission, by which they contract with the victor, promising obedience, for life and liberty.

In the 29th Chapter I have set down for one of the causes of the dissolutions of Commonwealths, their imperfect generation, consisting in the want of an absolute and arbitrary legislative power; for want whereof, the civil sovereign is fain to handle the sword of justice unconstantly, and as if it were too hot for him to hold: One reason whereof (which I have not there mentioned) is this, That they will all of them justify the war, by which their power was at first gotten, and whereon (as they think) their right dependeth, and not on the possession. As if, for example, the right of the Kings of England did depend on the goodness of the cause of William the Conqueror, and upon their lineal, and directest descent from him; by which means, there would perhaps be no tie of the subject's obedience to their sovereign at this day in all the world: wherein whilst they needlessly think to justify themselves, they justify all the successful rebellions that ambition shall at any time after raise against them, and their successors. Therefore I put down for one of the most effectual seeds of the death of any state, that the conquerors require not only a submission of men's actions to them for the future, but also an approbation of all their actions past; when there is scarce a Commonwealth in the world, whose beginnings can in conscience be justified.

And because the name of tyranny, signifieth nothing more, nor less, than the name of sovereignty, be it in one, or many men, saving that they that use the former word, are understood to be angry with them they call tyrants; I think the toleration of a professed hatred of tyranny, is a toleration of hatred to Commonwealth in general, and another evil seed, not differing much from the former. For to the justification of the cause of a conqueror, the reproach of the cause of the conquered, is for the most part necessary: but neither of them necessary for the obligation of the conquered. And thus much I have thought fit to say upon the review of the first and second part of this discourse.

In the 35th Chapter, I have sufficiently declared out of the Scripture, that in the Commonwealth of the Jews, God himself was made the sovereign, by pact with the people; who were therefore called his Peculiar People,[1] to distinguish them from the rest of the world, over whom God reigned not by their consent, but by his own power: And that in this kingdom Moses was God's lieutenant on earth; and that it was he that told them what laws God appointed them to be ruled by. But I have omitted to set down who were the officers appointed to do execution; especially in capital punishments; not then thinking it a matter of so necessary consideration, as I find it since. We know that generally in all Commonwealths, the execution of corporeal punishments, was either put upon the guards, or other soldiers of the sovereign power; or given to those, in whom want of means, contempt of honour, and hardness of heart, concurred, to make them sue for such an office. But amongst the Israelites it was a positive law of God their sovereign, that he that was convicted of a capital crime, should be stoned to death by the people; and that the witnesses should cast the first stone, and after the witnesses, then the rest of the people. This was a law that designed who were to be the executioners; but not that any one should throw a stone at him before conviction and sentence, where the congregation was judge. The witnesses were nevertheless to be heard before they proceeded to execution, unless the fact were committed in the presence of the congregation itself, or in sight of the lawful judges; for then there needed no other witnesses but the judges themselves. Nevertheless, this manner of proceeding being not thoroughly understood, hath given occasion to a dangerous opinion, that any man may kill another, in some cases, by a right of zeal; as if the executions done upon offenders in the Kingdom of God in old time, proceeded not from the sovereign command, but from the authority of private zeal: which, if we consider the texts that seem to favour it, is quite contrary....

[1] his Peculiar People his particular or chosen people; see Deuteronomy 14:2, 26:18.

In the 36th Chapter I have said, that it is not declared in what manner God spake supernaturally to Moses: Not that he spake not to him sometimes by dreams and vision, and by a supernatural voice, as to other prophets: For the manner how he spake unto him from the mercy-seat, is expressly set down Numbers 7:89 in these words, "From that time forward, when Moses entered into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with God, he heard a voice which spake unto him from over the mercy-seat, which is over the ark of the testimony, from between the cherubims he spake unto him." But it is not declared in what consisted the preeminence of the manner of God's speaking to Moses, above that of his speaking to other prophets, as to Samuel, and to Abraham, to whom he also spake by a voice (that is, by vision), unless the difference consist in the clearness of the vision. For face to face, and mouth to mouth, cannot be literally understood of the infiniteness, and incomprehensibility of the divine nature.

And as to the whole doctrine, I see not yet, but the principles of it are true and proper; and the ratiocination solid. For I ground the civil right of sovereigns, and both the duty and liberty of subjects, upon the known natural inclinations of mankind, and upon the articles of the Law of Nature; of which no man, that pretends but reason enough to govern his private family, ought to be ignorant. And for the power ecclesiastical of the same sovereigns, I ground it on such texts, as are both evident in themselves, and consonant to the scope of the whole Scripture. And therefore am persuaded, that he that shall read it with a purpose only to be informed, shall be informed by it. But for those that by writing, or public discourse, or by their eminent actions, have already engaged themselves to the maintaining of contrary opinions, they will not be so easily satisfied. For in such cases, it is natural for men, at one and the same time, both to proceed in reading, and to lose their attention, in the search of objections to that they had read before: Of which, in a time wherein the interests of men are changed (seeing much of that doctrine, which serveth to the establishing of a new government, must needs be contrary to that which conduced to the dissolution of the old), there cannot choose but be very many.

In that part which treateth of a Christian Commonwealth, there are some new doctrines, which, it may be, in a state where the contrary were already fully determined, were a fault for a subject without leave to divulge, as being an usurpation of the place of a teacher. But in this time, that men call not only for peace, but also for truth, to offer such doctrine as I think true, and that manifestly tend to peace and loyalty, to the consideration of those that are yet in deliberation, is no more, but to offer new wine, to be put into new cask, that both may be preserved together. And I suppose, that then, when novelty can breed no trouble, nor disorder in a state, men are not generally so much inclined to the reverence of antiquity, as to prefer ancient errors, before new and well proved truth.

There is nothing I distrust more than my elocution; which nevertheless I am confident (excepting the mischances of the press) is not obscure. That I have neglected the ornament of quoting ancient poets, orators, and philosophers, contrary to the custom of late time (whether I have done well or ill in it), proceedeth from my judgment, grounded on many reasons. For first, all truth of doctrine dependeth either upon reason, or upon Scripture; both which give credit to many, but never receive it from any writer. Secondly, the matters in question are not of fact, but of right, wherein there is no place for witnesses. There is scarce any of those old writers, that contradicteth not sometimes both himself, and others; which makes their testimonies insufficient. Fourthly, such opinions as are taken only upon credit of antiquity, are not intrinsically the judgment of those that cite them, but words that pass (like gaping) from mouth to mouth. Fifthly, it is many times with a fraudulent design that men stick their corrupt doctrine with the cloves of other men's wit. Sixthly, I find not that the ancients they cite, took it for an ornament, to do the like with those that wrote before them. Seventhly, it is an argument of indigestion, when Greek and Latin sentences unchewed come up again, as they use to do, unchanged. Lastly, though I reverence those men of ancient time, that either have written truth perspicuously, or set us in a better way to find it out ourselves; yet to the antiquity itself I think nothing due: For if we will reverence the age, the present is the oldest. If the antiquity of the writer, I am not sure, that generally they to whom such honor is given, were more ancient when they wrote, than I am that am writing: But if it be well considered, the praise of ancient authors, proceeds not from the reverence of the dead, but from the competition, and mutual envy of the living.

To conclude, there is nothing in this whole discourse, nor in that I writ before of the same subject in Latin,[1] as far as I can perceive, contrary either to the word of God, or to good manners; or tending to the disturbance of the public tranquillity. Therefore I think it may be profitably printed, and more profitably taught in the universities, in case they also think so, to whom the judgment of the same belongeth. For seeing the universities are the fountains of civil, and moral doctrine, from whence the preachers, and the gentry, drawing such water as they find, use to sprinkle the same (both from the pulpit, and in their conversation) upon the people, there ought certainly to be great care taken, to have it pure, both from the venom of heathen politicians, and from the incantation of deceiving spirits. And by that means the most men, knowing their duties, will be the less subject to serve the ambition of a few discontented persons, in their purposes against the state; and be the less grieved with the contributions necessary for their peace, and defence; and the governors themselves have the lesser cause, to maintain at the common charge any greater army, than is necessary to make good the public liberty, against the invasions and encroachments of foreign enemies.

And thus I have brought to an end my discourse of civil and ecclesiastical government, occasioned by the disorders of the present time, without partiality, without application, and without other design, than to set before men's eyes the mutual relation between protection and obedience; of which the condition of human nature, and the laws divine (both natural and positive), require an inviolable observation. And though in the revolution of states, there can be no very good constellation for truths of this nature to be born under (as having an angry aspect from the dissolvers of an old government, and seeking but the backs of them that erect a new), yet I cannot think it will be condemned at this time, either by the public judge of doctrine, or by any that desires the continuance of public peace. And in this hope I return to my interrupted speculation of bodies natural;[2] wherein (if God give me health to finish it), I hope the novelty will as much please, as in the doctrine of this artificial body it useth to offend. For such truth, as opposeth no man's profit, nor pleasure, is to all men welcome.

[2] Hobbes believed that varieties of motion were the underlying cause of all things; his most extended development of this idea was in De Corpore (1655), which treated such subjects as geometry, physics, physiology, and animal psychology.

William Browne

?1590 – ?1645

Browne was the second son of Thomas Browne of Tavistock. William appears to have received his initial schooling at the grammar school in his native town before proceeding to Exeter College, Oxford. After leaving Oxford, without a degree, Browne continued his education at the Inns of Court. He married the daughter of Sir Thomas Eversfield of Den, near Horsham, and dedicated an epitaph to her after her death. Both sons of the marriage died in their infancy. In 1624 Browne returned to Exeter College, where he served as tutor to the Hon. Robert Dormer, and where he received the degree of Master of Arts in 1625. One source suggests that Browne then joined the household of the Herberts at Wilton, where he became wealthy and eventually purchased an estate. Our last record of Browne is of a letter sent from Dorking in 1640 to an acquaintance, and we do not know when or where he died.

Browne's first publication was an elegy on Prince Henry, published in 1613, the year after the prince's death. A line in his verse collection Britannia's Pastorals (1613) suggests that he also had written the first book of this work before he reached twenty years of age. The second book of the Pastorals was published in 1616, and the third book was not published in the poet's lifetime. The first two books include commendatory verses by a number of respected poets and dramatists including Ben Jonson and Michael Drayton. The second book is dedicated to William, Earl of Pembroke. In 1614 a number of Browne's eclogues were published in a work entitled The Shepherd's Pipe. This was followed by the Inner Temple Masque, a work on Ulysses and Circe. Browne also wrote a number of sonnets, epigrams and epitaphs.

On the Countess Dowager of Pembroke

Underneath this sable hearse
Lies the subject of all verse:
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother: [1]
Death, ere thou hast slain another,
Fair, and learn'd, and good as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.
Marble piles let no man raise
To her name, for after days;
Some kind woman born as she,
Reading this, like Niobe [2]
Shall turn marble, and become
Both her mourner and her tomb.

[1] Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother Mary Sidney, Sir Philip Sidney's sister, was the mother of William, Earl of Pembroke, Browne's patron.

[2] Niobe mythic mother of six sons and six daughters who boasted of her equality to Leto, the Titaness, who had only two children, Apollo and Artemis. Apollo and Artemis killed Niobe's children, and Niobe, wearied with shedding tears, turned into stone (OCD).

Lady Eleanor Davies

1590 – 1652

The prophetess Lady Eleanor Davies was the fifth daughter of Lucy Mervin and George Touchet, eleventh Baron Audeley and first Earl of Castlehaven. In 1609, she married Sir John Davies, the Attorney General for Ireland, by whom she bore three children. In 1623, Sir John purchased Englefield, a country estate in Berkshire. It was here on July 28, 1625 that Lady Eleanor first heard the voice of the prophet Daniel speaking to her "as through a trumpet." Soon after, she travelled to Oxford to deliver to Archbishop Abbot a tract in which she interpreted the book of Daniel. Thus began her career as the "Handmaid of the Holy Spirit." Lady Eleanor saw her maiden name as significant, since it lent itself to the prophetic anagram, "Eleanor Audelie: reveal o Daniel."

When her husband burned her prophetic writings, Lady Eleanor predicted that he would die within three years and began wearing mourning for him at dinner. When he died in 1626, Lady Eleanor married Sir Archibald Douglas, a Scottish captain who claimed to be the elder half-brother of Charles I. During the early years of their marriage, Lady Eleanor circulated at Court and proffered advice to the royal family on the Queen's fertility. She achieved national recognition when she correctly predicted the death in 1628 of the Duke of Buckingham.

Lady Eleanor's marriage to Douglas eventually proved unhappy. She believed that Douglas burned her papers to win royal favour and warned him that his act would not go unpunished. He was subsequently debilitated with a serious mental illness. Lady Eleanor also found herself at odds with the Court. When in 1633, she undertook to publish her political writings illicitly in Holland, she was harshly penalized. Officials did not take kindly to her comparison of Charles I to the biblical tyrant Belshazzar. Lady Eleanor was called before the Court of High Commission, fined £3000 and imprisoned for two and a half years in the Gatehouse at Westminster for venturing to interpret Scripture. Within months of her release in 1635, she vandalized the church hangings at Lichfield Cathedral, and was committed to Bedlam until 1638. She was transferred to the Tower of London thereafter and finally released in 1640.

Though she was imprisoned briefly on two other occasions, Lady Eleanor spent the remainder of her life writing apocalyptic tracts which she delivered to Members of Parliament. When her predictions that Charles I would be executed and London destroyed by fire were fulfilled, her reputation revived for a time. Many of her writings are obscure and disjointed, but Lady Eleanor poignantly describes her spiritual calling and the vigorous private and public opposition to her vocation in Her Appeal (1646).

The Lady Eleanor Her Appeal

From the Lady Eleanor the Handmaid of the Holy Spirit,
To our beloved brother Mr. Mace,
the anointed of our Lord.[1]

Having in the burden of his precious Word been myself a partaker, made a public example, no mean one, concerning the way before the Lord's coming to be prepared, have thought it not unnecessary by what means it came to pass, to impart and publish the same unto yourself, in making known some passages, the truth of which unknown not unto the whole world, almost ever since the year 1625.

[1] Mr. Mace Probably Thomas May, secretary to the Parliament; the mace is the symbol of authority of the Speaker of the House. In effect, the tract is addressed to Parliament, as the venue for public complaints and petitions, which this tract in effect is.

Showing withal about a few days before the former king's departure [from] this life, how first of all there came a Scottish lad to this city, about the age of thirteen, one George Carr by name, otherwise called the dumb boy or fortuneteller, so termed, that spake not for some space of time, with whom it was my hap, upon a visit, to meet where some of them would needs send for this boy, although few more jealous of such acquaintance or sparing, yet able to discern between such a one and impostures, making bold before my departure thence, to direct him the way to my house, where care should be taken of him, not the less because a stranger, accordingly who there abode, where no simple people, but expert and learned as any, tried no few conclusions; some instanced as here:[1]

Sometimes who would take the Bible or a Chronicle, and open it, and close it again, then cause the aforesaid youth to show by signs and such like dumb demonstrations, what was contained therein;[2] which things he so to the life expressed and acted, as were it a psalm or verse, then feigned to sing, though saw not a letter of the book;[3] and sometime that suddenly behind him would blow a horn, whereat never so much as changed his look, seemed so hard of hearing. And again thus, to sound him farther, one must stop his ears fast, and then what [one] whispered at the other end of the gallery, he must declare what they spake in the ear, as often as they pleased several times.[4]

Having by that time gotten a whistling voice, as plain as any can speak, like a bird; before that [he[had used signs for the space of three months, then [was] no longer dumb or deaf.

To conclude, whatsoever it were he [was] able to manifest it, whether contained in letters, enclosed in cabinets, or by numbering how many pence or peppercorns in a bag or box before it was opened, or anything of that kind fit for the vulgar capacity too;[5] or when he was brought into any place amongst strangers, one should write in several papers everyone's name, and he must give them accordingly to each his own name, at first making as though he were in some doubt which way to bestow himself, where the chief divines of the city present, some of them bestowing a shilling on him, without farther consideration thought it sufficient, etc. whilst others of that calling as liberal of their slanderous tongues; that no longer might be harbored in our house, [he was] likened to Friar Rush; servants had so incensed their masters, setting all on fire, with justices of peace and churchmen, giving out he was a vagrant, a counterfeit, or a witch.[6] Immediately upon which the Spirit of Prophecy falling likewise upon me, then were all vexed worse than ever, ready to turn the house upside down, laying this to his charge too: when laying aside household cares all, and no conversation with any but the Word of God, first by conference with the prophet Daniel, cap. 8, ver. 13, I found out this place, Then I heard ONE saint speaking unto another saint, said unto that certain saint which SPAKE (in the ori[gi]nal (to wit) The Numberer of Secrets, or the wonderful Numberer (Hebr. Palmoni) How long the vision concerning the daily, and the transgression making desolate, to give the host, etc. And he said unto me, unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.[7]

---

[1] a few days...this life James I died on March 27, 1625; hap fortune (OED hap sb^{1} 1); conclusions examinations (OED conclusion 8).

[2] Chronicle historical record (OED chronicle sb 1a).

[3] feigned mimed, as he was dumb.

[4] stop his ears obstruct his hearing (stop v I.8a).

[5] for the vulgar capacity for the knowledge or tastes of the common people.

[6] Friar Rush the proper name of a demon who poses as a friar to deceive people (The History of Friar Rush, 1620).

[7] Palmoni palmowniy ("that certain one"), that is to say, "that certain saint."

The sum of it this, as much to say, inquired of such a one that spake not at first, how long from the vision before this prophesy shall be revealed, or whether I should be able, etc. as now about two thousand two hundred years complete since the captivity,[1] as here answered, O Son of Man, for at the time of the end it shall be: Behold, I will make thee know in the last end of the indignation, for at the time appointed shall be the end, Daniel, cap. 8.

And thus not only providing for that aforesaid admired guest, but adored him almost; how it afterward came to pass, like that least of all seeds, how it sprang up, as follows:[2] Here following the prophets their order in these circumstances, time, persons, and place observed: Showing,

In the aforesaid year, 1625. the first of his reign, the first of his name, in the month of July, so called after the Roman Emperor, in Berks, the first of shires, myself whose father the prime peer, or first baron, being at my house in Englesfield, then heard early in the morning a voice from heaven, speaking as through a trumpet these words;[3]

There is nineteen years and an half to the judgement day, and be you as the meek Virgin.

When occasioned through the plague, that heavy hand, like the Wisemen's coming from the East, the term came down to Reading our next market town;[4] and that first Parliament following it posting down to Oxford, not far off either:[5] And sometime as in Augustus's days, so in this of Great Britain's second monarch, taxed likewise with no ordinary taxes levied;[6] when this morning star, this second babe born, ruling the nations with an iron rod, no light judgements foreshowing at hand:[7] which words in a manuscript annexed to an interpretation of the prophet Daniel's visions, a few days finished afore, was then immediately for to be published, carried to Oxford's Parliament, that ancientest of universities, this golden number heard, extending to the year 1644. January.[8]

Which book perfected about the first of August, was with mine own hand delivered and presented to Abbot, Archbishop, where the babe signed in the presence of no few witnesses, with this token, that the great plague should presently cease;[9] that curse so furiously poured out on the desolate city, where grass grew in her chief streets [which] should be inhabited.

At which time the weekly Bill amounted to five thousand;[10] but because the next week it increased six hundred, this token of such deliverance was utterly cast out of remembrance: Howbeit before the end of August, scarce five hundred of the plague deceased, in such an instant vanished, which sometime was grown up to that height as the age of the world, five thousand six hundred.

[1] the captivity the captivity of the Israelites in Babylon.

[2] aforesaid admired guest George Carr; like that...sprang up "The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed...which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs" (Matthew 13:31–32).

[3] his reign the reign of Charles I; July...Emperor so named after Julius Caesar; father...first baron Baron Audeley claimed that he was first among the barons when James I began his reign in 1603; speaking...trumpet "After this I looked, and, behold, a door was opened in heaven: and the first voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, Come up hither, and I will show thee things which must be hereafter" (Revelation 4:1).

[4] term law term; because of the plague, the session of the law courts in London was adjourned and cases were heard in Reading.

[5] posting travelling with haste (OED post v^1 I.2).

[6] Augustus's days Caesar Augustus, Roman Emperor at the time of Christ's birth; Great Britain's second monarch Charles I.

[7] this morning star...with an iron rod See Revelation 2:27–28; also 12:5 and 19:15.

[8] golden number so called for its importance in calculating the date of Easter.

[9] Abbot, Archbishop emended from "Abbots Archbishop"; George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury; the babe Lady Eleanor's prophetic tract.

[10] Bill the Bill of Mortality, a weekly report of the deaths for 109 parishes in and around London (OED bill sb^3 10).

Concerning which aforesaid judgement or blow, foreshowed no other than the day of judgment's express forerunner, the world's final blow at hand; upon farther consult with the Scriptures, the Book of the Revelation, understood how with the 7[th] Chapter it accorded, saying, And I saw four angels standing at the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds that they should not blow, until expired such a time, such a year.[1]

. . . .

And since prophesy's thundering reign began,[2] what judgments since the year 1625 July, [I] shall give you a list of some of them; beginning at home first, where this book of mine was sacrificed by my first husband's hand, thrown into the fire, whose doom I gave him in letters of his own name (John Daves, Jove's hand) within three years to expect the mortal blow;[3] so put on my mourning garment from that time: when about three days before his sudden decease, before all his servants and friends at the table, gave him pass to take his long sleep,[4] by him thus put off, I pray weep not while I am alive, and I will give you leave to laugh when I am dead.

Accordingly which too soon came to pass, for contrary to a solemn vow within three months [I was] married to another husband, who escaped not scot-free: he likewise burning my book, another manuscript, a remembrance to the king for beware Great Britain's blow at hand, showed him thus, Dan. 12. And at that time shall Michael the great prince stand up, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since a nation, with the resurrection in his time to be prophesied: and for a token of the time, At that time the people shall be delivered, their oppressors put to flight; where very parliament-stars shining forever, as by such a solemn oath taken there sworn, etc. the contents of that last chap. verily concluding with the first year of the present reign, 1625. signified in those no obscure characters, Blessed is he that waits: And comes to three hundred thirty-five; which being added unto the former reckoning of two hundred and ninety, amounts to 1625. to wit, when this sealed vision before the end shall be revealed, witness the troublesome time.

And not thus resting, shall give you a passage or two more; showing the Holy Spirit besides speaking with other tongues, able to speak without a tongue sometime, as by the prophet Ezekiel to that rebellious age, growing downward, by his portraying and the like: Showing a few days before my deserting the aforesaid house, coming home, having been forth, and meeting with one seeming dumb, that came along with me, soldier like, with a long garment or russet coat, a red cross on the sleeve, by signs uttering his mind; where leaving him at [the] door, without other notice, cold welcome, that had watched about the house all day, as they told me, calling to mind what trouble such a one befell: presently after comes in Sir Archibald Douglas my husband from Whitehall, followed with a chaplain and some six servants, affrighted all, protested he had met with an angel, whose custom always to give something to the poor, saying, he was come with him, a young man very handsome, about his age, praying me to come forth; the servants vowing he came out of heaven, otherwise [they] might (in the open fields) [have] seen him afore suddenly who caught their master by the arm.

Which man applying himself wholly to Sir Archibald Douglas by such discoursing signs, of his late marriage, and former course of his life; would not a look vouchsafe me, till at last by locking, as it were, and unlocking a door, which I interpreting to presage prison, he assented unto this token bestowed on me;[1] and Sir Archibald's back turned, then stepped within the door as none should see him but myself, by pointing at him, and bending the fist, looking up as it were to heaven, as though some heavy hand toward: About a month after that [he] lost both reason and speech, by [the] like signs feign to learn his meaning, as he [was] able to impart his mind, formerly showed.

[1] And I...not blow Revelation 7:1.

[2] thundering reign "And I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder" (Revelation 14:2).

[3] whose doom...mortal blow Davies died a year and a half after her prediction.

[4] gave him...long sleep gave him permission to die.

When the messenger departing, as though had far to go, as swift as an arrow, having taken a shilling in good part, though promised as many pounds would he come again, by spreading the hands which he seemed to understand; where like conference to have, many of the Court sending after him, standing at St. James's gate to staid him; but no more of him heard, amongst the poor though inquired, whether knew any such.

As this for another then blazed, being invited by the Lady of Berkshire to her child's christening, sent word I might not, nor would not come; howbeit a fortnight after went, being neighbours, finding there the Lord Goring and the Lady Carlisle, the Lady Berkshire's aspect somewhat sad, relating my denial to her, saying, She knew it boded something to her child: The Lady Carlisle saying, He is well, is he not? Yes, I praise God, said she, as any of the rest: Then quoth the Lord Goring, I pray let us know what thundering thumping thing it is about my Lady Berkshire's son: To which only thus before I went, enquired of her the name of the other born before this last, as I take it she said was Philip, Then he must be again the youngest, I again replied, as after a few hours the same night the child suddenly was gone and died, etc.

And though these things [were] not done in corner or remote place, [they] restrained neither city nor court from such violent doings, vain laughter, like the crack of thorns, as the wiseman, cap. etc.[2] shows to be regarded as much, of whose high presumption on record, such a blast from Whitehall, bearing date October, 1633 etc.

From the Court of Whitehall, etc.[3]

His Majesty does expressly command the Lord Archbishop's Grace and his Commissioners, for causes ecclesiastical, That the petitioner be forthwith called before them for presuming to imprint the said books, and for preferring this detestable petition.

Sidney Montague.

Which blasphemous accursed reference thus occasioned was upon their taking away of my books printed at Amsterdam: But pressing to have them restored passages taken out of Scripture concerning great Babylon's blow, Dan. 5 And the beast ascended out of the bottomless pit, Rev. 11.[4] Applied to Great Britain, with the handwriting (cap. 5) Thou art found wanting, etc. extended from that marriage feast, ever since 1625 into the year 1645 or from the abomination, etc. Dan. 12.[5]

And of the aforesaid reference, thus; save reverence His Grace the foreman of the jury, 1633 Octob. 23 commanding first a candle, he that would not be warned;[6] but said, No more of that; burnt the book, saying, My Lords, I have made you a smoother of doomsday, to be in such a year about

[1] vouchsafe bestow on (OED vouchsafe v I.1).

[2] crack of thorns "For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity" (Ecclesiastes 7:6).

[3] From the Court…Montague Lady Eleanor sets forth the text of the warrant summoning her to appear before the Court of High Commission.

[4] the beast…pit Revelation 11:7.

[5] Thou art…wanting Daniel 5:27; extended…Dan. 12. Daniel 12:1.

[6] His Grace William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, the head of the Court of High Commission. Lady Eleanor refers to him as "Arch BB" (Arch Blaspheming Beast) in several tracts, associating him with the Beast of Revelation.

Candlemas, till then she takes time enough:[1] What shall we do next? When with one voice, Let her be fined three thousand pounds, excommunicated, no Bible allowed her, or pen and ink, or woman servant; carry her away, as by a warrant under twelve hands, confined to the Gatehouse forever,[2] where kept a close prisoner for two years, the Lord's day unknown from another, the rest for brevity and modesty['s] sake dismissed.

To this day which sentence and remains of the smoked book remain extant in the office, trophies of his triumph, buried by this Achan, this golden wedge or tongue, he surnamed the Beast, from Oxford deriving his name, smothered as other things.[3]

Sir Robert Filmer

ca. 1590 – 1653

The eldest son of a prosperous gentry family in Kent, Filmer attended Trinity College, Cambridge, trained for the law at Lincoln's Inn, and married the daughter of a bishop; he inherited his family's estate in 1629. He started writing on legal and political issues in the 1620s, circulating his treatises in manuscript among gentry circles. Staunchly Royalist, Filmer was imprisoned by Parliament for at least some months in 1643, and in the late 1640s he began to publish pro-monarchical and other pamphlets. In the early 1650s he published commentaries on the political writings of Thomas Hobbes, John Milton, and Aristotle, as well as Directions for Obedience to Government in Dangerous or Doubtful Times, a short essay included here on the topical question of how much obedience was due to a usurping government (limited, Filmer concludes).

Patriarcha, Filmer's longest and best known political treatise, was not published in his lifetime, though several of his shorter published pamphlets summarize its arguments. Filmer likely began to write Patriarcha in the late 1620s and revised the text until the beginning of the civil wars. The original context of his Scripture-based patriarchalist theory was late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century political debates about the foundation and extent of royal authority. But as a forceful argument for a monarch's absolute paternal authority, Patriarcha attracted attention throughout the civil wars and into the Restoration. It was first published in 1680 during the Exclusion crisis, and John Locke devoted the first of his Two Treatises of Government (1689) to criticizing Filmer's ideas. For other discussions of royal or paternal authority, see the selections from James VI/I, Thomas Hobbes, and Charles I; for texts that challenge patriarchal arguments, see the selections from Lady Anne Clifford, Elizabeth Johnson, and Rachel Speght.

Patriarcha: The Natural Power of Kings Defended against the Unnatural Liberty of the People

(excerpt)

Chapter One (1) The tenet of the natural liberty of mankind new, plausible and dangerous;[1] (2) the question stated out of Bellarmine; some contradictions of his noted; (3) Bellarmine's argument answered out of Bellarmine himself; (4) the royal authority of the patriarchs before the Flood; (5) the dispersion of nations over the world after the confusion of Babel, was by entire families over which the fathers were kings; (6) and from them all kings are descended; (7) all kings are either fathers of their people; (8) or heirs of such fathers or usurpers of the right of such fathers; (9) of the escheating of kingdoms;[2] (10) of regal and paternal power and of their agreement.

(1) Since the time that school divinity began to flourish, there hath been a common opinion maintained as well by divines as by divers other learned men which affirms: "Mankind is naturally endowed and born with freedom from all subjection, and at liberty to choose what form of government it please, and that the power which any one man hath over others was at the first by human right bestowed according to the discretion of the multitude."

[1] plausible having the appearance (only) of reasonableness; specious (OED plausible a 3).

[2] escheating the reverting of property or office to the crown when there is no legally qualified heir (OED escheat sb 1).

This tenet was first hatched in the schools, and hath been fostered by all succeeding papists for good divinity. The divines also of the reformed churches have entertained it, and the common people everywhere tenderly embrace it as being most plausible to flesh and blood, for that it prodigally distributes a portion of liberty to the meanest of the multitude, who magnify liberty as if the height of human felicity were only to be found in it—never remembering that the desire of liberty was the cause of the fall of Adam.

But howsoever this vulgar opinion hath of late obtained great reputation, yet it is not to be found in the ancient Fathers and doctors of the primitive church. It contradicts the doctrine and history of the Holy Scriptures, the constant practice of all ancient monarchies, and the very principles of the law of nature. It is hard to say whether it be more erroneous in divinity or dangerous in policy.

Yet upon the grounds of this doctrine both Jesuits and some overzealous favourers of the Geneva discipline have built a perilous conclusion, which is "that the people or multitude have power to punish or deprive the prince if he transgress the laws of the kingdom". Witness Parsons and Buchanan.[1] The first, under the name of Doleman, in the third chapter of his first book labours to prove that kings have been lawfully chastised by their commonwealths.[2] The latter in his book De Jure Regni apud Scotos maintains a liberty of the people to depose their prince. Cardinal Bellarmine (De Laicis, book 3, chapter 6) and Mr Calvin (Institutes, book 4, chapter 10) both look asquint this way.[3]

This desperate assertion, whereby kings are made subject to the censures and deprivations of their subjects, follows (as the authors of it conceive) as a necessary consequence of that former position of the supposed natural equality and freedom of mankind, and liberty to choose what form of government it please.

And though Sir John Hayward, Adam Blackwood, John Barclay and some others have learnedly confuted both Buchanan and Parsons, and bravely vindicated the right of kings in most points, yet all of them, when they come to the argument drawn from the natural liberty and equality of mankind, do with one consent admit it for a truth unquestionable, not so much as once denying or opposing it.[4] Whereas if they did but confute this first erroneous principle, the whole fabric of this vast engine of popular sedition would drop down of itself.

The rebellious consequence which follows this prime article of the natural freedom of mankind may be my sufficient warrant for a modest examination of the original truth of it. Much hath been said, and by many, for the affirmative. Equity requires that an ear be reserved a little for the negative.

In this discourse I shall give myself these cautions:

First, I have nothing to do to meddle with mysteries of the present state. Such arcana imperii [state secrets], or cabinet councils, the vulgar may not pry into. An implicit faith is given to the meanest artificer in his own craft. How much more is it, then, due to a prince in the profound secrets of government. The causes and the ends of the greatest politic actions and motions of state dazzle the eyes and exceed the capacities of all men, save only those that are hourly versed in managing public affairs. Yet since the rule for each man to know in what to obey his prince cannot be learnt without a relative knowledge of those points wherein a sovereign may command, it is necessary when the commands and pleasures of superiors come abroad and call for an obedience that every man inform himself how to regulate his actions or his sufferings. For according to the quality of the thing commanded an active or passive obedience is to be yielded, and this is not to limit the prince's power, but the extent of the subject's obedience, by giving to Caesar the things that are Caesar's etc. [Matthew 22:21].

All published works that defended the rights of monarchs.

Secondly, I am not to question or quarrel at the rights or liberties of this or any other nation. My task is chiefly to enquire from whom these first came, not to dispute what or how many they are, but whether they are derived from the law of natural liberty or from the grace and bounty of princes. My desire and hope is that the people of England may and do enjoy as ample privileges as any nation under heaven. The greatest liberty in the world (if it be duly considered) is for people to live under a monarch. It is the Magna Carta of this kingdom. All other shows or pretexts of liberty are but several degrees of slavery, and a liberty only to destroy liberty.

If such as maintain the natural liberty of mankind take offence at the liberty I take to examine it, they must take heed that they do not deny by retail that liberty which they affirm by wholesale. For if their thesis be true, the hypothesis will follow, that all men may examine their own charters, deeds, or evidences by which they claim and hold the inheritance or freehold of their liberties.

Thirdly, I must not detract from the worth of all those learned men who are of a contrary judgment in the point of natural liberty. The profoundest scholar that ever was known hath not been able to search out every truth that is discoverable: neither Aristotle in natural philosophy, nor Hooker in divinity.[1] They were but men, yet I reverence their judgments in most points, and confess myself beholding even to their errors in this. Something that I found amiss in their opinions guided me in the discovery of that truth which (I persuade myself) they missed. A dwarf sometimes may see that which a giant looks over, for whilst one truth is curiously searched after, another must necessarily be neglected. Late writers have taken up too much upon trust from the subtle schoolmen,[2] who to be sure to thrust down the king below the pope, thought it the safest course to advance the people above the king, that so the papal power may more easily take place of the regal. Thus many an ignorant subject hath been fooled into this faith, that a man may become a martyr for his country by being a traitor to his prince; whereas the new coined distinction of subjects into royalists and patriots is most unnatural,[3] since the relation between king and people is so great that their well-being is reciprocal.

(2) To make evident the grounds of this question about the natural liberty of mankind, I will lay down some passages of Cardinal Bellarmine, that may best unfold the state of this controversy. "Secular or civil power," saith he > is instituted by men. It is in the people unless they bestow it on a prince. This power is immediately in the whole multitude, as in the subject of it. For this power is by the divine law, but the divine law hath given this power to no particular man. If the positive law be taken away, there is left no reason why amongst a multitude (who are > equal) one rather than another should bear rule over the rest. Power is given by the multitude to one man, or to more by the same law of nature, for the commonwealth of itself cannot exercise this power, therefore it is bound to bestow it upon some one man, or some few. It depends upon the consent of the multitude to ordain over themselves a king, or consul, or other magistrate; and if there be a lawful cause, the multitude may change the kingdom into an aristocracy or democracy. (De Laicis, book 3, chapter 4 [actually 6])

Thus far Bellarmine, in which passages are comprised the strength of all that ever I have read or heard produced for the natural liberty of the subject.

Before I examine or refute these doctrines, I must a little make some observations upon his words.

First, he saith that by the law of God power is immediately in the people. Hereby he makes God to be the immediate author of a democratical estate. For a democracy is nothing else but the power of the multitude. If this be true, not only aristocracies but all monarchies are altogether unlawful, as being ordained (as he thinks) by men, whenas God himself hath chosen a democracy.

Secondly, he holds that although a democracy be the ordinance of God, yet the people have no power to use the power which God hath given them, but only power to give away their power; whereby it follows that there can be no democratical government, because the people, he saith, "must give their power to one man, or to some few"; which maketh either a regal or aristocratical estate, which the multitude is tied to do, even by the same law of nature which originally gave them the power. And why then doth he say the multitude may change the kingdom into a democracy?

Thirdly, he concludes that "if there be a lawful cause the multitude may change the kingdom into an aristocracy or democracy." Here I would fain know who shall judge of this lawful cause? If the multitude (for I see nobody else can) then this is a pestilent and dangerous conclusion.

(3) I come now to examine that argument which is used by Bellarmine, and is the one and only argument I can find produced by any author for the proof of the natural liberty of the people. It is thus framed: that God hath given or ordained power is evident by Scripture; but God hath given it to no particular man, because by nature all men are equal; therefore he hath given power to the people or multitude.

To answer this reason, drawn from the equality of mankind by nature, I will first use the help of Bellarmine himself, whose very words are these: "if many men had been together created out of the earth, all they ought to have been princes over their posterity" (De Romano Pontifice, book 1, chapter 2). In these words we have an evident confession that creation made man prince of his posterity. And indeed not only Adam but the succeeding patriarchs had, by right of fatherhood, royal authority over their children. Nor dares Bellarmine deny this also. "That the patriarchs," saith he, "were endowed with kingly power, their deeds do testify." For as Adam was lord of his children, so his children under him had a command and power over their own children, but still with subordination to the first parent, who is lord paramount over his children's children to all generations, as being the grandfather of his people.

I see not then how the children of Adam, or of any man else, can be free from subjection to their parents. And this subjection of children is the only fountain of all regal authority, by the ordination of God himself. It follows that civil power not only in general is by divine institution, but even the assignment of it specifically to the eldest parent, which quite takes away that new and common distinction which refers only power universal as absolute to

God, but power respective in regard of the special form of government to the choice of the people. Nor leaves it any place for such imaginary pactions between kings and their people as many dream of.[1]

(4) This lordship which Adam by creation had over the whole world, and by right descending from him the patriarchs did enjoy, was as large and ample as the absolutest dominion of any monarch which hath been since the creation. For power of life and death we find that Judah, the father, pronounced sentence of death against Thamar, his daughter-in-law, for playing the harlot. "Bring her forth," saith he, "that she may be burnt" [Genesis 38:24]. Touching war, we see that Abraham commanded an army of 318 soldiers of his own family [Genesis 14:14]; and Esau met his brother Jacob with 400 men at arms [Genesis 33:1]. For matter of peace, Abraham made a league with Abimelech, and ratified the articles by an oath [Genesis 21:23–4]. These acts of judging in capital causes, of making war, and concluding peace, are the chiefest marks of sovereignty that are found in any monarch.

(5) Not only until the Flood, but after it, this patriarchal power did continue—as the very name of patriarch doth in part prove. The three sons of Noah had the whole world divided amongst them by their father, for of them was the whole world overspread, according to the benediction given to him and his sons: "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth" (Genesis 9:[1]). Most of the civillest nations in the world labour to fetch their original from some one of the sons or nephews of Noah, which were scattered abroad after the confusion of Babel. In this dispersion we must certainly find the establishment of regal power throughout the kingdoms of the world.

It is a common opinion that at the confusion of tongues there were seventy-two distinct nations erected. All which were not confused multitudes, without heads or governors, and at liberty to choose what governors or government they pleased, but they were distinct families, which had fathers for rulers over them. Whereby it appears that even in the confusion, God was careful to preserve the fatherly authority by distributing the diversity of languages according to the diversity of families. For so it plainly appears by the text. First, after the enumeration of the sons of Japhet, the conclusion is: "By these were the isles of the gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations" (Genesis 10:5). So it is said: "These are the sons of Ham after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations" [Genesis 10:20]. The like we read: "These are the sons of Shem after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, after their nations. These are the families of the sons of Noah after their generations in their nations, and by these were the nations divided in the earth after the Flood" [Genesis 10:31–2].

In this division of the world, some are of opinion that Noah used lots for the distribution of it. Others affirm that he sailed about the Mediterranean sea in ten years and as he went about, pointed to each son his part, and so made the division of the then known world into Asia, Africa, and Europe, according to the number of his sons, the limits of which three parts are all found in that midland sea.

(6) But howsoever the manner of the division be uncertain, yet it is most certain the division itself was by families from Noah and his children, over which the parents were heads and princes.

Amongst these was Nimrod, who no doubt (as Sir Walter Raleigh affirms) was by good right lord or king over his family.[1] Yet against right did he enlarge his empire by seizing violently on the rights of other lords of families, and in this sense he may be said to be the author and first founder of monarchy. And all those that do attribute unto him the original of regal power do hold he got it by tyranny or usurpation, and not by any due election of the people or multitude, nor by any paction with them.

[1] pactions compacts, contracts, agreements (OED).

As this patriarchal power continued in Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, even until the Egyptian bondage, so we find it amongst the sons of Ishmael and Esau. It is said: "These are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names by their castles and towns, twelve princes of their tribes or families" (Genesis 25:16), "And these are the names of the dukes that came of Esau, according to their families and their places by their nations" (Genesis 36:40).

(7) Some, perhaps, may think that these princes and dukes of families were but some petty lords under some greater kings, because the number of them are so many that their particular territories could be but small, and not worthy the title of kingdoms. But they must consider that at first kings had no such large dominions as they have nowadays. We find in the time of Abraham, which was about 300 years after the Flood, that in a little corner of Asia nine kings at once met in battle, most of which were but kings of cities apiece, with the adjacent territories, as of Sodom, Gomorrha, Shinar, etc. In the same chapter is mention of Melchisedek, king of Salem, which was but the city of Jerusalem (Genesis 14). And in the catalogue of the kings of Edom, the name of each king's city is recorded as the only mark to distinguish their dominions (Genesis 36). In the land of Canaan, which was but of a small circuit, Joshua destroyed thirty-one kings [Joshua 12:24], and about the same time Adonibezek had seventy kings whose fingers and toes he had cut off, and made them feed under his table [Judges 1:7]. A few ages after this, thirty-two kings came to Benhadad [I Kings 20:16], king of Syria, and about seventy kings of Greece went to the wars of Troy. Caesar found more kings in France than there be now provinces there, and at his sailing over into this island he found four kings in our county of Kent. These heaps of kings in each nation are an argument that their territories were but small, and strongly confirm our assertion that erection of kingdoms came at first only by distinction of families.

By manifest footsteps we may trace this paternal government unto the Israelites coming into Egypt, where the exercise of supreme patriarchal jurisdiction was intermitted because they were in subjection to a stronger prince. After the return of these Israelites out of bondage, God, out of a special care of them, chose Moses and Joshua successively to govern as princes in the place and stead of the supreme fathers, and after them likewise for a time. He raised up Judges to defend His people in times of peril. But when God gave the Israelites kings, He re-established the ancient and prime right of lineal succession to paternal government. And whensoever He made choice of any special person to be king, He intended that the issue also should have benefit thereof, as being comprehended sufficiently in the person of the father—although the father only were named in the grant.

(8) It may seem absurd to maintain that kings now are the fathers of their people, since experience shows the contrary. It is true, all kings be not the natural parents of their subjects, yet they all either are, or are to be reputed as the next heirs to those progenitors who were at first the natural parents of the whole people, and in their right succeed to the exercise of supreme jurisdiction. And such heirs are not only lords of their own children, but also of their brethren, and all others that were subject to their fathers.

---

[1] as...Raleigh affirms Sir Walter Raleigh, The History of the World (1614), 1.10.i.

And therefore we find that God told Cain of his brother Abel: "His desires shall be subject unto thee, and thou shalt rule over him" (Genesis 4:7). Accordingly, when Jacob had bought his brother's birthright, Isaac blessed him thus: "Be lord over thy brethren, and let the sons of thy mother bow before thee" (Genesis 27:29). As long as the first fathers of families lived, the name of patriarchs did aptly belong unto them. But after a few descents, when the true fatherhood itself was extinct and only the right of the father descended to the true heir, then the title of prince or king was more significant to express the power of him who succeeds only to the right of that fatherhood which his ancestors did naturally enjoy. By this means it comes to pass that many a child, by succeeding a king, hath the right of a father over many a grey-headed multitude, and hath the title of pater patriae [father of the fatherland].

(9) It may be demanded what becomes of the right of fatherhood in case the crown do escheat for want of an heir, whether doth it not then devolve to the people? The answer is:

1. It is but the negligence or ignorance of the people to lose the knowledge of the true heir, for an heir there always is. If Adam himself were still living, and now ready to die, it is certain that there is one man, and but one in the world, who is next heir, although the knowledge who should be that one man be quite lost.

2. This ignorance of the people being admitted, it doth not by any means follow that for want of heirs the supreme power devolves to the multitude, and that they have power to rule, or choose what rulers they please. No: the kingly power escheats in such cases to the prime and independent heads of families, for every kingdom is resolved into those parts whereof at first it was made. By the uniting of great families or petty princedoms, we find the greater monarchies were at the first erected, and into such again—as into their first matter—many times they return. And because the dependency of ancient families is oft obscure or worn out of knowledge, therefore the wisdom of all or most princes hath thought fit to adopt many times those for heads of families and princes of provinces whose merits, abilities, or fortunes have enabled them, or made them fit and capable of such royal favours. All such prime heads and fathers have power to consent in the uniting or conferring of their fatherly right of sovereign authority on whom they please. And he that is so elected claims not his power as a donative from the people, but as being substituted properly by God, from whom he receives his royal charter of an universal father, though testified by the ministry of the heads of the people.

If it please God, for the correction of the prince or punishment of the people to suffer princes to be removed and others placed in their rooms, either by the factions of the nobility or rebellion of the people, in all such cases the judgment of God—who hath power to give and to take away kingdoms—is most just. Yet the ministry of men who execute God's judgments without commission is sinful and damnable. God doth but use and turn men's unrighteous acts to the performance of His righteous decrees.

(10) In all kingdoms or commonwealths in the world, whether the prince be the supreme father of the people or but the true heir of such a father, or whether he come to the crown by usurpation, or by election of the nobles or of the people, or by any other way whatsoever, or whether some few or a multitude govern the commonwealth, yet still the authority that is in any one, or in many, or in all of these, is the only right and natural authority of a supreme father. There is, and always shall be continued to the end of the world, a natural right of a supreme father over every multitude, although, by the secret will of God, many at first do most unjustly obtain the exercise of it.

To confirm this natural right of regal power, we find in the decalogue that the law which enjoins obedience to kings is delivered in the terms of "honour thy father" [Exodus 20:12] as if all power were originally in the father. If obedience to parents be immediately due by a natural law, and subjection to princes but by the mediation of an human ordinance, what reason is there that the law of nature should give place to the laws of men, as we see the power of the father over his child gives place and is subordinate to the power of the magistrate?

If we compare the natural duties of a father with those of a king, we find them to be all one, without any difference at all but only in the latitude or extent of them. As the father over one family, so the king, as father over many families, extends his care to preserve, feed, clothe, instruct and defend the whole commonwealth. His wars, his peace, his courts of justice and all his acts of sovereignty tend only to preserve and distribute to every subordinate and inferior father, and to their children, their rights and privileges, so that all the duties of a king are summed up in an universal fatherly care of his people.

Directions for Obedience to Government in Dangerous or Doubtful Times

All those who in these times so eagerly strive for an original power to be in the people do with one consent acknowledge that originally the supreme power was in the fatherhood; and that the first kings were fathers of families. This is not only evident, and affirmed by Aristotle, but yielded unto by Grotius, Mr Selden, Mr Hobbes, Mr Ascham and all others of that party,[1] not one excepted, that I know of.

Now for those that confess an original subjection in children to be governed by their parents, to dream of an original freedom in mankind is to contradict themselves. And to make subjects to be free, and kings to be limited; to imagine such pactions and contracts between kings and people as cannot be proved ever to have been made, or can ever be described or fancied how it is possible for such contracts ever to have been, is a boldness to be wondered at.

Mr Selden confesseth that Adam

> by donation from God was made the general lord of all things, not without such a private dominion to himself as (without his grant) did exclude his children. And by donation or assignation, or some kind of cession (before he was dead or left any heir to succeed him) his children had their distinct territories by right of private dominion. Abel had his flocks, and pastures for them. Cain had his fields for corn, and the land of Nod where he built himself a city.[2]

It is confessed that in the infancy of the world the paternal government was monarchical. But when the world was replenished with multitude of people, then the paternal government ceased and was lost, and an elective kind of government by the people was brought into the world. To this it may be answered that the paternal power cannot be lost. It may either be transferred or usurped, but never lost, or ceaseth. God, who is the giver of power, may transfer it from the father to some other. He gave to Saul a fatherly power over his father Kish. God also hath given to the father a right or liberty to alien his power over his children to any other, whence we find the sale and gift of children to have been much in use in the beginning of the world, when men had their servants for a possession and an inheritance as well as other goods. Whereupon we find the power of castrating and making eunuchs much in use in old times. As the power of the father may be lawfully transferred or aliened so it may be unjustly usurped, and in usurpation the title of an usurper is before and better than the title of any other than of him that had a former right. For he hath a possession by the permissive will of God, which permission how long it may endure no man ordinarily knows. Every man is to preserve his own life for the service of God and of his king or father, and is so far to obey an usurper as may tend not only to the preservation of his king and father, but sometimes even to the preservation of the usurper himself when probably he may thereby be reserved to the correction or mercy of his true superior. Though by human laws a long prescription may take away right, yet divine right never dies nor can be lost or taken away.

Every man that is born is so far from being freeborn that by his very birth he becomes a subject to him that begets him. Under which subjection he is always to live unless by immediate appointment from God or by the grant or death of his father he become possessed of that power to which he was subject.

The right of fatherly government was ordained by God for the preservation of mankind. If it be usurped, the usurper may be so far obeyed as may tend to the preservation of the subjects, who may thereby be enabled to perform their duty to their true and right sovereign when time shall serve. In such cases to obey an usurper is properly to obey the first and right governor, who must be presumed to desire the safety of his subjects. The command of an usurper is not to be obeyed in anything tending to the destruction of the person of the governor, whose being in the first place is to be looked after.

It hath been said that there have been so many usurpations by conquest in all kingdoms that all kings are usurpers, or the heirs or successors of usurpers; and therefore any usurper if he can but get the possession of a kingdom hath as good a title as any other. Answer: The first usurper hath the best title, being, as was said, in possession by the permission of God; and where an usurper hath continued so long that the knowledge of the right heir be lost by all the subjects, in such a case an usurper in possession is to be taken and reputed by such subjects for the true heir, and is to be obeyed by them as their father. As no man hath an infallible certitude but only a moral knowledge, which is no other than a probable persuasion grounded upon a peaceable possession, which is a warrant for subjection to parents and governors. For we may not say, because children have no infallible or necessary certainty who are their true parents, that therefore they need not obey, because they are uncertain. It is sufficient, and as much as human nature is capable of, for children to rely upon a credible persuasion. For otherwise the commandment of "honour thy father" would be a vain commandment, and not possible to be observed.

By human positive laws a possession time out of mind takes away or bars a former right—to avoid a general mischief of bringing all right into a disputation not decidable by proof and consequently to the overthrow of all civil government—in grants, gifts and contracts between man and man. But in grants and gifts that have their original from God or nature, as the power of the father hath, no inferior power of man can limit nor make any law of prescription against them. Upon this ground is built that common maxim, that nullum tempus occurrit regi, no time bars a king.

All power on earth is either derived or usurped from the fatherly power, there being no other original to be found of any power whatsoever. For if there should be granted two sorts of power without any subordination of one to the other, they would be in perpetual strife which should be supreme—for two supremes cannot agree. If the fatherly power be supreme, then the power of the people must be subordinate, and depend on it. If the power of the people be supreme, then the fatherly power must submit to it, and cannot be exercised without the licence of the people—which must quite destroy the frame and course of nature. Even the power which God himself exerciseth over mankind is by right of fatherhood: he is both the king and father of us all. As God hath exalted the dignity of earthly kings, by communicating to them his own title by saying they "are gods" [Psalm 82:6]; so on the other side he hath been pleased as it were to humble himself by assuming the title of a king to express his power, and not the title of any popular government. We find it is a punishment to have "no king", Hosea 3:4, and promised as a blessing to Abraham, Genesis 17:6, "that kings shall come out of thee."

Every man hath a part or share in the preservation of mankind in general. He that usurps the power of a superior thereby puts upon himself a necessity of acting the duty of a superior in the preservation of them over whom he hath usurped, unless he will aggravate one heinous crime by committing another more horrid. He that takes upon him the power of a superior sins sufficiently, and to the purpose; but he that proceeds to destroy both his superior and those under the superior's protection goeth a strain higher, by adding murder to robbery. If government be hindered, mankind perisheth. An usurper by hindering the government of another brings a necessity upon himself to govern. His duty before usurpation was only to be ministerial or instrumental in the preservation of others by his obedience. But when he denies his own and hinders the obedience of others, he doth not only not help but is the cause of the distraction in hindering his superior to perform his duty. He makes the duty his own. If a superior cannot protect it is his part to desire to be able to do it, which he cannot do in the future if in the present they be destroyed for want of government. Therefore it is to be presumed that the superior desires the preservation of them that should be subject to him, and so likewise it may be presumed that an usurper in general doth the will of his superior by preserving the people by government. And it is not improper to say that in obeying an usurper we may obey primarily the true superior, so long as our obedience aims at the preservation of those in subjection and not at the destruction of the true governor. Not only the usurper but those also over whom power is usurped may join in the preservation of themselves, yea, and in the preservation sometimes of the usurper himself.

Thus there may be a conditional duty or right in an usurper to govern. That is to say, supposing him to be so wicked as to usurp, and not willing to surrender or forgo his usurpation, he is then bound to protect by government, or else he increaseth and multiplieth his sin.

Though an usurper can never gain a right from the true superior, yet from those that are subjects he may. For if they know no other hath a better title than the usurper, then as to them the usurper in possession hath a true right.

Such a qualified right is found at first in all usurpers, as is in thieves who have stolen goods and during the time they are possessed of them have a title in law against all others but the true owners. And such usurpers to divers intents and purposes may be obeyed.

Neither is he only an usurper who obtains the government, but all they are partakers in the usurpation who have either failed to give assistance to their lawful sovereign, or have given aid either by their persons, estates or counsels for the destroying of that governor under whose protection they have been born and preserved. For although it should be granted that protection and subjection are reciprocal, so that where the first fails the latter ceaseth, yet it must be remembered that where a man hath been born under the protection of a long and peaceable government, he owes an assistance for the preservation of that government that hath protected him, and is the author of his own disobedience.

It is said by some that an usurped power may be obeyed in things that are lawful. But it may be obeyed not only in lawful things but also in things indifferent.[1] Obedience in things indifferent is necessary, not indifferent. For in things necessarily good God is immediately obeyed, superiors only by consequence. If men command things evil, obedience is due only by tolerating what they inflict, not by performing what they require. In the first, they declare what God commands to be done, in the latter what to be suffered. So it remains that things indifferent only are the proper object of human laws. Actions are to be considered simply and alone, and so are good as being motions depending on the first mover; or jointly with circumstances, and that in a double manner: 1. In regard of the ability or possibility, whilst they may be done. 2. In the act when they be performed. Before they be done they be indifferent, but once breaking out into act they become distinctly good or evil according to the circumstances which determine the same. Now an action commanded is supposed as not yet done (whereupon the Hebrews call the imperative mood the first future) and so remaineth many times indifferent.

Some may be of opinion that if obedience may be given to an usurper in things indifferent, as well as to a lawful power, that then there is as much obedience due to an usurped power as to a lawful. But it is a mistake, for though it be granted that in things indifferent an usurper may be obeyed as well as a lawful governor, yet herein lieth a main difference—that some things are indifferent for a lawful superior, which are not indifferent but unlawful to an usurper to enjoin. Usurpation is the resisting and taking away the power from him who hath such a former right to govern the usurper as cannot be lawfully taken away. So that it cannot be just for an usurper to take advantage of his own unlawful act or create himself a title by continuation of his own injustice, which aggravates and never extenuates his crime. And if it never can be an act indifferent for the usurper himself to disobey his lawful sovereign, much less can it be indifferent for him to command another to do that to which he hath no right himself. It is only then a matter indifferent for an usurper to command, when the actions enjoined are such as the lawful superior is commanded by the law of God to provide for the benefit of his subjects by the same or other like restriction of such indifferent things, and it is to be presumed, if he had not been hindered, would have commanded the same, or the like laws.

William Bradford

1590 – 1657

Born in Yorkshire to prosperous farmers, Bradford opposed his family's wishes by joining a Separatist congregation in Nottinghamshire in 1606. Three years later he followed the community into religious exile in Holland, working as a weaver in Leiden until 1620, when he sailed in the Mayflower to New England. In 1621 Bradford was elected governor of the Plymouth colony, a position he would hold for thirty of the next thirty-five years. With dedication and skill he helped ensure that the colony survived, at first physically and later financially. By the time he died in 1657, Plymouth had grown from the fifty-two settlers who survived the first winter (out of the 102 who had sailed in the Mayflower) to a community of more than a thousand people. "He was a person for study as well as action," wrote Cotton Mather, skilled in languages and well read in history and theology; at his death Bradford left a library of almost four hundred volumes. Bradford began his History in 1630 as a journal, but over two decades of writing it gradually became the first official history of the "Pilgrims" (a word he uses) and their colony.

Book I

CHAPTER 9

Of their voyage, and how they passed the sea; and of their safe arrival at Cape Cod

September 6, 1620. These troubles being blown over, and now all being compact together in one ship,[1] they [the Pilgrims] put to sea again with a prosperous wind, which continued diverse days together, which was some encouragement unto them; yet according to the usual manner many were afflicted with sea-sickness. And I may not omit here a special work of God's providence. There was a proud and very profane young man, one of the seamen, of a lusty, able body, which made him the more haughty; he would always be condemning the poor people in their sickness, and cursing them daily with grievous execrations, and did not let to tell them, that he hoped to help to cast half of them overboard before they came to their journey's end, and to make merry with what they had; and if he were by any gently reproved, he would curse and swear most bitterly. But it pleased God before they came half seas over, to smite this young man with a grievous disease, of which he died in a desperate manner, and so was himself the first that was thrown overboard. Thus his curses light on his own head; and it was an astonishment to all his fellows, for they noted it to be the just hand of God upon him.

After they had enjoyed fair winds and weather for a season, they were encountered many times with cross winds, and met with many fierce storms, with which the ship was shrewdly shaken,[2] and her upper works made very leaky; and one of the main beams in the midships was bowed and cracked, which put them in some fear that the ship could not be able to perform the voyage. So some of the chief of the company, perceiving the mariners to fear the sufficiency of the ship, as appeared by their mutterings, they entered into serious consultation with the master and other officers of the ship, to consider in time of the danger; and rather to return than to cast themselves into a desperate and inevitable peril. And truly there was great distraction and difference of opinion amongst the mariners themselves; fain would they do what could be done for their wages' sake (being now near half the seas over), and on the other hand they were loath to hazard their lives too desperately. But in examining of all opinions, the master and others affirmed they knew the ship to be strong and firm underwater; and for the buckling of the main beam, there was a great iron screw the passengers brought out of Holland, which would raise the beam into his place; the which being done, the carpenter and master affirmed that with a post put under it, set firm in the lower deck, and other ways bound, he would make it sufficient. And as for the decks and upper works they would caulk them as well as they could, and though with the working of the ship they would not long keep staunch, yet there would otherwise be no great danger, if they did not overpress her with sails. So they committed themselves to the will of God, and resolved to proceed.

[1] The colonists initially set sail in two ships, but one was found unseaworthy and everyone was transferred to the Mayflower.

[2] shrewdly severely, intensely (OED shrewdly adv 5).

In sundry of these storms the winds were so fierce, and the seas so high, as they could not bear a knot of sail, but were forced to hull,[1] for divers days together. And in one of them, as they thus lay at hull, in a mighty storm, a lusty young man (called John Howland) coming upon some occasion above the gratings, was, with a seele of the ship thrown into the sea;[2] but it pleased God that he caught hold of the topsail halyards, which hung overboard, and ran out at length; yet he held his hold (though he was sundry fathoms underwater) till he was held up by the same rope to the brim of the water, and then with a boat hook and other means got into the ship again, and his life saved; and though he was something ill with it, yet he lived many years after, and became a profitable member both in church and commonwealth. In all this voyage there died but one of the passengers, which was William Butten, a youth, servant to Samuel Fuller, when they drew near the coast.

But to omit other things (that I may be brief), after long beating at sea they fell with that land which is called Cape Cod; the which being made and certainly known to be it, they were not a little joyful. After some deliberation had amongst themselves and with the master of the ship, they tacked about and resolved to stand for the southward (the wind and weather being fair) to find some place about Hudson's river for their habitation. But after they had sailed that course about half the day, they fell amongst dangerous shoals and roaring breakers, and they were so far entangled there with as they conceived themselves in great danger; and the wind shrinking upon them withal, they resolved to bear up again for the Cape, and thought themselves happy to get out of those dangers before night overtook them, as by God's providence they did. And the next day they got into the Cape Harbour where they rode in safety.[3] A word or two by the way of this Cape; it was thus first named by Captain Gosnold and his company, Anno 1602,[4] and after by Captain Smith was called Cape James;[5] but it retains the former name amongst seamen. Also that point which first showed those dangerous shoals unto them, they called Point Care, and Tucker's Terror; but the French and Dutch to this day call it Malabar,[6] by reason of those perilous shoals, and the losses they have suffered there.

[3] now Provincetown Harbor. They anchored on November 11, 1620, after sixty-five days at sea.

[4] because they took much of that fish there [note by Bradford]. Bartholomew Gosnold (d. 1607) also led the expedition that founded Jamestown in 1607.

[5] Captain John Smith (1580–1631), head of the Virginia Colony, had tried to name the cape after the king.

[6] Bradford's anglicizing of "Mallebarre," meaning bad or dangerous sandbar.

Being thus arrived in a good harbour and brought safe to land, they fell upon their knees and blessed the God of heaven, who had brought them over the vast and furious ocean, and delivered them from all the perils and miseries thereof, again to set their feet on the firm and stable earth, their proper element. And no marvel if they were thus joyful, seeing wise Seneca was so affected with sailing a few miles on the coast of his own Italy, as he affirmed, that he had rather remain twenty years on his way by land, than pass by sea to any place in a short time, so tedious and dreadful was the same unto him.[1]

But here I cannot but stay and make a pause, and stand half amazed at this poor people's present condition; and so I think will the reader too, when he well considers the same. Being thus passed the vast ocean, and a sea of troubles before in their preparation (as may be remembered by that which went before), they had now no friends to welcome them, nor inns to entertain or refresh their weather-beaten bodies, no houses or much less towns to repair to, to seek for succour. It is recorded in scripture as a mercy to the apostle and his shipwrecked company, that the barbarians showed them no small kindness in refreshing them,[2] but these savage barbarians, when they met with them (as after will appear) were readier to fill their sides full of arrows than otherwise. And for the season it was winter, and they that know the winters of that country know them to be sharp and violent, and subject to cruel and fierce storms, dangerous to travel to known places, much more to search an unknown coast. Besides, what could they see but a hideous and desolate wilderness, full of wild beasts and wild men? and what multitudes there might be of them they knew not. Neither could they, as it were, go up to the top of Pisgah,[3] to view from this wilderness a more goodly country to feed their hopes; for which way soever they turned their eyes (save upward to the heavens) they could have little solace or content in respect of any outward objects. For summer being done, all things stand upon them with a weatherbeaten face; and the whole country, full of woods and thickets, represented a wild and savage hue.[4] If they looked behind them, there was the mighty ocean which they had passed, and was now as a main bar and gulf to separate them from all the civil parts of the world. If it be said they had a ship to succour them, it is true; but what heard they daily from the master and company? But that with speed they should look out a place with their shallop,[5] where they would be at some near distance; for the season was such as he would not stir from thence till a safe harbour was discovered by them where they would be, and he might go without danger; and that victuals consumed apace, but he must and would keep sufficient for themselves and their return. Yea, it was muttered by some, that if they got not a place in time, they would turn them and their goods ashore and leave them. Let it also be considered what weak hopes of supply and succour they left behind them, that might bear up their minds in this sad condition and trials they were under; and they could not but be very small. It is true, indeed, the affections and love of their brethren at Leyden was cordial and entire towards them,[6] but they had little power to help them, or themselves; and how the case stood between them and the merchants at their coming away,[1] hath already been declared. What could now sustain them but the spirit of God and his grace? May not and ought not the children of these fathers rightly say: "Our fathers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this wilderness; but they cried unto the Lord, and he heard their voice, and looked on their adversity,"[2] etc. "Let them therefore praise the Lord, because he is good, and his mercies endure for ever. Yea, let them which have been redeemed of the Lord, show how he hath delivered them from the hand of the oppressor. When they wandered in the desert wilderness out of the way, and found no city to dwell in, both hungry, and thirsty, their soul was overwhelmed in them. Let them confess before the Lord his loving kindness, and his wonderful works before the sons of men."[3]

BOOK II
CHAPTER 19
(excerpt)

Anno 1628: Thomas Morton of Merrymount

About some three or four years before this time, there came over one Captain Wollaston (a man of pretty parts),[4] and with him three or four more of some eminence, who brought with them a great many servants, with provisions and other implements for to begin a plantation; and pitched themselves in a place within the Massachusetts, which they called, after their Captain's name, Mount Wollaston. Amongst whom was one Mr. Morton, who, it should seem, had some small adventure (of his own or other men's) amongst them; but had little respect amongst them, and was slighted by the meanest servants. Having continued there some time, and not finding things to answer their expectations, nor profit to arise as they looked for, Captain Wollaston takes a great part of the servants, and transports them to Virginia, where he puts them off at good rates, selling their time to other men; and writes back to one Mr. Rasdall, one of his chief partners, and accounted their merchant, to bring another part of them to Virginia likewise, intending to put them off there as he had done the rest. And he, with the consent of the said Rasdall, appointed one Fitcher to be his Lieutenant, and govern the remains of the plantation, till he or Rasdall returned to take further order thereabout. But this Morton abovesaid, having more craft than honesty (who had been a kind of pettifogger, of Furnival's Inn),[5] in the other's absence, watches an opportunity (commons being but hard amongst them),[6] and got some strong drink and other junkets, and made them a feast; and after they were merry, began to tell them, he would give them good counsel. "You see (saith he) that many of your fellows are carried to Virginia; and if you stay till this Rasdall return, you will also be carried away and sold for slaves with the rest. Therefore I would advise you to thrust out this Lieutenant Fitcher; and I, having a part in the plantation, will receive you as my partners and consociates; so may you be free from service, and we will converse, trade, plant, and live together as equals, and support and protect one another," or to like effect. This counsel was easily received; so they took opportunity, and thrust Lieutenant Fitcher out of doors, and would suffer him to come no more amongst them, but forced him to seek bread to eat, and other relief from his neighbours, till he could get passage for England.

[3] Psalm 107:1–5, 8.

[4] pretty clever and skillful, or brave and gallant (OED pretty a 2a, 3).

[5] one of the Inns of Chancery in London, where lawyers were trained. Morton in fact attended not Furnival's but Clifford's Inn.

[6] That is, provisions were scarce among them.

After this they fell to great licentiousness, and led a dissolute life, pouring out themselves into all profaneness. And Morton became lord of misrule, and maintained (as it were) a school of atheism. And after they had got some goods into their hands, and got much by trading with the Indians, they spent it as vainly, in quaffing and drinking both wine and strong waters in great excess, and, as some reported, £10 worth in a morning. They also set up a Maypole, drinking and dancing about it many days together, inviting the Indian women for their consorts, dancing and frisking together (like so many fairies, or furies rather), and worse practises. As if they had anew revived and celebrated the feasts of the Roman goddess Flora, or the beastly practices of the mad Bacchanalians. Morton likewise (to show his poetry) composed sundry rhymes and verses, some tending to lasciviousness, and others to the distraction and scandal of some persons, which he affixed to this idle or idol Maypole.[1] They changed also the name of their place, and instead of calling it Mount Wollaston they call it Merry-mount, as if this jollity would have lasted ever. But this continued not long, for after Morton was sent for England (as follows to be declared), shortly after came over that worthy gentleman, Mr. John Endecott, who brought over a patent under the broad seal, for the government of the Massachusetts, who visiting these parts caused the Maypole to be cut down, and rebuked them for their profaneness, and admonished them to look there should be better walking; so they now, or others, changed the name of their place again, and called it Mount Dagon.[2]

Now to maintain this riotous prodigality and profuse excess, Morton, thinking himself lawless, and hearing what gain the French and fishermen made by trading of pieces,[3] powder, and shot to the Indians, he, as the head of this consortship, began the practise of the same in these parts. And first he taught them how to use them, to charge, and discharge, and what proportion of powder to give the piece, according to the size or bigness of the same; and what shot to use for fowl, and what for deer. And having thus instructed them, he employed some of them to hunt and fowl for him, so as they became far more active in that employment than any of the English, by reason of their swiftness of foot, and nimbleness of body, being also quick sighted, and by continual exercise well knowing the haunts of all sorts of game. So as when they saw the execution that a piece would do, and the benefit that might come by the same, they became mad, as it were, after them, and would not stick to give any prize they could attain too for them; accounting their bows and arrows but baubles in comparison of them.

And here I may take occasion to bewail the mischief that this wicked man began in these parts, and which since base covetousness prevailing in men that should know better, has now at length got the upper hand, and made this thing common, notwithstanding any laws to the contrary; so as the Indians are full of pieces all over, both fowling pieces, muskets, pistols, &c. They have also their moulds to make shot, of all sorts, as musket bullets, pistol bullets, swan and goose shot, and of smaller sorts; yea, some have seen them have their screw-plates to make screw-pins themselves, when they want them, with sundry other implements, wherewith they are ordinarily better fitted and furnished than the English themselves. Yea, it is well known that they will have powder and shot, when the English want it, nor cannot get it; and that in a time of war or danger, as experience hath manifested, that when lead hath been scarce, and men for their own defence would gladly have given a groat a pound, which is dear enough, yet hath it been bought up and sent to other places, and sold to such as trade it with the Indians, at 12 pence the pound; and it is like they give 3 or 4 shillings the pound, for they will have it at any rate.[1] And these things have been done in the same times, when some of their neighbours and friends are daily killed by the Indians, or are in danger thereof, and live but at the Indian's mercy. Yea, some (as they have acquainted them with all other things) have told them how gunpowder is made, and all the materials in it, and that they are to be had in their own land; and I am confident, could they attain to make saltpeter, they would teach them to make powder. Oh the horribleness of this villainy! how many both Dutch and English have been lately slain by those Indians, thus furnished; and no remedy provided, nay, the evil more increased, and the blood of their brethren sold for gain, as is to be feared; and in what danger all these colonies are in is too well known. Oh! that princes and parliaments would take some timely order to prevent this mischief, and at length to suppress it, by some exemplary punishment upon some of these gain-thirsty murderers (for they deserve no better title), before their colonies in these parts be overthrown by these barbarous savages, thus armed with their own weapons, by these evil instruments, and traitors to their neighbours and country.

[1] Morton published some of these verses in New English Canaan (1637), a book he wrote to get even with the Pilgrims.

[2] Mount Dagon after the god of the Philistines (Judges 16:23).

[3] pieces guns.

But I have forgot myself, and have been too long in this digression; but now to return. This Morton having thus taught them the use of pieces, he sold them all he could spare; and he and his consorts determined to send for many out of England, and had by some of the ships sent for above a score. The which being known, and his neighbours meeting the Indians in the woods armed with guns in this sort, it was a terror unto them, who lived stragglingly, and were of no strength in any place. And other places (though more remote) saw this mischief would quickly spread over all, if not prevented. Besides, they saw they should keep no servants, for Morton would entertain any, how vile soever, and all the scum of the country, or any discontents, would flock to him from all places, if this nest was not broken; and they should stand in more fear of their lives and goods (in short time) from this wicked and debased crew, than from the savages themselves.

So sundry of the chief of the straggling plantations, meeting together, agreed by mutual consent to solicit those of Plymouth (who were then of more strength than them all) to join with them, to prevent the further growth of this mischief, and suppress Morton and his consorts before they grew to further head and strength. Those that joined in this action (and after contributed to the charge of sending him for England) were from Pascataway, Namkeake, Winisimett, Weesagascusett, Natasco, and other places where any English were seated. Those of Plymouth being thus sought too by their messengers and letters, and weighing both their reasons, and the common danger, were willing to afford them their help; though themselves had least cause of fear or hurt. So, to be short, they first resolved jointly to write to him, and in a friendly and neighbourly way to admonish him to forbear these courses, and sent a messenger with their letters to bring his answer. But he was so high as he scorned all advice, and asked who had to do with him; he had and would trade pieces with the Indians in despite of all, with many other scurrilous terms full of disdain. They sent to him a second time, and bade him be better advised, and more temperate in his terms, for the country could not bear the injury he did; it was against their common safety, and against the king's proclamation. He answered in high terms as before, and that the king's proclamation was no law; demanding what penalty was upon it. It was answered, more than he could bear, his majesty's displeasure. But insolently he persisted, and said the king was dead and his displeasure with him, and many the like things; and threatened withal that if any came to molest him, let them look to themselves, for he would prepare for them.

[1] With four pence to a groat and twelve pence to a shilling, traders were buying lead at three times the normal rate and selling it to the Indians for three or four times what they had paid.

Upon which they saw there was no way but to take him by force; and having so far proceeded, now to give over would make him far more haughty and insolent. So they mutually resolved to proceed, and obtained of the Governor of Plymouth to send Captain Standish,[1] and some other aide with him, to take Morton by force. The which accordingly was done; but they found him to stand stiffly in his defence, having made fast his doors, armed his consorts, set diverse dishes of powder and bullets ready on the table; and if they had not been over armed with drink, more hurt might have been done. They summoned him to yield, but he kept his house, and they could get nothing but scoffs and scorns from him; but at length, fearing they would do some violence to the house, he and some of his crew came out, but not to yield, but to shoot; but they were so steeled with drink as their pieces were too heavy for them; himself with a carbine (overcharged and almost half filled with powder and shot, as was after found) had thought to have shot Captain Standish; but he stepped to him, and put by his piece, and took him. Neither was there any hurt done to any of either side, save that one was so drunk that he ran his own nose upon the point of a sword that one held before him as he entered the house; but he lost but a little of his hot blood.

Morton they brought away to Plymouth, where he was kept, till a ship went from the Isle of Shoals for England, with which he was sent to the Council of New England; and letters written to give them information of his course and carriage; and also one was sent at their common charge to inform their Honours more particularly, and to prosecute against him. But he fooled of the messenger, after he was gone from hence, and though he went for England, yet nothing was done to him, not so much as rebuked, for ought was heard; but returned the next year. Some of the worst of the company were dispersed, and some of the more modest kept the house till he should be heard from. But I have been too long about so unworthy a person, and bad a cause.

Anne Clifford

1590 – 1676

The diarist Lady Anne Clifford was the daughter and only surviving child of George Clifford, third Earl of Cumberland, and his wife Margaret Russell. Later in life, Lady Anne reflected on her youthful physical and mental attributes: "I was very happy in my first constitution, both in my mind and body…The hair of mine head was brown and thick, and so long as that it reached to the calf of my legs when I stood upright, with a peak of hair on my forehead and a dimple in my chin like my father, full cheeks and round face like my mother, and an exquisite shape of body resembling my father." Her beauty in form was matched by agility of mind: "I had a strong and copious memory, a sound judgment and a discerning spirit, and so much of a strong imagination in me as that many times even my dreams and apprehensions before hand, proved to be true." Her natural inclinations were fostered by a sound education, which was formally commenced at the age of eleven. Her tutor, the poet Samuel Daniel, encouraged her scholarly interests, and her diaries record her life-long enjoyment of reading. John Donne later remarked that "she knew well how to discourse of all things, from predestination to slea-silk."[1] After the death of Queen Elizabeth, Lady Anne became a friend and lady-in-waiting to James I's Queen, Anne of Denmark. During the early years of Lady Anne's life, her parents became estranged and lived for much of the time in separate homes, mainly because of her father's habits as spendthrift, gambler and unfaithful husband. Although he appeared repentant on his deathbed, George Clifford illegally bequeathed certain of his properties to his brother Francis and then to his nephew Henry, both of whom succeeded him in the earldom. While the titles and properties pertaining to the Cumberland earldom legally reverted to his brother Francis, other estates, castles, titles and country offices were strictly entailed upon heirs (male or female) "of the body, lawfully begotten" of Robert de Clifford and were, therefore, legally entailed to Lady Anne. Inspired by her mother, she spent more than thirty years attempting to obtain possession of her estates, despite threats by both of her husbands and King James I. Lady Anne's first husband was Richard Sackville, Earl of Dorset, by whom she had five children, three of whom died in infancy. In the Knole diary, we find a record of the struggles that surface in this marriage because of Lady Anne's refusal to comply with her husband's instructions to yield up her claim to her property. Shortly after the death of Margaret Clifford in 1616, James I procured an order against Lady Anne, Dorset signed away his claim to her estates, and royal letters patent were issued completing her disinheritance. Dorset died in March 1624, and Clifford married Philip Herbert, fourth Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, in June 1630. In her second marriage Lady Anne fared no better; after the death of two premature sons, she and Herbert rarely lived together for the remaining sixteen years of their marriage. Despite the King's "resolution" of the Clifford land dispute in favour of her uncle, Lady Anne records her ongoing battle to vindicate her right and interest in the lands of her inheritance in Westmoreland and Craven. In 1644, her cousin Henry Clifford, the fifth Earl, died at York without male issue. At last, Lady Anne assumed possession of her inheritance without adversary, although she could not claim her estates until after the Civil War, when it was safe to travel the countryside. Lady Anne dedicated the remainder of her life to the restoration and administration of her properties in the North. She restored five castles (Skipton, Appleby, Brougham, Brough, Pendragon), Barden Tower, and seven churches on her estate and undertook a family history (Great Books of the Records of Skipton Castle), continuing to write her diary until the month before her death in April, 1676.

The Knole Diary (1603–1619)[1]

(excerpts)

1603

In Christmas I used to go much to the Court and sometimes I did lie at my Aunt Warwick's chamber on a pallet, to whom I was much bound for her continual care and love of me, insomuch as if Queen Elizabeth had lived she intended to prefer me to be of the Privy Chamber for at that time there was much hope and expectation of me as of any other young lady whatsoever.[2] A little after the Queen removed to Richmond she began to grow sickly.[3] My lady used to go often thither and carry me with her in the coach and using to wait in the coffee chamber, and many times we came home very late.[4]

About the 21st or 22nd of March my Aunt of Warwick sent my mother word about 9 o'clock at night—she living then at Clerkenwell—that she should remove to Austin Friars her house for fear of some commotions, then God in his mercy did deliver us from it.[5] The 20th [of] March Mr. Flocknall, my Aunt Warwick's man, brought us word from his lady that the Queen died about 2:30 o'clock in the morning.[6] This message was delivered to my mother and me in the same chamber where afterwards I was married.[7]

About 10 o'clock King James was proclaimed in Cheapside by all the Council with great joy and triumph.[8] I went to see and hear. This peaceable coming in of the King was unexpected of all parts of the people. Within 2 or 3 days we returned to Clerkenwell again.

A little after this Q.E.'s corpse came by night in a barge from Richmond to Whitehall, my mother and a great company of ladies attending it where it continued a great while standing in the drawing chamber, where it was watched all night by several lords and ladies. My mother sitting up with it two or three nights, but my lady would not give me leave to watch by reason I was held too young.

At this time we used very much to go to Whitehall and walked much in the garden which was frequented by lords and ladies. My mother being all full of hopes every man expecting mountains and finding molehills, excepting Sir R. Cecil and the

[1] The manuscript of the Knole diary originated during Lady Anne's first marriage, to Richard Sackville, Earl of Dorset. It is the first of four biographical documents dating from separate periods of her life.

[2] Aunt Warwick Anne Russell Dudley, Countess of Warwick, sister of Margaret Russell Clifford.

[3] A little after...grow sickly After Christmas, 1602, Queen Elizabeth began to feel frail and six weeks later she fell ill at Richmond.

[4] coffee chamber thus in D.J.H. Clifford's edition, without notes; but at this date it makes very dubious sense. Evelyn wrote, "There came in my time [i.e. 1636] to the College, one Nathanial Conopios, out of Greece...He was the first I ever saw drink coffee; which custom came not into England until thirty years after" (OED coffee 1); "coffer chamber" seems rather more likely, in the sense of a room in which chests (for linen, etc.) were kept.

[5] Clerkenwell Lady Cumberland had inherited Clerkenwell Green, a country house in the fields near to London, from the Countess of Derby in 1596; Austin Friars Lady Cumberland had possession of a house in Austin Friars in the very heart of London.

[6] Queen died...in the morning Queen Elizabeth I died on March 24, 1603.

[7] I was at Q. Elizabeth's death 13 yrs and 2 months old, and Mr R. Sackville was 14 yrs old, he being then at Dorset House with his grandfather and that great family. At the death of this worthy Queen my mother and I lay at Austin Friars in the same chamber [Clifford's note].

[8] The first time that the K. sent to the Lds in England he gave command that the Earls of Northumberland, Cumbd. Ld Thos Howard and Ld Mountjoy should be bidden to the Council [Clifford's note].

House of the Howards who hated my mother and did not much love my Aunt Warwick.[1]

About this time my Lord Southampton was enlarged of his imprisonment out of the Tower.[2]

When the corpse of Q.E. had continued at Whitehall as the Council thought fit, it was carried with great solemnity to Westminster, the lords and ladies going on foot to attend it. My mother and my Aunt Warwick being mourners, but I was not allowed to be one because I was not high enough, which did much trouble me then, but yet I stood in the church at Westminster to see the solemnities performed.[3]

A little after this my lady and a great deal of other company as Mrs. Elizabeth Bridges, Lady Newton and her daughter Lady Finch went down with my Aunt Warwick to North Hall and from thence we all went to Tibbalds to see the King who used my mother and aunt very graciously.[4] But we all saw a great change between the fashion of the Court as it is now and that in the Queen's time, for we were all lousy by sitting in the chamber of Sir Thomas Erskine.[5]

As the King came out of Scotland when he lay at York, there was a strife between my father and Lord Burleigh, who was the President and who should carry the sword, but it was adjudged on my father's side because it was an office by inheritance, and so is lineally descended to me.[6]

From Tibbalds the King went to Charter House where Lord T. Howard was created Earl of Suffolk and Lord Mountjoy Earl of Devonshire, and restored Lords Southampton and Essex who stood attainted. Likewise he created many Barons among which my Uncle Russell was made Lord Russell of Thorney, and for knights, they were innumerable. All this spring I had my health very well. My father used to come to us sometimes at Clerkenwell but not often, for he had at this time as it were wholly left my mother, yet the house was kept still at her charge.

About this time my Aunt of Bath and her lord came to London and brought them my Lord Fitz-Warren and my cousin Frances Bourchier, whom I met at Bagshot where I lay all night with my cousin, and Mrs. Mary Carey, which was the first beginning of the greatness between us.[7] About 5 miles from London there met my mother, my Lord of Bedford and his lady, my Uncle Russell and much other company so that we were in number about 300 which did all accompany them to Bath House, where they continued most of that summer. Whither I went daily and visited them and grew daily more inward with my cousin Frances and Mrs. Carey.[8]

About this time my Aunt Warwick went to meet the Queen, having Mrs. Bridges with her and my Aunt Vavasour.[9] My mother and I should have gone with them, but that her horse (which she borrowed from Mr. Elmes) and old Mr. Stickley were not ready. Yet I went the same night and overtook my aunt at Tittinhanger, Lady Blunt's house where my mother came the next day to me at noon—my aunt being gone before. Then my mother and I went on our journey to overtake her, and killed three horses that day with extremities of heat, and came to Wrest, my Lord of Kent's, where we found the doors shut and none in the house, but one servant who only had the keys of the hall, so that we were forced to lie in the hall all night till towards morning, at which time came a man and let us into the higher rooms where we slept 3 or 4 hours.[1]

[1] Sir Robert Cecil Robert Cecil, first Earl of Salisbury and first Viscount of Cranborne (ca. 1563–1612), statesman, was the son of William Cecil, Lord Burghley. He was a favourite of Queen Elizabeth I. He remained Secretary of State under James I, and continued to have political power until his death.

[2] Lord Southampton Henry Wriothesley, third Earl of Southampton (1573–1624), Shakespeare's patron and friend of the Earl of Essex. His secret marriage to his pregnant mistress Elizabeth Vernon angered the Queen and the couple were briefly imprisoned. When the Queen imprisoned Essex, Southampton conspired with him to regain their place at Court by violence. The scheme of rebellion was carried out February 8, 1601. On February 25th Essex was executed. The first act of James I on his accession was to free Southampton (April 10, 1603).

[3] Q.E.'s funeral was on Thursday, April 8th [Clifford's note].

[4] Tibbalds Theobalds, a royal lodge.

[5] lousy infested by lice (OED lousy *a*1a).

[6] Lord Burleigh William Cecil, Lord Burghley (1521–1598).

[7] Frances Bourchier Frances Bourchier was first cousin and close friend to Lady Anne. Greatly pained by Frances's death in 1612, Lady Anne erected a tomb at Chenies in her memory; greatness intimacy (OED greatness 6).

[8] inward intimate (OED inward A.I.3a).

[9] Queen Anne of Denmark (1575–1619) had married James in 1589 when he was King of the Scots; Aunt Vavasour In her youth Anne Vavasour had served as a maid of honour to Queen Elizabeth.

This morning we hasted away betimes and came that night to Rockingham Castle where we overtook my Aunt Warwick and her company where we continued a day or two with old Sir Edward Watson and his lady. Then we went to Lady Needham's who once served my Aunt of Warwick, and from thence to a sister of hers whose name I have forgotten.

Thither came my Lady of Bedford who was so great a woman with the Queen as everybody much respected her, she having attended the Queen out of Scotland.[2] The next day we went to Mr. Griffin's at Dingleys which was the first time I ever saw the Queen and Prince Henry when she kissed us all and used us kindly.[3] Hither also came my Lady of Suffolk, my young Lady Derby and Lady Walsingham, which three ladies were the great favourites of Sir Robert Cecil.[4] That night we went along with the Queen's train, there being an infinite number of coaches, and, as I take it, my aunt and my mother and I lay at Sir Rd. Knightley's, where Lady Elizabeth Knightley made exceedingly much of us.[5] The same night my mother and I and only Aunt Vavasour rid on horseback through country and went to a gentleman's house where the Lady Elizabeth, Her Grace, lay, which was the first time I ever saw her;[6] my Lady Kildare and the Lady Harrington being her governesses. The same night we returned to Sir Rd. Knightley's.[7]

The next day we went along with the Queen to Althorp, Lord Spencer's House, where my mother saw my cousin Henry Clifford, my uncle's son, which was the first time we ever saw him.[8] From thence, the 27th being Monday, the Queen went to Hatton, where the King met her, where there were an infinite number of lords and ladies and other people that the country could scarce lodge them.

[1] Lord of Kent Sir Henry Grey, sixth Earl of Kent.

[2] Lady of Bedford Lucy Harrington Russell (1581–1627), wife of Edward, third Earl of Bedford, was the most powerful patron of the Jacobean court, excepting Queen Anne and perhaps Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke.

[3] Prince Henry Henry Stuart, the eldest son of James I and Anne, died in 1612 at the age of eighteen.

[4] Lady of Suffolk...Lady Walsingham Catherine (Knevet) Howard, Countess of Suffolk, was the daughter of Sir Henry Knevet and widow of Richard, eldest son of Robert Lord Rich. She married Lord Admiral Thomas Howard in 1583. Elizabeth (de Vere) Stanley, Countess of Derby, was the daughter of the Earl of Oxford. Ethelreda, Lady Walsingham, and her husband were appointed the Chief Keepers of the Queen's Wardrobe.

[5] Sir Rd. Knightley's...Elizabeth Knightley Richard Knightly's home was in Fawsley Park, Northampton. Elizabeth Knightly was the daughter of Edward, Duke of Somerset, Lord Protector.

[6] Lady Elizabeth Princess Elizabeth Stuart (1596–1662), eldest daughter of James I, afterwards Queen of Bohemia.

[7] Lady Kildare...Lady Harrington Despite King James I's promotion of Lady Kildare, it was reported that Queen Anne had no such affinity for her: in a letter, Sir Thomas Edmonds reported that "she [Queen Anne] hath hitherto refused to admit my Lady of Kildare or the Lady Walsingham, to be of her privy chamber, and has only as yet sworn my Lady of Bedford to that place." Lady Anne Harrington, mother of the Countess of Bedford, and her husband were chosen as tutor-guardians for Princess Elizabeth.

[8] The Queen and Prince came to Althorp the 25th June on Saturday. My mother, A. Warwick and I not till the next day, which Sunday was kept with great solemnity, there being an infinite number of lords and ladies. There we saw the Queen's favour to Ly Hatton and Ly Cecil, for she showed no favour to the elderly ladies but to Ly Rich and such like company [Clifford's note].

From thence the Court removed and were banqueted with great royalty by my father at Grafton where the King and Queen were entertained with speeches and delicate presents at which time my lord and the Alexanders did run a course at the field where he hurt Henry Alexander very dangerously.[1] Where the Court lay this night I am uncertain. At this time of the King's being at Grafton my mother was there, but not held as mistress of the house by reason of the difference between my lord and her which was grown to a great height.

The night after, my Aunt of Warwick, my mother and I, as I take it, lay at Dr. Challoner's, where my Aunt of Bath and my Uncle Russell met us, which house my G. Father of Bedford used to lie much at, being in Amersham. The next day the Queen went to a gentleman's house whose name I cannot remember, where there met her many great ladies to kiss her hand, as the Marchioness of Winchester, my Lady of Northumberland, my Lady Southampton etc.

From thence the Sovereign removed to Windsor where the Feast of St. George was solemnized though it should have been done before. There I stood with my Lady Elizabeth's Grace in the shrine of the Great Hall at Windsor to see the King and all the knights sit at dinner. Thither came the Archduke's ambassador, who was received by the King and Queen in the Great Hall where there was an infinite company of lords and ladies and so great a Court as I think I shall never see the like again.

From Windsor the Court removed to Hampton Court, where my mother and I lay at Hampton Court in one of the round towers, round which were tents where they died 2 or 3 in a day of the plague. There I fell extremely sick of a fever, so as my mother was in some doubt it might turn to the plague, but within 2 or 3 days I grew reasonably well and was sent away to my cousin Stiddolph's for Mrs. Taylor was newly put away from me, her husband dying of the plague shortly after.

A little before this my mother and I, my Aunt of Bath and my cousin Frances went to North Hall, my mother being extreme angry with me for riding before with Mr. Mene, where my mother in her anger commanded that I should lie in a chamber alone, which I could not endure. But my cousin Frances got the key of my chamber and lay with me which was the first time I loved her so well. The next day Mr. Minerill as he went abroad fell down suddenly and died, so as most thought it was the plague which was then very rife; it put us all in great fear and amazement, for my aunt had then a suit to follow in Court and my mother to attend the king about the business between my father and her.

My Aunt of Warwick sent us medicines from a house near Hampton Court where she then lay with Sir Moyle Finch and his lady. Now was the Master of Orkney and the Lord Tilliburne much in love with Mrs. Carey, and came there to see us with George Murray in their company, who was of the King's bed chamber.

Within 9 or ten days we were allowed to come to the Court again, which was before I went to my cousin Stiddolph's. Upon the 25th of July the King and Queen were crowned at Westminster. My father and mother both attended in their robes, and my Aunt of Bath and my Uncle Russell, which solemn sight my mother would not let me see because the plague was hot in London. Therefore I continued at Norbury where my cousin did so feed me with breakfasts and pear pies and such things as shortly after I fell into sickness.

After the coronation the Court returned to Hampton Court, where my mother fetched me from Norbury and so we lay at a little house near Hampton Court about a fortnight, and my Aunt of Bath lay in Huggins' lodgings where my cousin Frances and I and Mary Carey did use to walk much about the house and gardens when the King and Queen were gone.[1] About this time my cousin Anne Vavasour was married to Sir Richard Warburton.

[1] Grafton The house was known as Grafton Regis and was located in Northamptonshire. Henry VIII, Elizabeth I and James I all stayed at Grafton during their reigns. The home was destroyed during the civil wars.

From Hampton Court my mother went to Lancilwell, Sir Francis Palmer's house, with my Aunt of Bath, myself and all our company, where we continued as long as the Court lay at Basingstoke and I went often to the Queen and my Lady Arabella.[2] Now was my Lady Rich grown great with the Queen, in so much as my Lady of Bedford was something out with her, and when she came to Hampton Court was entertained but even indifferently, and yet continued to be of the bed chamber. One day the Queen went from Basingstoke and dined at Sir Hy. Wallop's where my lady, my aunt and I had lain 2 or 3 nights before and did help to entertain her.[3] As we rode from my Lady Wallop's to Lancilwell, riding late by reason of our stay at Basingstoke, we saw a strange comet in the night like a canopy in the air which was a thing observed all over England.

From Lancilwell we went to Mr. Dutton's where we continued a week and had great entertainments, and at that time kept a fast by reason of the plague which was generally observed all over England. From Mr. Dutton's we went to Barton, one Mr. Dormer's, where Mrs. Humphry, her mother and she entertained us with great kindness—from thence we went often to the Court at Woodstock where my Aunt of Bath followed her suit to the King and my mother wrote letters to the King, and her means were by my Lord of —— [blank in manuscript] and to the Q. by my Lady of Bedford.

My father at this time followed his suit to the King about the border lands so that sometimes my mother and he did meet, when their countenance did show the dislike they had one of the other, yet he would speak to me in a slight fashion and give me his blessing. While we lay there we rid through Oxford once or twice but whither we went I remember not. There we saw the Spanish ambassador who was then new come to England about the peace.[4]

While we lay at Barton I kept so ill a diet with Mrs. Carey and Mrs. Kinson on eating fruit so that I shortly fell into the same sickness. From this place my Aunt of Bath, having little hope of her suit, took her leave of my mother and returned into the West Country. While they lay at Barton, my mother and my aunt paid for charge of the house equally.

Some week or a fortnight after my aunt was gone—which was about Michaelmas—my lady went from Barton to Green's Norton and lay one night at my cousin Thomas Sellinger's where we saw old Mr. Hicklin, where he and his daughter proffered Wm. Pond to serve my lady at this place, where we came about 10 o'clock at night, and I was so weary as I could not tell whether I should eat or sleep first.

[1] My cousin Frances Bourchier stood to see the coronation though she had not robes and went not among the company [Clifford's note].

[2] Lady Arabella Arabella Stuart (1575–1615), a plausible claimant to the English throne, was viewed with suspicion by Elizabeth I and James I. She was kept in seclusion for ten years (1592–1602) after an unsuccessful plot by English recusants and Spanish agents to kidnap and marry her to a suitable Catholic. James I invited her to reside at Court in July, 1603. Later that month another plot surfaced to assassinate James I and crown Arabella. For the next several years, Arabella was a member of Queen Anne's entourage. After a secret marriage to William Seymour (1610), she was imprisoned in the Tower and there remained until her death.

[3] Sir Hy. Wallop Henry Wallop was the son of Queen Elizabeth's treasurer.

[4] Not long before this Michaelmas myself, my cousin Frances, Mrs. Goodwin and Mrs. Howbridge waiting on us, went in my mother's coach from Barton to Cookham where my Uncle Russell, his wife and son then lay. The next day we went to Nonsuch where Prince Henry and Her Grace lay where I stayed for a week, and left my cousin there who was proposed to continue with Her Grace, but I came back by Cookham and came to Barton where my A. of Bath went into the country [Clifford's note].

The next day we went to North Hall where we found my A. of Warwick something ill and melancholy. She herself had not been there passing a month, but lay at Sir Moyle Finch's in Kent by reason of the great plague which was then much about North Hall.

Not long after Michaelmas my Uncle and Aunt Russell and their son, my Lady Bedford, my mother and I gave ale allowance to Mr. Chambers my aunt's steward, in which sort the house was kept. During our being there I used to wear my hair colored velvet every day and learned to sing and play on the bass viol of Jack Jenkins my aunt's boy. Before Christmas my cousin Frances was sent for from Nonsuch to North Hall by reason that Her Grace was to go from thence to be brought up with the Lady Harrington in the country. All this time we were merry at North Hall. My cousin Frances Bourchier and my cousin Francis Russell and I did use to walk much in the garden and were great one with another. Now there was much talk of a masque which the Queen had at Winchester, and how all the ladies about the Court had gotten such ill names that it was grown a scandalous place, and the Queen herself was much fallen from her former greatness and reputation she had in the world.

1616[1]

MAY

Upon the 1st, Rivers came from London in the afternoon and brought me word that I should neither live at Knole or Bolebrooke.[2]

Upon the 2nd came Mr. Legge and told divers of the servants that my Lord would come down and see me once more, which would be the last time that I should see him again.[3]

Upon the 3rd came Baskett down from London and brought me a letter from my lord by which I might see it was his pleasure that the child should go the next day to London, which at first was somewhat grievous to me, but when I considered that it would both make my lord more angry with me and be worse for the child, I resolved to let her go.[4] After, I had sent for Mr. Legge and talked with him about that and other matters and wept bitterly.[5]

Upon the 4th being Saturday, between 10 and 11 the child went into the litter to go to London, Mrs. Bathurst and her two maids with Mr. Legge and a good company of the servants going with her.[6] In the afternoon came a man called Hilton, born in Craven, from my Lady Willoughby to see me which I took as a great argument of her love being in the midst of all my misery.[7]

Upon the 8th I dispatched a letter to my mother.

Upon the 9th I received a letter from Mr. Bellasis how extreme ill my mother had been, and in the afternoon came Humphrey Godding's son with letters that my mother was exceeding ill, and as they thought, in some danger of death, so as I sent Rivers presently to London with letters to be sent to her and certain cordials and conserves.[1]

[1] By 1616, Lady Anne had been married to Richard Sackville, third Earl of Dorset, for seven years, having married him on February 25, 1609. Dorset attempted by a series of stratagems to compel Lady Anne to relinquish claims to her property so that he could receive a cash settlement as her husband.

[2] Knole The Sackville family seat was at Knole, Sevenoaks, Kent. Sackville also had a house in Bollbrooke, Sussex (amongst others).

[3] Mr. Legge Edward Legge, steward to the Earl of Dorset.

[4] Baskett Peter Baskett, Gentleman of the Horse to the Earl of Dorset; the child Lady Margaret Sackville (1614–1676), the daughter of Lady Anne and Richard Sackville.

[5] My Lady Margaret lay in the Great Dorset House, for now my lord and his whole company was removed from the Lesser Dorset House where I lay when I was first married [Clifford's note].

[6] litter a vehicle containing a couch shut in by curtains and carried on men's shoulders or by beasts of burden (OED litter *sb*2a); Mrs. Bathurst Mrs. Bathurst appears to be a Gentlewoman in Waiting to Lady Margaret. In June, Lady Anne and her husband determined that Mrs. Bathurst should "go away from the child" and that Lady Willoughby should have charge of her.

[7] About this time my Lord Shrewsbury died at his house in Broad Street [Clifford's note]; Lady Willoughby the wife of William, the third Lord Willoughby.

At night was brought to me a letter from my lord to let me know his determination was [that] the child should live at Horsley, and not come hither any more, so as this was a very grievous and sorrowful day to me.[2]

Upon the 10th Rivers came from London and brought me word from Lord William that she was not in such danger as I feared; the same day came the stewards from London whom I expected would have given warning to many of the servants to go away because the audits was newly come up.[3]

Upon the 11th being Sunday, before Mr. Legge went away I talked with him an hour or two about all this business and matters between me and my lord, so as I gave him better satisfaction and made him conceive a better opinion of me than ever he did.

A little before dinner came Matthew down from London, my lord sending me by him the wedding ring that my Lord Treasurer and my old lady were married withal, and a message that my lord would be here the next week, and that the child would not as yet go down to Horsley, and I sent my lord the wedding ring that my Lord and I was married with.[4] The same day came Mr. Marsh from London and persuaded me much consent to this agreement.[5]

The 12th at night, Grosvenor came hither and told me how my lord had won £200 at the cocking match, and that my Lord of Essex and Lord Willoughby who was on my lord's side won a great deal and how there were some unkind words between my lord and his side, and Sir William Herbert and his side.[6] This day my Lady Grantham sent me a letter about these businesses between my Uncle Cumberland and me, and returned me an answer.[7]

All this time my lord was in London where he had all and infinite great resort coming to him. He went much abroad to cocking, to bowling alleys, to plays and horse races, and [was] commended by all the world. I stayed in the country having many times a sorrowful and heavy heart and being condemned by most folks because I would not consent to the agreement, so as I may truly say, I am like an owl in the desert.[8]

Upon the 13th being Monday, my lady's footman Thomas Petty brought me letters out of Westmoreland by which I perceived how very sick and full of grievous pains my dear mother was, so as she was not able to write herself to me, and most of her people about her feared she would hardly recover this sickness. At night I went out and prayed to God my only helper that she might not die in this pitiful case.

The 14th. Richard Jones came from London to me and brought a letter with him from Matthew, the effect whereof was to persuade me to yield to my lord's desire in this business at this time, or else I was undone forever.

[1] conserves confections (OED conserve sb 4b).

[2] Horsley West Horsley, Surrey.

[3] Upon the 10th, early in the morning I wrote a very earnest letter to beseech him that I might not go to the little house that was appointed for me, but that I might go to Horsley and sojourn with my child, and to the same effect I wrote to my sister Beauchamp [Clifford's note].

[4] Matthew Matthew Caldicott, secretary and confidant to the Earl of Dorset.

[5] Mr. Marsh Christopher Marsh, Lady Anne's attendant or secretary. She later appointed him principal steward and secretary of her Westmoreland estates.

[6] Grosvenor Gentleman Usher to the Earl of Dorset; cocking cock-fighting; Lord of Essex Robert Devereux, third Earl of Essex. He was eventually to lead the main Parliamentary army against the forces of Charles I in 1643; Sir William Herbert afterwards Lord Powis of Powis Castle (Wales).

[7] Lady Grantham the wife of Sir Thomas Grantham of Lincoln.

[8] like an owl in the desert "I am like a pelican of the wilderness: I am like an owl of the desert" (Psalm 102:6); there is much in the psalm that is relevant to Lady Anne's distress.

Upon the 15th my lord came down from London and my cousin Cecily Neville;[1] my lord lying in Leslie Chamber and I in my own.

Upon the 17th my lord and I after supper had some talk about these businesses, Matthew being in the room, where we all fell out and so parted for that night.

Upon the 18th, being Saturday, in the morning my lord and I having much talk about these businesses, we agreed that Mr. Marsh should go presently down to my mother and that by him I should write a letter to persuade her to give over her jointure presently to my lord, and that he would give her yearly as it was worth.

This day my lord went from Knole to London.[2] Upon the 20th being Monday I dispatched Mr. Marsh with letters to my mother about the business aforesaid. I sent them unsealed because my lord might see them.

My brother Compton and his wife kept the house at West Horsley, and my brother and my sister his wife sojourned with them, so as the child was with both her aunts.[3]

Upon the 22nd Mr. Davy came down from London and brought me word that my mother was very well recovered from her dangerous sickness; by him I writ a letter to my lord that Mr. Amherst and Mr. Davy might confer together about my jointure to free it from the payment of debts and all other encumbrances.[4]

Upon the 24th my Lady Somerset was arraigned and condemned at Westminster Hall where she confessed her fault and asked the King's mercy, and was much pitied by all beholders.[5]

Upon the 25th my Lord of Somerset was arraigned and condemned in the same place and stood much upon his innocency.[6]

Upon the 27th being Monday, my lord came down to Buckhurst. My Lord Vaux and his uncle Sir Henry Neville and divers others came with him, but the lords that promised to go with him stayed behind agreeing to meet him the next day at Lewes.[7]

Upon the 28th my Lady Selby came hither to see me and told me that she had heard some folks say that I have done well in not consenting to the composition.[8]

Upon the 29th Kendal came and brought me the heavy news of my mother's death, which I held as the greatest and most lamentable cross that could have befallen me.

---

[1] Cecily Neville the daughter of Lady Frances Abergavenny, who was the sister of the second Earl of Dorset, Lady Anne's father-in-law.

[2] My lord was at London when my mother died, but he went to Lewes before he heard of her death [Clifford's note].

[3] Upon the 20th my child went to W. Horsley with Mary Neville and Mrs. Bathurst from London. Mary Hicken was with her, for she still lain [lay?] in bed with Lady Margaret [Clifford's note]; My brother Compton and his wife Sir Henry Compton of Brambletye House, Sussex, was married to Lady Cecily Sackville.

[4] Mr. Amherst and Mr. Davy Mr. Amherst, Bencher of Gray's Inn, was the Queen's Sergeant-at-law and Mr. Davy was another lawyer.

[5] Upon the 24th, being Friday, between the hours of 6 and 9 at night died my dear mother at Brougham, in the same chamber where my father was born, 13 years and 2 months after the death of Queen Elizabeth and ten years and 7 months after the death of my father. I being 26 years and five months, and the child 2 years wanting a month [Clifford's note].

[6] My Lady Somerset...his innocency Frances Howard, cousin to Richard Sackville, and wife of Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, a favourite of James I. She had divorced Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, in 1613 on the grounds that she loved Carr. She took a strong dislike to Carr's friend Sir Thomas Overbury who had advised against the marriage. James I had Overbury imprisoned in the Tower of London for refusing a diplomatic appointment, and Lady Somerset arranged his murder by poison. When the murder of Overbury was exposed, Somerset was deprived of his office as Lord Chamberlain and both he and his wife were confined for their crimes.

[7] At this great meeting at Lewes, my Lord Compton, my Lord Mordaunt and all that crew with Wat. Raleigh, Jack Laurie and a multitude of such company were there. There was much bull baiting, bowling, cards and dice, with suchlike sports to entertain [Clifford's note].

[8] composition an agreement or arrangement between two parties (OED composition III.22); or, an agreement for submission on particular terms; capitulation (OED composition III.23b). Clifford will not consent to the terms of any agreement which will affect her disinheritance.

Also he brought her will along with him, wherein she appointed her body should be buried in the parish church of Alnwick, which was a double grief to me when I considered her body should be carried away and not interred at Skipton; so as I took that as a sign that I should be dispossessed of the inheritance of my forefathers.

The same night I sent Hamon away with the will to my lord who was then at Lewes.

Upon the 30th the Bishop of St David's came to me in the morning to comfort me in these afflictions, and in the afternoon I sent for Sir William Selby to speak to him about the conveyance of my dear mother's body into Northumberland, and about the building of a little chapel.[1]

Upon the 31st came Mr. Amherst from my lord and brought me word that my lord would be here on Saturday. The same day Mr. James brought me a letter from Mr. Woolrich wherein it seemed it was my mother's pleasure her body should be conveyed to what place I appointed which was some contentment to my aggrieved soul.

JANUARY

Upon New Year's Day, presently after dinner, I went to the Savoy to my Lady Carey [and] from thence she and I went to Somerset House to the Queen where I met Lady Derby, my Lady Bedford, my Lady Montgomery and a great deal of company that came along with the King and the Prince.[2] My Lady Arundel had much talk with me about the business and persuaded me to yield to the King in all things.[3] From Somerset House we went to Essex House to see my Lady of Northumberland. From thence I went to see my Lady Rich and so came home. After supper I went to see my sister Beauchamp and stayed with her an hour or two for my lord was at the play at Whitehall that night.[4]

Upon the 2nd I went to the Tower to see my Lord and my Lady Somerset. This was the first time I saw them since the arraignment.

Upon the 5th I went into the Court. We went up into the King's chamber where my Lord Villiers was created Earl of Buckingham. My lord, my Lord of Buckingham and divers other lords bringing him up to the King. I supped with my Lord and Lady Arundel, and after supper I saw the play of the Mad Lover in the hall.

Upon the 6th being Twelfth Day, I went about 4 o'clock to the Court with my lord. I went up with my Lady Arundel and ate a scrambling supper with her and my Lady Pembroke at my Lord Duke's lodgings.[5] We stood to see the masque in the box with my Lady Ruthven.[6]

Upon the 8th we came from London to Knole. This night my lord and I had a falling out about the land.

Upon the 9th I went up to see the things in the closet and began to have Mr. Sandys' book read to me about the government of the Turks, my lord sitting the most part of the day reading in his closet.[1]

[1] On the 30th at night or the 31st my lord was told the news of my mother's death, he being then at Lewes [Clifford's note].

[2] Lady Montgomery Susan de Vere, Countess of Montgomery, to whom Lady Mary Wroth dedicated Urania.

[3] Lady Arundel Alatheia Howard, Countess of Arundel.

[4] As the King passed by he kissed me. Afterwards the Queen came out into the drawing chamber when she kissed me and used me very kindly. This was the 1st time I ever saw the King, Queen or Prince since they came out of the north [Clifford's note]; Sister Beauchamp Frances Devereux, first cousin of Richard Sackville, was the second wife of William Seymour, Lord Beauchamp;

[5] scrambling supper a meal at which partakers help themselves to what they can get.

[6] Lady Ruthven Though the identity of Lady Ruthven is unclear, she was probably a daughter of William Ruthven, first Earl of Gowrie. Queen Anne was devoted to the Ruthvens, but James disliked them strongly.

Upon the 10th my lord went up to London upon the sudden, we not knowing it till the afternoon.

Upon the 16th I received a letter from my lord that I should come up to London the next day because I was to go before the King on Monday next. Upon the 17th when I came up, my lord told me I must resolve to go to the King the next day.

Upon the 18th being Saturday, I went presently after dinner to the Queen to the drawing chamber where my Lady Derby told the Queen how my business stood, and that I was to go to the King; so she promised me she would do all the good in it she could. When I had stayed but a little while there I was sent for out, my lord and I going through my Lord Buckingham's chamber, who brought us into the King, being in the drawing chamber. He put out all that were there, and my lord and I kneeled by his chair side, when he persuaded us both to peace, and to put the whole matter wholly into his hands. Which my lord consented to, but I beseeched His Majesty to pardon me for that I would never part with Westmoreland while I lived upon any condition whatsoever.

Sometimes he used fair means and persuasions, and sometimes foul means, but I was resolved before so as nothing would move me.

From the King we went to the Queen's side and brought my Lady St John to her lodgings, and so we went home. At this time I was much bound to my lord for he was far kinder to me in all these businesses than I expected, and was very unwilling that the King should do me any public disgrace.[2]

Upon the 19th my Lord and I went to the Court in the morning thinking the Queen would have gone to the chapel, but she did not, so my Lady Ruthven and I and many others stood in the closet to hear the sermon.[3] I dined with my Lady Ruthven. Presently after dinner she and I went up to the drawing chamber where my Lady D., my Lady Montgomery, my Lady Burleigh, persuaded me to refer these businesses to the King.

About 6 o'clock my lord came for me, so he and I and Lady St John went home in her coach. This night the masque was danced at the Court, but I would not stay to see it because I had seen it already.

Upon the 20th, I and my lord went presently after dinner to the Court; he went up to the King's side about his business, I went to my Aunt Bedford in her lodging where I stayed in Lady Ruthven's chamber till towards 8 o'clock, about which time I was sent for up to the King in his drawing chamber, when the door was locked and nobody suffered to stay here but my lord and I, my uncle Cumberland, my cousin Clifford, my Lords Arundel, Pembroke, Montgomery and Sir John Digby.[4]

For lawyers there were my Lord Chief Justice Montagu and Hobart Yelverton, the King's solicitor

[1] closet a room for privacy or retirement; an inner chamber (OED closet sb 1a); Mr. Sandys...of the Turks George Sandys (1578–1644) left England on a foreign tour in 1610. He passed through France, Italy, Venice, Turkey, Egypt and Palestine. In 1615, he published an account of his travels, The Relation of a Journey.

[2] The Queen gave me a warning not to trust my matters absolutely to the King lest he should deceive me. For lawyers, there were my Lord Chief Justice Montague and Hobart Yelverton the King's Solicitor and Sir Randal Crewe that was to speak for my lord and I [Clifford's note].

[3] closet a room in a palace used by the sovereign for private or household devotions (OED closet sb 2a).

[4] Lords Arundel...Sir John Digby Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel. William, third Earl of Pembroke, was the brother of Philip Herbert, Lady Anne's second husband. Philip Herbert inherited the earldom of Pembroke on the death of William, was created Earl of Montgomery in 1605, and married Lady Anne in 1630. Of Sir John Digby, the first Lord Digby, Lady Anne writes in the margins of her April 1616 entry: "Sir John Digby, late ambassador to Spain was made Vice-Chamberlain and sworn of the Privy Council."

Sir Randal Crewe that was to speak for my lord and I.[1]

The King asked us all if we would submit to his judgment in this case. My uncle Cumberland, my cousin Clifford and my Lord answered they would, but I would never agree to it without Westmoreland, at which the King grew in a great chafe, my Lord of Pembroke and the King's solicitor speaking much against me. At last when they saw there was no remedy, my lord fearing the King would do me some public disgrace, desired Sir John Digby would open the door, who went out with me and persuaded me much to yield to the King. My Lord Hay came to me to whom I told in brief how this business stood.[2] Presently, after my lord came from the King when it was resolved that if I would not come to an agreement, there should be an agreement made without me. We went down, Sir Robert Douglas, and Sir George Chaworth bringing us to the coach. By the way my lord and I went in at Worcester House to see my lord and lady and so came home.

This day I may say I was led miraculously by God's providence, and next to that I trust all my good to the worth and nobleness of my lord's disposition for neither I nor anybody else thought I should have passed over this day so well as I have done.

Upon the 22nd the child had her 6th fit of the ague in the morning. Mr. Smith went up in the coach to London to my lord to whom I wrote a letter to let him know in what case the child was, and to give him humble thanks for his noble usage towards me in London. The same day my lord came down to Knole to see the child.

Upon the 23rd my lord went up betimes to London again. The same day the child put on her red baize coats.[3]

Upon the 25th I spent most of my time in working and in going up and down to see the child. About 5 or 6 o'clock the fit took her which lasted 6 or 7 hours.

Upon the 28th at this time I wore a plain green flannel gown that William Punn made me, and my yellow taffety waistcoat.[4] Rivers used to read to me in Montaigne's Plays and Moll Neville in The Fairy Queen.[5]

Upon the 30th Mr. Amherst the preacher came hither to see me with whom I had much talk.[6] He told me that now they began to think at London that I had done well in not referring this business to the King, and that everybody said God had a hand in it.[7]

[1] Sir Randal Crewe afterwards Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

[2] Lord Hay James Hay, later Viscount Doncaster and Earl of Carlisle.

[3] baize a coarse woollen stuff…formerly when made of lighter and finer texture, used as a clothing material in Britain (OED baize *sb*1).

[4] taffety taffeta.

[5] Plays In an earlier entry (November 9, 1616), Clifford writes that she "heard Rivers and Marsh read Montaigne's Essays, which book they have read almost this fortnight." So when she writes two months later that "Rivers used to read to me in Montaigne's Plays," one suspects a slip of the pen or a mistranscription of Essays.

[6] Mr. Amherst Dr. Jeffrey Amherst, Rector of Horsmonden, Kent.

[7] All this time of my being in the country there was much ado in London about my business, in so much that my lord, my Uncle Cumberland, my cousin Clifford with the Chief Justice and the Council of both sides, on divers times with the King about it, and then the King hearing it go so directly for me he said there was a law in England to keep me from the land. There was during this time much cock-fighting at the Court where my lord's cocks did fight against the King's. Although this business was somewhat chargeable to my lord, yet it brought him into great grace and favour with the King, so as he useth him very kindly and speaketh very often and better of him than of any other man. My lord grew very great with my Lord of Arundel [Clifford's note].

Robert Herrick

1591 – 1674

Robert Herrick was the son of a goldsmith who died in suspicious circumstances (by injuries caused by a fall from an upper window) when Herrick was little more than a year old. Herrick's uncle William became guardian to Herrick and his siblings. In 1613 Herrick was a fellow-commoner of St. John's College, Cambridge; surviving letters suggest that he was plagued by financial worries. However, it might be said that students' begging letters to parents or guardians in this period are numerous enough for us to think of them as a genre, and perhaps one that has not completely died out. In 1629, shortly after his mother's death, Herrick became the parson of Dean Prior, in Devonshire, then thought of as a remote and somewhat uncouth part of the British Isles. Herrick, having lived in London in the society of Ben Jonson and other literary figures, found life in Devonshire somewhat dull, but acknowledged himself that he wrote his best verse there. Oral tradition, persisting in the nineteenth century, had it that he had a favourite pig, which he taught to drink from a tankard; and that once in exasperation he threw his sermon at his congregation, cursing them for their inattention. In 1647 Herrick was turned out of his living for his Royalist sympathies, and happily returned to London, where he lived on charity until the Restoration, since the fifth of his stipend that was supposed to be paid to ejected clergy was apparently not paid in his case. He was restored to his living in 1662, and spent the rest of his life at Dean Prior. Herrick has been thought of as one of those poets referred to by Alexander Pope as "twinkling stars the miscellanies o'er," that is, poets known for a few quotable pieces, but of no sustained or consistent achievement. More recently, his verse has been re-evaluated in the light of his political sympathies; a reading informed by historical awareness brings out the interest of his work without at all detracting from the pleasure to be derived from his consummate artistic skills.

To the Most Illustrious, and Most Hopeful Prince, Charles, Prince of Wales [1]

Well may my Book come forth like Public Day,
When such a Light as You are leads the way:
Who are my Work's Creator, and alone
The Flame of it, and the Expansion.
And look how all those heavenly Lamps acquire
Light from the Sun, that inexhausted Fire:
So all my Morn, and Evening Stars from you
Have their Existence, and their Influence too.
Full is my Book of Glories; but all these
By You become Immortal Substances.
—1648 (1640)

The Argument of his Book [2]

I sing of Brooks, of Blossoms, Birds, and Bowers:
Of April, May, of June, and July-flowers. [3]

[1] This poem may have been intended for a volume of Herrick's verse entered into the Stationers' Register in 1640, but apparently never published. Charles, born 1630, was made Prince of Wales in 1638. Herrick draws upon the relationship between the Sun and the King (in this case the future king) in the way dear to Royalists.

[2] his Book i.e. Hesperides, published in 1648, Herrick's only independent publication in his lifetime. Hesperides was the name of the daughters of Hesperus and also of their garden, at the earth's western extremity. Herrick's choice of title probably reflects the fact that his poems were the product of his life in Devon, in the west of England.

[3] July accented on the first syllable, as it was until Dr. Johnson's time. OED remarks that the modern pronunciation is abnormal and un-explained.

I sing of May-poles, Hock-carts, Wassails, Wakes, [1]
Of Bride-grooms, Brides, and of their Bridal-cakes.
I write of Youth, of Love, and have Access
By these, to sing of cleanly-Wantonness.
I sing of Dews, of Rains, and piece by piece
Of Balm, of Oil, of Spice, and Ambergris. [2]
I sing of Time's trans-shifting; and I write
How Roses first came Red, and Lilies White.
I write of Groves, of Twilights, and I sing
The Court of Mab, and of the Fairy-King.
I write of Hell; I sing (and ever shall)
Of Heaven, and hope to have it after all.

When he would have his Verses Read

In sober mornings, do not thou rehearse
The holy incantation of a verse;
But when that men have both well drunk, and fed,
Let my enchantments then be sung, or read.
When laurel spirts 'ith fire, and when the hearth
Smiles to it self, and gilds the roof with mirth;
When up the Thyrse is rais'd, and when the sound
Of sacred Orgies flies, A round, A round [3]
When the Rose reigns, and locks with ointments shine,
Let rigid Cato read these lines of mine.[4]
—1648

The Difference Betwixt Kings and Subjects

Twixt Kings and Subjects there's this mighty odds,
Subjects are taught by Men; Kings by the Gods.
—1648

Upon the Loss of His Mistresses

I have lost, and lately, these
Many dainty Mistresses:
Stately Julia, prime of all;
Sapho next, a principal:
Smooth Anthea, for a skin
White, and Heaven-like Crystalline:
Sweet Electra, and the choice
Myrha, for the Lute, and Voice.
Next, Corinna, for her wit,
And the graceful use of it:
With Perilla: All are gone;
Only Herrick's left alone,
For to number sorrow by
Their departures hence, and die.
—1648

Cherry-Ripe

Cherry-ripe, ripe, ripe, I cry,
Full and fair ones; come and buy:
If so be, you ask me where
They do grow? I answer, There,
Where my Julia's lips do smile;
There's the land, or Cherry-Isle:
Whose Plantations fully show
All the year, where Cherries grow.
—1648

[1] Wassails in its general sense, festivities. A number of the senses recorded in OED may be applicable.

[2] Ambergris "a wax-like substance…found floating in tropical seas" (OED). It is used in perfumery, and was used in cooking.

[3] Thyrse a Javelin twined with Ivy; Orgies songs to Bacchus [Herrick's own notes].

[4] In the last two lines Herrick is paraphrasing Martial10:20,20–21: cum regnat rosa, cum madent capilli: / tunc me vel rigidi legant Catones. Cato is Cato the Censor (234–149 B.C.E.), known for stern traditional morality (OCD).

To the King and Queen, Upon Their Unhappy Distances[1]

Woe, woe to them, who (by a ball of strife)
Do, and have parted here a Man and Wife:
CHARLES the best husband, while MARIA strives
To be, and is, the very best of Wives:
Like streams, you are divorc'd; but 'twill come, when
Those eyes of mine shall see you mix again.
Thus speaks the Oak, here; C. and M. shall meet,[2]
Treading on Amber, with their silver-feet:
Nor wil't be long, ere this accomplish'd be;
The words found true, C. M. remember me.
—1648

Delight In Disorder[3]

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness:
A lawn about the shoulders thrown
Into a fine distraction:
An erring lace, which here and there
Enthralls the crimson stomacher:[4]
A cuff neglectful, and thereby
Ribbands to flow confusedly:
A winning wave (deserving note)
In the tempestuous petticoat:
A careless shoe-string, in whose tie
I see a wild civility:
Do more bewitch me, than when Art
Is too precise in every part.[5]
—1648

Duty to Tyrants

Good princes must be pray'd for: for the bad
They must be borne with, and in rev'rence had.
Do they first pill thee, next, pluck off thy skin?[6]
Good children kiss the rods, that punish sin.
Touch not the Tyrant; let the Gods alone
To strike him dead, that but usurps a Throne.
—1648

To Dianeme

Sweet, be not proud of those two eyes,
Which star-like sparkle in their skies:
Nor be you proud, that you can see
All hearts your captives; yours, yet free:
Be you not proud of that rich hair,
Which wantons with the love-sick air:
When as that Ruby, which you wear,
Sunk from the tip of your soft ear,
Will last to be a precious Stone,
When all your world of Beauty's gone.
—1648

Corinna's Going a Maying

Get up, get up for shame, the blooming morn
Upon her wings presents the god unshorn.[7]
  See how Aurora throws her fair[8]

---

[1] Charles I and Henrietta Maria were frequently apart after the outbreak of the Civil War. The title may refer sardonically to that of a speech in Parliament of July 1642, concerning "the present unhappy Distance between His Majesty and the Parliament."

[2] the Oak There was an oracle of Zeus in a grove of oaks at Dodona.

[3] Compare Ben Jonson's "Still to be neat."

[4] stomacher "an ornamental covering…(often covered with jewels) worn by women under the lacing of the bodice" (OED stomacher^1 3).

[5] precise The word is an anti-Puritan statement in itself; see OED precise and precision.

[6] pill There may be a pun; the verb could mean either to flay or to pillage; see OED pill v^1.

[7] the god unshorn Apollo, the sun-god.

[8] Aurora Roman goddess of the dawn.

Fresh-quilted colours through the air:
Get up, sweet-Slug-a-bed, and see
The dew-bespangling herb and tree.
Each flower has wept, and bow'd toward the east,
Above an hour since; yet you not drest,
Nay! not so much as out of bed!
When all the Birds have Matins said, [1]
And sung their thankful Hymns: 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,
When as a thousand Virgins on this day,
Spring, sooner then the Lark, to fetch in May.

Rise; and put on your Foliage, and be seen
To come forth, like the spring-time, fresh and green;
And sweet as Flora. Take no care
For jewels for your gown, or hair:
Fear not; the leaves will strew
Gems in abundance upon you:
Besides, the childhood of the Day has kept,
Against you come, some Orient Pearls unwept: [2]
Come, and receive them while the light
Hangs on the dew-locks of the night:
And Titan on the eastern hill [3]
Retires himself, or else stands still
Till you come forth. Wash, dress, be brief in praying:
Few beads are best, when once we go a Maying.

Come, my Corinna, come; and coming, mark
How each field turns a street; each street a park
Made green, and trimm'd with trees: see how
Devotion gives each house a bough,
Or Branch: Each Porch, each door, ere this,
An Ark a Tabernacle is
Made up of white-thorn neatly interwove;
As if here were those cooler shades of love.
Can such delights be in the street,
And open fields, and we not see't?
Come, we'll abroad; and let's obey
The Proclamation made for May:
And sin no more, as we have done, by staying;
But my Corinna, come, let's go a Maying.

There's not a budding boy, or girl, this day,
But is got up, and gone to bring in May.
A deal of youth, ere this, is come
Back, and with White-thorn laden home.
Some have dispatched their cakes and cream,
Before that we have left to dream:
And some have wept, and woo'd, and plighted troth,
And chose their Priest, ere we can cast off sloth:
Many a green-gown has been given; [4]
Many a kiss, both odd and even:
Many a glance too has been sent
From out the eye, Love's Firmament:
Many a jest told of the keys betraying
This night, and locks picked, yet w'are not a Maying.

Come, let us go, while we are in our prime;
And take the harmless folly of the time.
We shall grow old apace, and die
Before we know our liberty.
Our life is short; and our days run
As fast away as does the Sun:
And as a vapour, or a drop of rain
Once lost, can ne'r be found again:
So when or you or I are made
A fable, song, or fleeting shade;
All love, all liking, all delight
Lies drown'd with us in endless night. [5]

---

[1] Matins has had various meanings through the centuries; Herrick is thinking of the order for public morning service in the Book of Common Prayer.

[2] Orient Pearls commonly used in the period to refer to especially valuable pearls; Herrick is referring to the dew.

[3] Titan a name for the sun-god.

[4] green-gown to give a woman a green gown was to roll her in the grass; often a euphemism. See OED green A I 1g.

[5] So when…endless night one of the more famous expressions of a famous sentiment. Compare Catullus v and Jonson's rendering in "Come my Celia, let us prove / While we may, the sports of love."

Then while time serves, and we are but decaying;
Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a Maying.

To Live Merrily, and to Trust to Good Verses

N*ow* is the time for mirth,
Nor cheek, or tongue be dumb:
For with the flow'ry earth,
The golden pomp is come. [1]

The golden pomp is come;
For now each tree does wear
(Made of her pap and gum)
Rich beads of amber here.

Now reigns the Rose, and now
Th'Arabian Dew besmears
My uncontrolled brow,
And my retorted hairs. [2]

Homer, this health to thee,
In sack of such a kind, [3]
That it would make thee see,
Though thou wert ne'er so blind.

Next, Virgil, I'll call forth,
To pledge this second health
In wine, whose each cup's worth
An Indian Common-wealth.

A goblet next I'll drink
To Ovid; and suppose,
Made he the pledge, he'd think
The world had all one Nose. [4]

Then this immensive cup
Of aromatic wine,
Catullus, I quaff up
To that terse Muse of thine.

Wild I am now with heat;
O Bacchus! cool thy rays!
Or frantic I shall ease
Thy Thyrse, and bite the bays.[5]

Round, round, the roof does run;
And being ravished thus,
Come, I will drink a Tun
To my Propertius.[6]

Now, to Tibullus, next,
This flood I drink to thee:[7]
But stay; I see a text,
That this presents to me.

Behold, Tibullus lies
Here burnt, whose small return
Of ashes, scarce suffice
To fill a little Urn.

---

[1] The golden pomp is come The golden procession is coming; the line is a translation of Ovid, Amores 3:2, 44 (aurea pompa venit).

[2] retorted twisted or bent backward (OED retorted ppl a 2, this place cited).

[3] sack white wine (OED sack sb^{3}).

[4] Ovid Publius Ovidius Naso (43 B.C.E.–17? C.E.), Roman poet; one Nose Herrick is playing on Ovid's surname, which means "large-nosed." The idea is that the wine is so rich that Ovid, smelling it, would think that he was using everybody's nose.

Thyrse i.e. thyrsus, "a staff or spear tipped with an ornament like a pine-cone, and sometimes wreathed with ivy or vine-branches; borne by Dionysus (Bacchus) or his votaries"(OED thyrsus); bays the leaves or sprigs of the bay-laurel, woven into a wreath (OED bay sb^{1} 3).

[6] Propertius the Roman poet Sextus Propertius, born between 54 and 48 B.C.E., died between 16 B.C.E. and 2 C.E. He was a friend of Ovid: both were love poets (OCD).

Tibullus Albius Tibullus, 48?–19 B.C.E., described by Quintilian as terse and elegant. His principal topics are love and longing for a country life (OCD).

Trust to good verses then;
They only will aspire,
When pyramids, as men,
Are lost, i'th'funeral fire.

And when all bodies meet
In Lethe to be drowned;[1]
Then only numbers sweet,
With endless life are crowned.[2]

To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time

Gather ye Rose-buds while ye may,
Old Time is still a flying:
And this same flower that smiles today,
Tomorrow will be dying.

The glorious Lamp of Heaven, the Sun,
The higher he's a getting;
The sooner will his race be run,
And nearer he's to setting.

That Age is best, which is the first,
When Youth and Blood are warmer;
But being spent, the worse, and worst
Times, still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time;
And while ye may, go marry:
For having lost but once your prime,
You may for ever tarry.

The Hock-cart, or Harvest Home[3]

To the Right Honourable, Mildmay, Earle of Westmorland[4]

Come sons of Summer, by whose toil,
We are the lords of wine and oil:
By whose tough labours, and rough hands,
We rip up first, then reap our lands.
Crowned with the ears of corn, now come,
And, to the pipe, sing harvest home.
Come forth, my Lord, and see the cart
Dressed up with all the country art.
See, here a Maukin, there a sheet,[5]
As spotless pure, as it is sweet:
The horses, mares, and frisking fillies,
(Clad, all, in linen, white as lilies.)
The harvest swains, and wenches bound
For joy, to see the Hock-cart crowned.
About the cart, hear, how the rout
Of rural younglings raise the shout;
Pressing before, some coming after,
Those with a shout, and these with laughter.
Some bless the cart; some kiss the sheaves;
Some prank them up with oaken leaves:
Some cross the fill-horse; some with great
Devotion, stroke the home-borne wheat:[6]
While other rustics, less attent
To prayers, than to merriment,
Run after with their breeches rent.
Well, on, brave boys, to your lord's hearth,
Glitt'ring with fire; where, for your mirth,
Ye shall see first the large and chief
Foundation of your feast, fat beef:

---

[1] Lethe a river in Hades, whose waters produced forgetfulness.

[2] numbers metrical periods or feet, hence lines, verses (OED number sb 18b).

[3] The Hock-cart the cart or wagon which carried home the last load of the harvest (OED).

[4] Mildmay, Earle of Westmorland Mildmay Fane was Herrick's friend and patron. He was the author of Otia Sacra (The sacred fruits of leisure), 1648.

[5] Maukin probably, a female country servant; see OED malkin.

[6] cross the fill-horse bestride the shaft-horse; see OED cross v 5c.

With upper stories, mutton, veal
And bacon, (which makes full the meal)
With sev'ral dishes standing by,
As here a custard, there a pie,
And here all tempting frumenty.[1]
And for to make the merry cheer,
If smirking wine be wanting here,
There's that, which drowns all care, stout beer;
Which freely drink to your Lord's health,
  Then to the plough, (the common-wealth)
  Next to your flails, your fans, your fats;[2]
Then to the maids with wheaten hats:
To the rough sickle, and crook'd scythe,
Drink frolic boys, till all be blithe.
Feed, and grow fat; and as ye eat,
Be mindfull, that the lab'ring neat
(As you) may have their fill of meat.[3]
And know, besides, ye must revoke
  The patient ox unto the yoke,[4]
  And all go back unto the plough
  And harrow, (though they're hanged up now.)
And, you must know, your lord's word's true,
Feed him ye must, whose food fills you.
And that this pleasure is like rain,
Not sent ye for to drown your pain,
But for to make it spring again.

To Anthea, who may Command him Anything

Bid me to live, and I will live
  Thy Protestant to be:[5]
Or bid me love, and I will give
  A loving heart to thee.

protests
pun

A heart as soft, a heart as kind,
  A heart as sound and free,
As in the whole world thou canst find,
  That heart I'll give to thee.

Bid that heart stay, and it will stay,
  To honour thy Decree:
Or bid it languish quite away,
  And't shall do so for thee.

Bid me to weep, and I will weep,
  While I have eyes to see:
And having none, yet I will keep
  A heart to weep for thee.

Bid me despair, and I'll despair,
  Under that Cypress tree:
Or bid me die, and I will dare
  E'en Death, to die for thee.

---

[1] frumenty a dish made of hulled wheat boiled in milk, and seasoned with sugar, cinnamon etc. (OED frumenty). When I was a boy in Nottinghamshire it was still part of harvest-home, and pronounced frummety; according to Joseph Wright's The English Dialect Dictionary, this was common across several counties.

[2] fats vessels of large size for liquids, vats (OED fat sb ¹ 2).

[3] neat cattle (OED neat sb 2).

[4] revoke call or summon back (OED revoke v 3b, this place cited).

[5] Protestant As OED points out, "in reference to the Church of England, the use has varied with time and circumstances." It is not unusual for Herrick to use an intriguingly enigmatic word in an otherwise clear poem. As L.C. Martin pointed out, the poem may have been influenced by a passage on "Symptoms of Love" in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy. In that passage we find "Hear some of their own…Protestations."

Thou art my life, my love, my heart,
The very eyes of me:
And hast command of every part,
To live and die for thee.

To Meadows

Ye have been fresh and green,
Ye have been filled with flowers:
And ye the Walks have been
Where Maids have spent their hours.

You have beheld, how they
With Wicker Arks did come
To kiss, and bear away
The richer Cowslips home.

Y'ave heard them sweetly sing,
And seen them in a Round:
Each Virgin, like a Spring,
With honey-suckles crown'd.

But now, we see, none here,
Whose silv'ry feet did tread,
And with dishevelled hair,
Adorned this smoother mead.

Like unthrifts, having spent,
Your stock, and needy grown,
Y'are left here to lament
Your poor estates, alone.

Upon Prudence Baldwin her Sickness [1]

Prue, my dearest Maid, is sick,
Almost to be lunatic:
Æsculapius! come and bring
Means for her recovering;
And a gallant cock shall be Offered up by her, to thee.
—1648

On himself

Here down my wearied limbs I'll lay;
My Pilgrim's staff; my weed of gray: [2]
My Palmer's hat; my Scallop's shell;
My Cross; my Cord; and all farewell.
For having now my journey done,
(Just at the setting of the Sun)
Here I have found a chamber fit,
(God and good friends be thanked for it)
Where if I can a lodger be
A little while from tramplers free;
At my up-rising next, I shall,
If not requite, yet thank ye all.
Mean while, the Holy-Rood hence fright
The fouler Fiend, and evil Spright,
From scaring you or yours this night.
—1648

Casualties

Good things, that come of course, far less do please,
Then those, which come by sweet contingencies.

[1] Prudence Baldwin outlived Herrick, and was buried in January, 1678.

[2] weed garment (OED weed sb^{2}). The items mentioned are all appurtenances of the pilgrim.

To Daffodils

Fair daffodils, we weep to see
You haste away so soon:
As yet the early-rising Sun
Has not attain'd his Noon.
Stay, stay,
Until the hasting day
Has run
But to the Even-song;
And, having pray'd together, we
Will go with you along.

We have short time to stay, as you,
We have as short a Spring;
As quick a growth to meet decay,
As you, or any thing.
We die,
As your hours do, and dry
Away,
Like to the Summer's rain;
Or as the pearls of Morning's dew
Ne'er to be found again.

Matins, or Morning Prayer[1]

When with the Virgin morning thou do'st rise,
Crossing thy self; come thus to sacrifice:
First wash thy heart in innocence, then bring
Pure hands, pure habits, pure, pure every thing.
Next to the Altar humbly kneel, and thence,
Give up thy soul in clouds of frankincense.
Thy golden Censers filled with odours sweet,
Shall make thy actions with their ends to meet.
—1648

Evensong

Begin with Jove; then is the work half done;[2]
And runs most smoothly, when tis well begun.
Jove's is the first and last: The Morn's his due,
The midst is thine; But Jove's the Evening too;
As sure as Matins does to him belong,
So sure he lays claim to the Evensong.

The Bracelet to Julia

Why I tie about thy wrist,
Julia, this my silken twist;
For what other reason is't,
But to show thee how in part,
Thou my pretty Captive art?
But thy Bondslave is my heart:
'Tis but silk that bindeth thee,
Knap the thread, and thou art free:[3]
But 'tis otherwise with me;
I am bound, and fast bound so,
That from thee I cannot go;
If I could, I would not so.

The Departure of the Good Daemon

What can I do in poetry,
Now the good spirit's gone from me?
Why nothing now, but lonely sit,
And over-read what I have writ.
—1648

---

[1] The church ceremonial implied by this poem would have displeased Puritans, as Herrick very well knew.

[2] Jove It was not unusual for poets to refer to the Christian deity by a pagan name; compare Milton in "Lycidas."

The Power in the People

Let Kings command, and do the best they may,
The saucy Subjects still will bear the sway.

To his Book

Have I not blest Thee? Then go forth; nor fear [1]
Or spice, or fish, or fire, or close-stools here. [2]
But with thy fair Fates leading thee, go on
With thy most white Predestination. [3]
Nor think these Ages that do hoarsely sing
The farting Tanner, and familiar King;
The dancing Frier, tatter'd in the bush;
Those monstrous lies of little Robin Rush:
Tom Chipperfeild, and pretty-lisping Ned,
That doted on a Maid of Gingerbread:
The flying Pilcher, and the frisking Dace,
With all the rabble of Tim-Trundell's race, [4]
(Bred from the dung-hills, and adulterous rhymes,)
Shall live, and thou not superlast all times!
No, no, thy Stars have destin'd Thee to see
The whole world die, and turn to dust with thee.
He's greedy of his life, who will not fall,
When as a public ruin bears down All. [5]

[1] Various Roman poets sent their books forth into the world with a blessing.

[2] in reference to the various fates that might befall paper.

[3] Predestination used sardonically, as the doctrine of predestination was opposed to the Arminianism of Charles I and Archbishop Laud.

[4] references to ballads, the point being that Herrick's book is superior to theirs and deserves to outlast them.

[5] L.C. Martin thought that the last four lines were likely to have been added during the Civil War. Lines 17 and 18 read as if they were; but 15 and 16, predicting that his book will last until the end of the world, are conventional enough.

Shame, no Statist [6]

Shame is a bad attendant to a State:
He rents his Crown, that fears the People's hate.

Fresh Cheese and Cream

Would ye have fresh Cheese and Cream?
Julia's Breast can give you them:
And if more; each Nipple cries,
To your Cream, here's Strawberries.

His Winding-Sheet [7]

Come thou, who art the Wine, and wit
Of all I've writ:
The Grace, the Glory, and the best
Piece of the rest.
Thou art of what I did intend
The All, and End.
And what was made, was made to meet
Thee, thee my sheet.
Come then, and be to my chaste side
Both Bed, and Bride.
We two (as Relics left) will have [8]
One Rest, one Grave.
And, hugging close, we will not fear
Lust entring here:
Where all Desires are dead, or cold
As is the mould:
And all Affections are forgot,
Or Trouble not.

[8] Relics the remains of a person (OED relic 2).

Here, here the Slaves and Pris'ners be
From Shackles free:
And weeping Widows long opprest
Do here find rest.
The wronged Client ends his Laws
Here, and his Cause.
Here those long suits of Chancery lie
Quiet, or die:
And all Star-chamber-Bills do cease,
Or hold their peace.
Here needs no Court for our Request, [1]
Where all are best;
All wise; all equal; and all just
Alike i'th'dust.
Nor need we here to fear the frown
Of Court, or Crown.
Where Fortune bears no sway o're things,
There all are Kings.
In this securer place we'll keep,
As lull'd asleep;
Or for a little time we'll lie,
As robes laid by;
To be another day re-worn,
Turn'd, but not torn:
Or like old testaments engrossed, [2]
Locked up, not lost:
And for a while lie here conceal'd,
To be revealed
Next, at that great Platonic year, [3]
And then meet here.

His Prayer to Ben. Jonson

When I a Verse shall make,
Know I have prayed thee,
For old Religion's sake,
Saint Ben to aid me.

Make the way smooth for me,
When I, thy Herrick,
Honouring thee, on my knee
Offer my Lyric.

Candles I'll give to thee,
And a new Altar;
And thou Saint Ben, shalt be Writ in my Psalter.

An Ode for him

Ah Ben!
Say how, or when
Shall we thy guests
Meet at those lyric feasts,
Made at the Sun,
The Dog, the triple Tun? [4]
Where we such clusters had, [5]
As made us nobly wild, not mad;
And yet each Verse of thine
Out-did the meat, out-did the frolic wine.

My Ben
Or come again:
Or send to us,
Thy wit's great over-plus;
But teach us yet
Wisely to husband it;

The Bad Season Makes the Poet Sad

Dull to my self, and almost dead to these
My many fresh and fragrant mistresses:
Lost to all music now; since every thing
Puts on the semblance here of sorrowing.
Sick is the Land to'th'heart; and doth endure
More dangerous faintings by her desp'rate cure.
But if that golden Age would come again,
And Charles here rule, as he before did reign;
If smooth and unperplexed the seasons were,
As when the sweet Maria lived here:
I should delight to have my curls half drowned
In Tyrian dews, and head with roses crowned.[1]
And once more yet (ere I am laid out dead)
Knock at a star with my exalted head.

His Return to London

FROM the dull confines of the drooping West,
To see the day spring from the pregnant East,
Ravished in spirit, I come, nay more, I fly
To thee, blest place of my Nativity!
Thus, thus with hallowed foot I touch the ground,
With thousand blessings by thy Fortune crowned.
O fruitfull Genius! that bestowest here
An everlasting plenty, year by year
O Place!'O People! Manners! framed to please
All Nations, Customs, Kindreds, Languages!
I am a free-born Roman; suffer then,
That I amongst you live a Citizen.
London my home is: though by hard fate sent
Into a long and irksome banishment;
Yet since called back; henceforward let me be,
O native countrey, repossessed by thee!
For, rather then I'll to the West return,
I'll beg of thee first here to have mine Urn.
Weak I am grown, and must in short time fall;
Give thou my sacred relics burial.

His Grange, or Private Wealth

Though Clock,
To tell how night draws hence, I've none,
A Cock,
I have, to sing how day draws on.
I have
A maid (my Prew) by good luck sent,
To save
That little, Fates me gave or lent.
A Hen
I keep, which creaking day by day,
Tells when
She goes her long white egg to lay.
A goose
I have, which, with a jealous ear,
Lets loose
Her tongue, to tell what danger's near.
A Lamb
I keep (tame) with my morsels fed,
Whose Dam
An Orphan left him (lately dead.)
A Cat
I keep, that plays about my House,
Grown fat,
With eating many a miching Mouse.[2]

Upon Julia's Clothes

WHEN as in silks my Julia goes,

A Thanksgiving to God, for his House

Lord, Thou hast given me a cell
Wherein to dwell;
A little house, whose humble Roof
Is weather-proof;
Under the spars of which I lie
Both soft, and dry;
Where Thou my chamber for to ward
Hast set a Guard
Of harmless thoughts, to watch and keep
Me, while I sleep.
Low is my porch, as is my Fate,
Both void of state;
And yet the threshold of my door
Is worn by'th poor,
Who thither come, and freely get
Good words, or meat:
Like as my Parlour, so my Hall
And Kitchen's small:
A little Buttery, and therein
A little bin,
Which keeps my little loaf of bread
Unchipped, unflead: [2]
Some brittle sticks of Thorn or Briar
Make me a fire,
Close by whose living coal I sit,
And glow like it.
Lord, I confess too, when I dine,
The Pulse is Thine, [3]
And all those other bits, that be
There plac'd by Thee;
The Worts, the Purslane, and the mess [4]
Of Water-cress,
Which of thy kindness Thou hast sent;
And my content
Makes those, and my beloved Beet,
To be more sweet.
'Tis thou that crown'st my glittering Hearth
With guiltless mirth;
And giv'st me wassail bowls to drink, [5]
Spic'd to the brink.
Lord, 'tis thy plenty-dropping hand,
That soils my land;
And giv'st me, for my bushel sown,
Twice ten for one:
Thou mak'st my teeming Hen to lay
Her egg each day:
Besides my healthful Ewes to bear
Me twins each year:
The while the conduits of my Kine [6]

Trasy Herrick's spaniel.

[2] unflead not flayed or skinned (OED, this place cited).

[3] Pulse the edible seeds of such plants as peas, beans, lentils, etc. (OED pulse sb^{2}).

[4] Wort a plant, herb or vegetable used for food or medicine, or any plant of the cabbage kind (OED wort sb^{1} 1, 2); Purslane a herb used in salads.

[5] wassail bowls bowls from which healths were drunk, or the liquor contained in the bowl (OED).

[6] Kine an archaic plural of cow.

Run Cream, (for Wine.)
All these, and better Thou dost send
Me, to this end,
That I should render, for my part,
A thankful heart;
Which, fir'd with incense, I resign,
As wholly Thine;
But the acceptance, that must be,
My Christ, by Thee.

His Litany, to the Holy Spirit

In the hour of my distress,
When temptations me oppress,
And when I my sins confess,
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

2
When I lie within my bed,
Sick in heart, and sick in head,
And with doubts discomforted,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

3
When the house doth sigh and weep,
And the world is drown'd in sleep,
Yet mine eyes the watch do keep;
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

4
When the artless Doctor sees
No one hope, but of his Fees,
And his skill runs on the lees; [1]
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

5
When his Potion and his Pill,
His, or none, or little skill,
Meet for nothing, but to kill;
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

6
When the passing-bell doth toll,
And the Furies in a shoal
Come to fright a parting soul;
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

7
When the tapers now burn blew
And the comforters are few,
And that number more than true;
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

8
When the Priest his last hath prayed,
And I nod to what is said,
'Cause my speech is now decayed;
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

9
When (God knows) I'm tossed about,
Either with despair, or doubt;
Yet before the glass be out,
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

10
When the Tempter me pursu'th
With the sins of all my youth,
And half damns me with untruth;
Sweet Spirit comfort me!

Benjamin Laney

1591 – 1675

The Restoration Bishop successively of Peterborough, Lincoln, and Ely, Laney was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and Pembroke Hall, Oxford. During the 1630s he served as Master of Pembroke Hall, Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and chaplain to Charles I. Richard Crashaw dedicated the first edition of his Epigrammata Sacra (1634) to Laney, praising him for restoring ceremony and adornment to the college chapel. As a Royalist and representative of the Laudian church, Laney was deprived of his offices in the 1640s, and subsequently served as chaplain to both Charles I and the exiled Charles II. At the Restoration he received the first of the three bishoprics he would hold. Despite the apparent hard line he takes in the sermons printed here, Laney was known as a moderate, treating the Nonconformists in his diocese with lenience, in his own words "looking through his fingers at them." He also contributed generously to rebuilding several cathedrals and other church buildings that had suffered damage during the wars. The following two sermons were preached before the King and published, at first separately and then as a linked pair, by royal demand. Laney addresses a central concern of Restoration discourse: how to find ways of living, believing, and thinking that would minimize the chances of the renewal of war. His theme is (religious and political) quietness, a quality "fitted to give an allay to the Heats of these Unquiet Distemper'd times."

* * *

The Study of Quiet, in Two Sermons

A Sermon Preached Before His Majesty at Whitehall, March 12, 1665

1 THESSALONIANS 4:11
And that ye study to be quiet

And is a word that takes hold of something that went before, without which the sense of that which follows is not full. That which went next before is, We beseech you to increase more and more. We beseech you, is that we are to take into the text, and then it runs thus, We beseech you to study to be quiet.

But all the use I shall make of it, now we have it here, is but to give you a taste beforehand of the nature and quality of this duty. 1. That it is no trivial thing little to be regarded, but that which obliged St. Paul, Sylvanus, and Timotheus, for they all joined in it, to be so earnest, as to beseech them to study to be quiet. 2. And that which commends this duty the more is (as we use to say, men are best known by the company they keep), "And" brings in this duty in the company of the best of virtues, charity, for that place, St. Paul gives it above all: Above all things put on Charity, which is the bond of perfection [Colossians 3:14]. To study to be quiet, and to increase in brotherly love and charity, for that led the way before, are two duties bound together in the same exhortation. 3. Quiet is not only a fit companion for charity, but an ally to it, and grows out of it, as the branch out of the stock; for where brotherly love is, there will be always quiet too. 4. To make all suit the better with charity, the exhortation is advanced by a dialect of love, We beseech you. Paul, Sylvanus, and Timotheus were all apostolical men, and might command, as St. Paul of himself in another case to Philemon, Though I might be bold to enjoin thee, yet for love's sake I rather beseech you. And lastly, that which might very well set this edge upon their affections, was, that which happened to the Thessalonians at their first conversion; for this Epistle was written immediately after. The story we have in the 17 chap. of the Acts: When St. Paul had preached the Gospel to them, and with good success; for v. 4: Some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas, and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few. But v. 5: The Jews who believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the City in an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people; mad enough of themselves; but the more to ferment and enrage them, they charge the Apostles with the fault that they themselves were acting; These are they that turn the world upside down. St. Paul having escaped this fury by going to Athens, and there considering in what a case he left his new converts, both them and their doctrine; them in a furious tumult, and their doctrine under the reproach of troubling the world; out of a zeal, no doubt, and desire to remove that scandal from the faith, of all things begs and beseecheth them to study to be quiet.

But how will this concern us? I wish we never had, and had not still the same occasion. It is not so long since, that we should forget how our late troubles first brake in upon our quiet: We had unbelieving Jews then amongst us too, and some, as was thought, in the literal sense; who moved with envy of the times, took unto them likewise a company of lewd fellows of the baser sort, set the city in an uproar; and we may remember whose houses they beset (as the Jews did Jason's) none of the meanest, and cried out for that justice which themselves deserved. And there were religions in the world then too many, to the scandal of the true, who led on, and blew up those tumults: And even now, though (God be thanked) they dare not be so bold to assault us in the streets, and beset our houses as they did then; yet still keep their quarters and leaguers within doors, with more secrecy, but no less danger.

It will not therefore be unseasonable for us now, who have the same cause the Thessalonians had, with the same affection the Apostle did, to beseech you to study to be quiet. We have all need of quiet, and quiet it seems hath need of study, and study hath need of God's blessing, and therefore before we proceed further, Let us pray, &c.

The parts of the text are two; What we are to study, And that we are to study.

First, What? That ye study to be quiet.

Quiet is here commended under the notion and quality of an art or science; for we are enjoined to study it. And in them we are to look, first, to the object, the nature and quality of it; and then to the principles and theorems whereon the art is grounded.

. . . .

The quiet we are here to study is not properly with us, but without us; it is not simply a quiet from motion, but commotion, a troubling of others.

And that I may contract my argument and bring it into as narrow a compass as may be, I shall not take in every of the disturbances of the quiet of others: No not that which is the greatest of all, and most contrary to peace and quiet, civil wars and broils. The mischiefs of that we have learned so lately to our cost, and so perfectly, that I hope we need not be set to study that now: when every good man was put to his study how to live, and when vile and contemptible wretches ranted in plenty and power.

The horrid fruits and consequences of that great disturber of quiet, war, have induced some learned men, as well as others, to think all wars unlawful; I should have been much inclined to that opinion upon the strictest rules of Christianity, if war were not sometimes necessary to peace. A foreign war for that reason may be lawful, but a civil and domestic, never. And the reason of this difference is, because for the composing of all quarrels that may arise between subjects, God hath by his ordinance provided a remedy in Princes and Magistrates, from whom alone we are to seek for revenge or defence. But for such differences as arise between free Princes and States, because there is no judge on earth to whom they may have recourse for their relief, being destitute of the common remedy, they may, without question, make use of that sword which God hath put into their hands to defend their subjects from the injuries as well of strangers as their own.[1] Nor are they in this judges in their own cause, which hath some appearance of injustice; for a foreign war, for defect of a competent judge on Earth, is but an appeal to the supreme judge of Heaven and Earth. And when they go into the field, it is but to plead their cause before God, with whom are the issues of war. Only they had need be careful, that the cause they bring before him be good. For shall not the judge of all the world do right? But we must leave this to Princes and their ministers, who are the only proper students of that quiet, which is disturbed by war, and come to that which may and must be the study of us all: that is, a quiet from troubles that arise from different judgments and persuasions in matters of religion, which cause sects and divisions in it, though they break not out into an open war. Not that war be quite left out of the sectaries' reckoning. For though civil wars and rebellions have their beginning for the most part from the ambition or discontent of a few, yet because the people, who are the necessary instruments of that mischief, be not apt to serve the ambition of others, if it comes barefaced to them, the mask of religion is always put on, wherein all people are concerned, which makes it a common and popular interest. And therefore you shall scarce hear of a rebellion of late times, in which religion did not carry the colours at least, if not command in chief.

But I shall nevertheless at this time forbear to make that any part of the schismatics' charge, but treat them upon their own terms, that they are as great enemies to war as any that object it to them: Yet I must charge them all to be guilty of the breach of peace and quiet in the Church, and that not accidentally, which may sometimes bear excuse, but necessarily; it is connatural and incident to the very nature of schism, which is a rent or division, so the word signifies. It is the worst disturbance that can be to any body, to be torn in pieces. It dissolves the bonds by which the parts are joined together, especially that which unites them to the head; for schism in the Church's notion is properly a separation from the head and authority, and is the same in the Church that rebellion or treason is in the state. Now as every disobedience to the King and the laws is not treason, though against the King, but the disclaiming the right and power the King hath to govern, and the practice of such things, by which his regalia and rights are usurped by others, as to make war, to make laws, to thrust officers upon him, to order the coin, these and of the like kind are only treason. So every error or disobedience in religion makes not a schism, but the disclaiming the right and power the Church hath to govern them, and a usurpation of a right to themselves, to order and frame points of belief, and forms how to serve and worship God, apart from the Church, for so went the style of the ancient Church for schism, altare contra altare, which in our modern dialect is a conventicle against the Church. For though schism be formally a separation from the head, yet consequently it works upon the members; for that which was at first but difference of opinion, soon begets a disaffection, and from that grows to hatred and contempt, and so falls into the practice of such things as destroy the very being and power of religion, which consists in the mutual offices of charity; and though this mischief breaks not out into an actual war, yet is always accompanied with most unnatural and unchristian practices, as St. James long since observed, Jam. 3:16, Where envy and strife is, there is confusion, and every evil work. Now to avoid all this, it will highly concern us to study to be quiet.

[1] Spurred primarily by commercial rivalry, England and Holland formally declared war on one another in March 1665, the month Laney delivered this sermon; he takes care to assure his listeners that he does not oppose this war.

Having cleared the first point, the object of our study, quiet ... and how it comes to be disturbed by schism. The next point is, to enquire into the principles whereon we are to ground our study; for if there should be an error or mistake in them, all our labour and study is lost, or worse; for an inveterate, grounded, studied error is so much the harder to be reclaimed. It was no unreasonable demand therefore of the philosopher, who asked a double reward for those scholars that had been already entered into the study of philosophy, because his pains would be double with them, to undo first, and cast out those false prejudices which they had already learned.

Now if it should happen, that they which are otherwise studious and desirous of peace, should not do the things that make for peace, as the Apostle requires, our study will grow upon us, first to unlearn those false deceitful principles of peace, before we enquire into the true: Of some of the chief of these therefore I shall give you an account in the first place. It will conduce much to the peace of the Church, they say, first,

1. If religion were free, and all compulsory means forborne,

2. If mere errors in judgment howsoever were not punished as crimes, which is not in the power of any to help.

3. Or if that, yet (thirdly) that omission of forms and ceremonies were not more severely and frequently punished, than notorious and scandalous crimes.

4. If fewer articles and points of religion were defined, it would make more room in the Church for those that dissent.

5. Another is, If men of moderate opinions were only employed in the Church.

6. The last, and most importunate pretender to peace, is, Liberty of conscience.

But that none of all these are things that make for peace, I shall show with as much brevity as the matter is capable of; as first,

I. Not the forbearance of all compulsory means by punishments, which, they say, is repugnant to that freeness with which religion should be entertained, and only forces men to an hypocritical obedience to that which in their judgments they detest.

Religion, I grant, should be free; it is no religion which is not so: But it is as true, that every other act of virtue, and obedience to the laws should be free likewise; but therefore not to punish them that transgress, were to proclaim a perpetual jubilee, and set open all prison doors: God would never have enjoined the magistrate to punish temporally, nor himself threatened to punish eternally, if the fear of that did corrupt our obedience: For our Saviour in the parable, when the guests came not to the banquet at his invitation, commanded his servants to compel them to come in [Luke 14:23]. And where they say, the fruit of that is but hypocrisy; hypocrites they are like enough to be, but from a worse cause, not from the punishment, but their own frailties, because they prefer their temporal safety before the eternal blessing which Christ hath promised to all that suffer for his sake and the truth. Secondly, it is true, that punishments reach not directly the inward man, nor do they teach or inform the judgment, that is, they do not perfect the work; but are nevertheless a good beginning to it: For, fear is the beginning of wisdom, which love must perfect. Though the needle stays not in the garment, yet it must lead the thread that makes it up. The rod indeed doth not teach the child, yet scares him to his book where he may learn: So though punishments do not perfect and accomplish our duty, yet they set us to our studies, to consider that we do not rashly cast ourselves upon danger, which otherwise possibly we would never think of, but run on whither our wild vain fancies and groundless persuasions led us....

II. The next is, That howsoever it be in other matters of religion, it would make much for the quiet of the Church, if errors in judgment were not punished as crimes, because no man can be abler and wiser than God hath made him.

It is true, that an error, so long as it stays in the understanding, and goes no further, is not properly a sin; for the understanding is not agens liberum [a free or active agent], but passive. In that the eye of the mind is as the eye of the body; if that be naturally short-sighted, it is no fault that it sees not so far as another: But if the weakness of the understanding participate with the will, which is agens liberum, and so the error comes within our power, then it may be properly a sin. This is the case of all that dissent in sects; for though in speculation the understanding is distinct from the will, yet in practise they are seldom severed. For it is morally impossible, that after a man hath conceived an opinion, he should not be well pleased with it, and have a will as occasion is to defend and propagate it too. And when it is voluntarium [voluntary], no doubt but it is peccatum [a sin or crime], and when error grows to be a sin, I know no reason why it may not be punished; for interest reipublicæ peccata puniri [it is in the interest of the state that crimes/sins be punished]. But for all that it is, they say, a great disturbance of quiet to be tied to assent to that we cannot know nor comprehend. That's a great mistake. I know there is much exception taken to the too punctual definitions of some mysteries of the faith, and particularly in the Creed commonly called by Athanasius, where there are many particulars which they cannot know nor comprehend.[1] Whereas in truth it is not required of them, they are not bound to know them, but to believe them; for it is the mercy of God, that the defect of our knowledge may be supplied by the knowledge of others; for to believe is to see with other men's eyes, as knowledge is with our own.

But may we safely trust others in that which so nearly concerns as a creed? Yes sure, and it is as well the mercy, as the command of God, that we should trust those that watch over our souls; yet still that must be to supply the defect of our knowledge, not otherwise; for the Church is not Lord of our faith, but helper of our ignorance. It supplies the defect of our sight, it doth not put it out: for if a man knows the contrary, he is not bound to believe others; for if he can see with his own eyes, why shall he be tied to see with other men's?....

III. Though errors may be punished, yet it troubles the quiet of many, that the omission of forms and ceremonies is more severely punished than some foul and scandalous crimes.

To this I answer, first, That they who object this, are not to be trusted with the balance of sins, for we know how the market went for them when they held the scale: Obedience to the King and the laws, and serving God according to them, were the great scandalous crimes.

2. Allowing it to be true as they say, That omission of forms and ceremonies is by the Church more frequently and severely punished than greater faults. But how greater? It may be in their proper and natural guilt and obliquity, according to which sentence shall be given at the day of Judgment, and to death eternal. But our earthly tribunals are not erected to anticipate the day of Judgment, to bring all sinners to trial for whatsoever they have committed in the flesh, and according to the proper measure of their guilt; but for a particular end and use; that people, while they live here in the world, and in society, may be kept in good order and quiet, from doing or receiving injuries. And to this end is the degree of their punishments commensurate. Treason and rebellion are more severely punished in the state than many other heinous crimes, because they destroy the very foundation of government and society. And for the same reason, a schismatical disobedience, though but in matters of form and ceremony, is pursued with more care and strictness, because it destroys the very end for which the power is given the Church to punish, which is, the preservation of peace and unity....

For though they are ever telling us, it is for trifles, ceremonies, or indifferent things, it is but the same quarrel the atheists have against God himself, for being so much offended for an apple, a trifle which scarce any man that hath an orchard would have been troubled with; and one answer will serve both in effect. In that forbidden fruit, God's authority in commanding, and Adam's duty in obeying, were symbolically engaged for him and his, and there was venom enough in that to infect both. The rites and ceremonies of the Church, in like manner, though not in like degree, though in their opinion as inconsiderable as the paring of Adam's apple, yet when discord and disobedience is found with them there is poison enough in that for the strongest antidote the Church doth at any time make use of. Let not that therefore mislead or disturb our student of quiet.

IV. Nor that which, in the fourth place, they look at as another expedient for peace, if fewer points and articles of religion were defined, that so the Church door may be wider open to let in those whose dissent now troubles the peace of the Church.

It is fit, I grant, the Church door should stand always open, but for such as shall be fit to enter; for it would be a dangerous thing to set any door so wide open to let in an enemy upon us. But to what purpose would we have the Church door so wide, when the Gate of Heaven is straight? why should they be taken in here, if they shall be turned back there? The Church is a city, as Jerusalem, a city that is at unity in itself; so it is a city too that hath gates and walls to shut out others.

He that came to a little city, where there was a great gate, merrily warned the citizens to take heed lest their city went not out at the gate, may soberly be said to those that would have the Church doors so wide to let in all sects, to take heed lest the Church gets not out at the door: For where so many religions are, it may be feared, that soon there will be none at all. If we be not, as the Apostle commands, built up in the same faith, it will avail us little to be found within the same walls.

It is therefore a perverse remedy for peace, to abate or diminish the articles and definitions of the Church, which were made of purpose to take away controversies; it would be a strange course to end controversies, to take away the definitions. Our student must read his books backward, if he seek for peace from hence. We might as well say, all the world would be quiet, if there were no judges nor laws to determine differences.

V. There is another expedient for peace, which I hear much spoken of, and highly set by as a great point of prudence, If men of moderate opinions were only taken into employment in the Church.

Moderation, I confess, is an excellent virtue, and much to be desired; Let your moderation be known unto all men, Phil. 4:5. But then it must be in a subject capable of it, wherein there are extremes and excesses to be moderated, as there is certainly in our passions, there it is proper. St. Paul gives it for a lesson to all students in religion, Ephes. 4:31: Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, and tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. This no doubt is a very fit temper for quiet, and none more unfit than angry, waspish, and domineering spirits.

Only this caution is to be observed in lenity. That it be such as may win men into the Church, not such as may secure and encourage them to stay without. Yet lenity and gentleness is so good a virtue, that I am loth to cast water upon it, or seem to temper it.

But for men of moderate opinions, I am at a loss to know what they should be; for moderation there cannot be, but between extremes. Now what extremes are there of opinions in a settled Church, unless the Church be one extreme, and the schismatic another? and then the man of moderate opinions is he that is part Church-man, and part schismatic. I hope none are so unkind to their Mother the Church, to charge extremities upon her doctrine or laws. If there be any such, they are but hybrids in religion, and make a new sect in the Church, as pernicious to the peace of it as any of the rest. The truth is, moderate opinions are a chimaera, a fancy; either nothing, or somewhat worse than nothing: for possibly they may bestow that good word (moderation) upon such as care little either to observe the law themselves, or to require it of others. If these be the men of moderate opinions, I wonder how they will be able to give account of their justice and fidelity to the trust committed to them. Yes, they say, very well: it is rather prudence than injustice, to mitigate and sweeten the sharpness and rigour of the law. But if the law itself be too rigorous, in God's name let it be amended, and not left to the arbitrary power of others to do it, for that's known to be a remedy ten times worse than the disease. It is said in physic, I know not how truly, that an error in the first concoction, is not mended in the second: It is certainly true here, an error or excess in the law, which is the first concoction of justice, will be ill cured afterward by an arbitrary partiality in the execution. I hope therefore no wise student of quiet, will take such moderators for the best ministers of peace. But I leave them, and come to the most popular, and therefore most dangerous principle in the study of quiet; that is, liberty of conscience.

VI. I have spoken to this point heretofore in this place; yet because of late our new philosophical divines, as well as others, press hard for it, knowing without a free market, they cannot vend their bold speculations; I shall resume the point again a little more largely, yet within the compass of these two particulars.

First, That there is a great deal of reason to restrain the conscience, and secondly, That there is no reason to give it liberty.

1. There is reason enough to restrain the conscience, for the mischief it doth to quiet when it is at liberty; for all the discord and divisions of the Church grow from hence, and that is a mischief we have reason to avoid. Mark them (saith St. Paul) which cause divisions among you, and avoid them [Romans 16:17]. There is reason then to mark that which causeth them to make divisions, and that's the conscience. It is no quieter in the Commonwealth, where it destroys the very foundation of Government, and frustrates the ordinance of God for it in Princes and Magistrates; for what is left for them to do, if everyone must follow the dictate of his own conscience, that is, in plain terms, be bound only to obey himself.

This is no slander to the pretenders of conscience; they will say as much themselves, if we ask them. Ask the schismatic why he joins not with the congregation of God's people? and he will tell you, His conscience will not suffer him. Ask the rebel in the state, why he takes up arms to the ruin of his King and country? and his conscience will answer for him, That it is God's cause, and it is to do him service. Ask him again, why he doth not repent of the mischief done by it? (for that they seldom do) and the conscience will serve that turn too, It is God's cause, and the conscience will not suffer them to repent of that. Thus we see, the conscience, as it is used, doth not only open a door to sin, but shuts the very door to mercy, that is repentance.

If St. John said true, as no doubt he did, That there were many Antichrists, then possibly the conscience thus improved may be one of them. For, it sets itself in the Church above all that is called God, yea, and God himself too, in a sense; for his laws are not to be obeyed, unless the conscience first allows them to be his: and thus all is resolved into the conscience, as the dernier [last] resort and last appeal.

While the King and the Pope are contending for supremacy, the conscience without scruple puts in for it against both, and takes it for her rights to be supreme in all causes as well ecclesiastical as civil. There is great complaint in the world of domineering over the conscience; but have we not rather cause to complain of the domineering of the conscience? And if any list to see the conscience acting all this, we need go no further than our late times, when the conscience was loose for a while; one would think Hell had broke loose, so filled was on a sudden the Church with sects, and the Commonwealth with confusion. There is reason enough therefore to restrain the conscience that acts all this, if we knew how.

The next thing I undertook to show, is, That there is no reason why it should have liberty; and particularly, not that which gives the fairest colour to it: Neither the duty we owe to truth, which seems to have some right to liberty; nor that we owe to the will of God, that nothing be done against the conscience. For the first.

Truth is that (I confess) which no consideration of peace may warrant us to desert; for I could never be of that opinion, That truth in smaller matters may for peace sake be either denied or prejudiced.... Truth in that first reference to the thing, admits no qualification; things must be taken as they are, be they never so small: but as the things come to be represented to, and entertained by the understanding, by reason of the mistakes and errors that may happen in that, though truth itself, or truth in the thing cannot, yet my apprehension of it may both yield to better, and may sometimes be waived for peace sake. To argue from truth in the thing, to truth in the apprehension only, is a fallacy against the rules of reasoning, we call it petitio principii, or a begging of the question.[1] If a sectary should beg an alms, I wish he may have it; but he shall beg long ere it be granted him, that he hath the truth. How then can he presume upon that truth, to which he hath no other title but his own persuasion, which can be no better than any man's else, who is as strongly persuaded to the contrary? And this is all the service that truth can do the conscience for liberty.

2. The second thing whereupon the conscience especially bears itself so high, is the will of God that nothing be done against the conscience. That no doubt is a great offence, and made so by the greatest authority: Yet the same God that requires our obedience to the conscience, commands us likewise to obey our parents, our Princes and Governors, and all these stand upon as good authority as the conscience. If we cannot reconcile our obedience to that with our obedience to these, we may sin against God, when we do not sin against the conscience. For though God hath erected a tribunal in every man's breast, and there set the conscience to be a judge of all our actions, there be other tribunals of justice besides, of God's erection too, and to which

[1] petitio principii "begging the question," the logical fallacy of taking for granted that which remains to be proved.

he hath subjected the very conscience. Ye must needs be subject (Rom. 13) not only for wrath, but also for conscience. And after both these, there is another tribunal in Heaven, to which all judges, conscience and all must give an account one day. For the conscience is no Court of Record; the decrees and acts passed there, will be no good evidence at that bar; there all must be re-examined, and tried over again. Though I know nothing by myself, (saith St. Paul) yet am I not thereby justified. Though he could not charge his conscience with any offence, he knew a further trial must pass upon him before he could be absolved. My conscience indeed may be pleaded there in evidence against me as a witness to condemn me, but not as a judge to absolve me. It is a great mistake in the power and operation of the conscience: That it will condemn us, if we do any thing against it, the text is clear for that; but that it will absolve us for that we do according to it, there is no text, I am sure, for that we must then be tried by the law, and not by the conscience.

If they that stand so much upon their consciences did seriously consider this, they would find as little cause to desire that liberty, as there is to grant it, seeing it stands them in so little stead when they have most need of it; for when they think their conscience shall answer for them, they must then answer for their conscience, and upon trial, the conscience may prove the great offender. Thus have I hitherto given you an account of some of the vulgar mistaken principles of quiet, which our student is first to unlearn....

But I fear I have run out all my time almost in these mistaken ways of peace: I presume it will be a greater offence to leave you here now, than to beg a little more time to set you in the right way, though I shall not go beyond the office of a Mercury, to point the hand where it lies.

There is the King's highway to peace, and the student's private way, and both good in their kind. With the King's way I shall not meddle, as being fitter matter for our thankfulness than instruction, who hath already paved the way for us by wholesome laws for that purpose. But because ofttimes...the compulsory way by law, though always necessary, is not always effectual; to the King's way we must add the student's also: That every one in his particular makes it his care and business to contribute to it, that it be an artificial studied peace, to which not fear only, but conscience of duty and religion obligeth us.

Now every good student of any science searches into the true and proper cause of things.... If the cause of all division in the Church be differing in judgment, nothing can cure that but a consent. St. Paul therefore prescribes that for the remedy, I Cor. 5:10: That there be no divisions among you; how may that be helped? it follows, But that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment. This is the true Apostolical Principle, whereon we are to ground our study of quiet: For all the fine things and sentences that are spoken for peace and quiet, will little move those that are, and may very well be confident, they ought not howsoever have peace with sin, or error. Unless therefore we can be first persuaded that we ought not to charge the Church with either, we do nothing for peace. This I confess is the great difficulty, yet if this be not done, there can be no hope of peace.

And to do this, I shall not send our student to the polemic school, to convince him out of speculative principles of reason and divinity; for to that study, some have not capacity, others not leisure: I shall only commend to him some practical principles of religion, obvious to all, and denied by none, that out of them he may learn not to dissent from, or condemn the Church of, error.

To prevent the passing that sentence, let the student 1. Study himself, his own condition. 2. Let him study the Church against which he passeth sentence. 3. Let him study the nature and quality of the things whereupon judgment is given. 4. Let him consider well the manner of proceeding in judgment. In all which we shall find some known principle of religion to direct us.

1. First, In the study of ourselves, and our own condition: Religion teacheth us to have an humble, lowly, mean opinion of ourselves; and not without cause, whether we respect our understandings, or our affections: Our understandings are naturally weak, imperfect, short-sighted, we know but in part, the best of us; and our affections too are disloyal to our understandings, The heart of man, saith the Prophet, is deceitful above all things. We have little reason then to trust ourselves much in either. He that is truly conscious of his own weakness or lameness, will be content to be supported by others. If we study this point well, our own infirmities, we should learn more willingly to assent to, and take support from the Church.

Especially, if in the second place, we study that too whose governors' religion likewise teaches us to obey, For they watch over our souls, Heb. 13:17. If it be a good point of religion, in lowliness of mind to esteem others better than ourselves, Phil. 2:3, it is religion and reason both, to think our governors wiser too; for there is a presumption always in favour of them. St. Paul gives it for a rule to Timothy, Not to receive an accusation against an Elder, but before two or three witnesses [I Timothy 5:19], because it is to be presumed on the part of age and authority, to know more, and offend less. But when it comes to be the whole eldership, all our governors jointly, the presumption is so much the stronger. If we add this study to the former, how little reason we have to trust ourselves, and how much we have to trust our governors, we will not rashly pass sentence against them, if we have either reason or religion in us.

3. And yet we have more work for our student; Let him, in the third place, consider the nature and quality of the things whereupon judgment is given, how apt they are to deceive us. Truth is many times so like an error, and error comes so near to truth, that he had need be careful and circumspect that shall distinguish them in some cases. And in others again, truth lies hid under many folds, especially ambiguity of words, the common cheat of all students, who are more often deceived into opinions than convinced. It is not strange to see so many go astray from the Church, to whom the things of it are represented under the covert of false names, when they hear the government of it called tyranny; obedience, slavery; contempt, courage; license, liberty; frenzy, zeal; order, superstition. How easily thus may simple people mistake their way, and fall into the pit that's covered over with shadows and false names of things? When he hath studied this point well,

4. Let him, in the fourth place, be well advised in what manner he proceeds in judgment, and upon what evidence: For, allowing the conscience to be a judge, it must not trespass upon the rules of good judicature, as, both sides must be heard impartially, which is seldom done; the conscience must not be misled no more than other judges, by prejudice, passion, or favour; for what can that judgment be worth which is perverted by any of these. Now if we examine how most men come to pass sentence against the Church, we shall find it to be upon very slight evidence: It may be their education, they have been always brought up that way; for sects commonly run in a blood, in a family: Or they have been so taught, they say, by good men; that indeed is the sum and upshot of the faith of most that dissent, the credit given to some weak, private, ignorant instructor, whose person they have in admiration, without any great cause, God knows; whereas their private judgments, because they are parties, ought always to be suspected, if we be wise; and because against their governors, to be condemned, if we be obedient.

All these well studied, may make for peace, when possibly arguments, and disputes, and punishments too will not do it. And yet if still none of these will make our student quiet,

Let him, in the last place, make trial of a common remedy that prevails in all cases of difficulty: Let him but study his own security, the safest course, and he shall find that better provided for in the Church's judgment, than in his own; for, if he should err in following the Church, or his governors, for that is possible, the greatest part of that guilt, some say all, I say only the greatest part, must lie at their door that command that which is unlawful: But if they should err in following their own judgment, or a judge of their own choosing, for that makes it their own too, and that is more than possible, all the blame and guilt then must of necessity and inexcusably fall upon themselves. Upon these principles, setting aside all those that may convince our judgments in particulars, from these alone, I say, we see how safe, how prudent, how religious a thing it is to submit our private judgments to the public, for the peace of the Church.

It remains only now, that we employ our best endeavour and study for it, which is the second part of the text, and the last thing to be considered,

That ye study.

Study is an earnest intention of the mind, by diligent search and enquiry. Wishing well to quiet, or speaking well of it, will not serve; the greatest disturbers of peace will do that many times, give it a good word, when they will not part with a fancy for it. And yet quiet is a thing that requires care and pains somewhat more than ordinary: For when St. Peter likewise speaks of peace, it is in words of the same import, Seek peace, and ensue it [I Peter 3:11]. If it be hidden, seek it out; if it flies from you, pursue after it. It is a busy thing to be quiet. The word here translated, study, is in the original φιλοτιμέομαι [philotimeomai], be ambitious of it; that is, pursue and study it as you would do honour and preferment: And that, I think, is as much as can be desired; and yet not more than quiet both deserves and needs.

First, it deserves it. For though quiet be rather Status vitæ [a state of life], than virtus [a virtue]; it is no virtue itself, yet the best soil to plant virtue in. The fruits of righteousness are sown in peace, Jam. 3:18. So are all the fruits of industry; learning, arts, sciences, traffic, commerce, flourish most in the calm temperate clime; but in troubles and dissensions every good thing goes backward, only mischief thrives. It fares with troubled times, as in troubled waters; all the filth, dirt and mire in the bottom gets then up to the top. We saw as much when our waters were lately troubled; what a deal of filth, dirt and mire, what sordid stuff was then got up to the top and highest place of rule and command? So much are we the more obliged to study that peace and quiet, which hath sunk them to their proper place again, the bottom: And there let them lie, if you would be quiet.

2. As it deserves therefore our study, so it needs it too; for it is a difficult thing to be quiet, the way to it lies through so many parts and duties of religion, and not the easiest of them neither: To deny ourselves, by humility and lowliness of mind to acknowledge our own weakness and frailty, to submit our judgments to others, as better and wiser than ourselves; to subdue our passions and lusts, from whence the Apostle observes wars and contentions to come, from our lusts [James 4:1]; and to all these the flesh hath naturally a reluctance. Our student therefore hath need to contend with himself to be at peace with others.

St. Paul was at Athens when he wrote this epistle, a famous University for the study of all liberal arts and sciences. I cannot say he had these in his thought, when he commended this study to the Thessalonians, as an art of more use than any he found at Athens: Yet when I see him so passionately earnest for it, to beseech them to study, we have reason to value it as an art well worthy of schools, and professors, and students. And they would make a Royal Society, whereof the King himself is Master, who is our peacemaker by office, and by a care equal to that, hath by law provided, that under Him we may live a peaceable and quiet life in all godliness and honesty [I Timothy 2:2]. He hath little sense of honour, that will not enter himself a student under that conduct. The very word for study, φιλοτιμέομαι, carries honour in it.

And yet I can tell them of a higher school for it than this, and wherein Kings themselves are content to be students. Our Lord Christ, the great Mediator of our eternal peace with Heaven, would not be brought into the world without a song of peace on Earth, by Angels: And when he left the world, bequeathed it as a legacy after him, My peace I leave with you [John 14:27]. And when he comes again to judge the world, we have reason to look that he will call us to a reckoning how we use his legacy. And so he will too; for he is that Lord, Matth. 24, that when he came and found some smiting their fellow-servants, commanded them to be cut asunder, and have their portion with hypocrites: A punishment well fitted to the offence; there was a schism in the fault, and there shall be another schism in the punishment; they who sundered and divided from their brethren, should themselves be cut asunder, and have their portion with hypocrites. But for the peace-makers, when he comes, he will provide better company, for they shall be called the children of God [Matthew 5:9]. Blessed are they then whom the Lord when he comes shall find at their studies of that quiet which gives them so fair a title to eternal rest and peace in Heaven with Christ, and all the children of God.

A Sermon Preached before the King At Whitehall, March 18, 1666

1 THESSALONIANS 4:11
—And to do your own business.

The whole verse, whereof these words are a part, is an exhortation to the study of two lessons; one for quiet, the other for business: That ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business.

Of the former, the last time I had the honor to be called to this service, we treated particularly; and it was a point well worthy our care and study. But the lesson we are now to learn, seems not much to deserve or need it.

I have not (I confess) sought far for a text, but took that which came next to hand. Nor doth the text put you to seek far what you are to do; It is but your own business. In both respects it may be thought unfit for this audience, which is not of that quality to be entertained with no better provision than what comes next to hand; and especially, if that should prove plain and homely, as that is, To do our own business; and as it follows, To work with our own hands: This is but a kind of mechanical doctrine; and what should that do here in Court?

Not to leave myself and the text under this prejudice; That I sought no farther for it, was not of easiness or neglect, but choice; Because I found it not only in conjunction and company with the excellent study of quiet, to which any kind of retainer at large might deserve respect; but also, because I saw it set by the Apostle, in a place of near and intimate relation, a principle and foundation to it. The next way to be quiet abroad, is to be busy at home.... This doing our own business,... is a practical principle, whereupon depends much of the business of our whole lives, and so hath the fate of other foundations, to be little seen and regarded; It lies low under ground, and we overlook it, as a thing not worthy any man's thought or care. But to give it the due, we must not look upon what it is in sight, but what it is in virtue; a principle and foundation whereupon is built that which is the desire of all good men, the public peace and quiet of the Church and Kingdom. And then we may allow it to be good doctrine which hath so good a use. It is a good tree that brings forth good fruit.

But then you will say, It must be in season too. Now the wise man tells us, There is a time for war, as well as a time for peace [Ecclesiastes 3:8]. And can it then be seasonable again and again thus to importune the study of such things as make for peace, at a time when we are all, and have cause to be in preparation for war? Indeed if it were such a peace, as would weaken the hands of any in the pursuit of that just, necessary and royal expedition, it were a most unseasonable solecism. But we must know, as there is a war that makes for peace, so there is a peace that makes for war. Unity among ourselves, binds us close together; we are the stronger for it.... Domestic peace then, though it comes not out of the artillery, is good ammunition for war: And it falls in well too, with the express letter and doctrine of the text, it is our own business. As it is the proper business of a King to protect his subjects from the insolencies and injuries of proud insulting neighbours; so it is the business of every good subject too, to assist him in it with their lives and fortunes. Whether therefore we seek for peace at home, or have cause of war abroad, the duty of the text is for us. We are doing our own business. But though it be a good foundation to build on every way; yet, except the Lord build the house, their labour is but lost that build. Let us therefore before we go farther in the work, go to him for a blessing upon it.

[I]n this lesson there will fall to be learned these particulars:

1. That, there is and ought to be a propriety in business;[1] that to everyone there belongs something that he may properly call his own.

2. The obligation of duty and religion, to confine himself to that which is his own.

3. The operation it hath had in the world upon our quiet or disquiet.

4. From these is inferred a necessity to study it; That ye study to do your own business.

I. First, That there is a propriety in business. This must be laid for a ground; all the rest else will fall to nothing. It will be no religion to keep it; no sin to break it; no need to study it....

There is a busy humour in the world, to lay all common; and it is grown to be a sect of religion; yea, more than one; as many as there are kinds of propriety, so many sects endeavour to fling down the enclosures.

1. As first, there is a propriety in goods and possessions; and against this, there rises a sect of Levellers, who tell us from the Psalmist, The Heavens are the Lord's; but the Earth hath he given to the Children of men [Psalms 115:16].[2] That to which every man hath a right by the gift of God, the pride and covetousness of a few have engrossed, and made their own.

2. There is a right and propriety of respect and honour due to some above others. Against this arises another sect of Levellers they call Quakers, who refuse to give honour to whom honour belongs.[3] Though this looks like a religion against good manners only, or were but some quarrel with the grammarians against proper names; the mischief of it lies deeper, and is of the spirit of Anabaptism, who oppose the very powers and dignities them-

[1] propriety property or ownership.

[2] For this kind of communitarian argument, see the selection by Gerrard Winstanley.

[3] Founded by George Fox in the late 1640s, the Quaker movement became notorious in the period for its members' refusal to acknowledge social superiority (by doffing hats, etc.).

selves, which they despise in their titles; for they cannot be so foolish, though simple enough, as to make a religion of names only. These are dangerous sects of Levellers both; but they lie not in our way. The text toucheth only Levellers of business, who think they are not to be barred the liberty of doing anything that is good.... But that there is a title and propriety in some to business, wherein it is not permitted to everyone to interpose, a necessity in Nature requires. The world is replenished with infinite variety of things, and a great deal of work is to be done to make them useful and serviceable to us. Now it is not possible for everyone to do all, and hardly all, in any one thing, to gain the full use and benefit of it. But when the works are distributed severally to some, the benefit may redound to all.

All the business of the world refers either to a spiritual end, the good of the soul; or to a temporal and civil, our well-being while we live here upon earth: And to both these ends God hath appointed and assigned particular persons; he did not leave them in common. In the temporal there is private business and public. For private use, as in families, there is the business of the husband and wife, the parent and children, the master and servants. And out of families, for private use likewise, there is the business of physicians and advocates, husbandmen, merchants and mariners, mechanics and labourers; and all these are of private nature, though of common benefit. Then is there the public business, by which all these are ordered and governed, and they are by St. Peter distinguished to our hands, as that of the King as supreme, and of Governors sent by him [I Peter 2:13–14]; and they are magistrates and judges for peace, captains and commanders for war. And besides these, there is the business of ministers and assistants to the supreme power, counsellors, lawyers, officers and servants; and all these are for that temporal end.

And for the spiritual, whose business refers to the soul, there is likewise a propriety; as in bishops to ordain, institute and order the rest of the clergy specially, and of the whole diocese occasionally, as the necessity of it shall require. Then is there the business of the Presbyters, in the several parts of the diocese, in a more particular and immediate cure and charge, to be directed by, and accountable to the bishop. There be others diaconal and ministerial to both. And all together, temporal and spiritual, as several members, make one body; and every Member, saith the Apostle, hath not the same office, Rom. 12:4. God divided his gifts to everyone severally as he will, I Cor. 12:11, he did not scatter them in common, but divide them, and all hold in severalty.

And as that severance and propriety stands upon good authority; so authority was, no doubt, induced upon reason of profit and interest. It conduceth more to the common good, than community itself could.

1. First, it brings order into the common business of the world, and that takes away confusion, which never did anything well....

2. In reason all business will be best done too, by those to whom they are peculiar and proper.... Men are most trusted in their own trades. We trust the lawyer with our estates, the physician with our bodies. I say nothing of our souls; we are so wise at that work, as to trust none but ourselves.

3. Yet thirdly, the nature and condition of the business itself, may require it. Some are so difficult, that everyone cannot do, though he would; and some are so mean, that every one would not do, though he could: and all are such, as through the mercy of God we need not do if we will, unless it be our own business.

We are now fallen upon the second part, that as everyone hath some business that is his own, so duty and religion obligeth him to take upon him no business but his own.

II. This lesson will not be so easily learned as the former: all confinement of itself seems uneasy.

He that hath no mind to go abroad, would not be tied to stay at home. And he that cares for no business, will take it ill to be barred any. But this confinement besides, nips the growth and increase of good, whereof they think, more would be done if everyone have free liberty to do it; and therefore it is just and reasonable to allow any one a concurrent jurisdiction with others in any thing that is otherwise good, though that be to govern with the King, to pray & preach, or what they please, with the Priest. And they have as much of propriety as any can have to business; yet even to these, they think any man may make a sufficient title, that hath understanding to know what is to be done, as well as any other, and affection to do it, perhaps more than others. And all have right and interest in the public, especially that wherein religion and the soul is concerned; how God may be best served, and wherein his glory may be most promoted. Will not all these make a title good enough to any business?

...In that everyone hath liberty to improve his understanding and knowledge for the best, as well for his own soul as the public good: In that let the glory of God be the star to guide him. But all these do not make the business ours; they are a good qualification in any for business, yet give no right or title to it. Great knowledge and skill in the laws will not set a man upon the bench; nor of divinity, in the bishop's chair; nor will the dexterous glib-gifted tongue put a man into the pulpit. There must be besides a title and commission to make them ours.

But must all the obligations we have to the public good, and to God's honour, stoop to commissions, titles and proprieties, which are but the creatures and constitutions of men?

To this question, I answer in the words of Job 13:7: Will you speak wickedly for God, and talk deceitfully for him? It is deceitful talking, to plead for God against himself; for though it should be granted, that the sorting of several employments and functions have something of man in them; yet the confirmation and approbation of God makes it his, and so divine: for as God hath founded a divine moral law, upon the propriety of goods and possessions, Thou shalt not steal; yea, thou shalt not covet that which is another's; and yet it comes not to be another's, but by human laws. So though different states of life and employment have somewhat in them by disposition of law, or our own choice; yet upon them also is founded this moral duty, to keep within those bounds: For though men laid the land-marks, yet God commanded They should not be removed, Deut. 19:14.

It is a kind of burglary to break into another man's business, as well as into another man's house: or if you will not allow it to be theft to have another's business found with you, as it is to have another's goods; it is as ill as theft in St. Peter's opinion. The murtherer, the thief, the evil-doer, the busy-body; there's a mess of them, he puts them all alike together, Pet. 4:15.

To shut up this point, If the glory of God, and the public good, and such like fair pretences, might let us loose upon one another's business, it would quickly bring us round, where we were, to that confusion and disorder, for remedy whereof, the Apostle added this lesson to the former. We shall never learn to be quiet well, unless we learn also to keep within our own business.

Yet I deny not, but that discord and dissention have other causes besides, for, of Pride cometh contention, saith Solomon, Prov. 13:10. And from covetousness, saith St. James, they desire, and have not, James 4:2. It is true of other lusts, wrath, revenge, envy, slander, and curiosity too, break the peace too often, and had need be bound to their good behaviour all. Yet we may observe it, That none of all these do actually any great mischief that way, till they first bring it to this, till it draws us from our own station, and fling us upon something that is none of our own business.

III. The truth of this will more fully be seen in the third part, which comes next to be considered, The operation it hath had in the world, by disturbing the peace and quiet of it. Meum and Tuum [mine and thine] hath not filled it with more suits and contentions in our goods and possessions, than it hath in the actions and business of our lives, What is our own, and what is not our own.

To arraign all that are guilty of breaking this rule in several kinds, would ask a long process. We will therefore take notice only here of the attempts upon Government and Religion, by those whose business it was not; because the most and greatest tempests and storms in the Christian World, have blown from that coast.

2. We were in a sad case not long since in this Kingdom by a civil war. I meddle not with the fault, let that sleep under the Act of Oblivion.[1] We may, I trust, without offence, enquire into the cause of it. What were they doing that gave us that disquiet? Look upon the Standard set up for the war; I mean, the most execrable COVENANT,[2] Quomodo legis? how read you there? was it not meddling with business was none of their own? They Covenanted first to extirpate the Government of the Church established by law. That law, with hands lifted up to Heaven, they swore they would abolish. The legislative power we know in whom it is, to make or mend laws; it was none of their business. In this they were certainly too bold with the King's scepter. At the next turn they take hold of his sword too, and engage themselves to a mutual defence against all opposition. This also was none of their business. For though a self-defence may be allowed as natural to all; it is against private, not public opposition.... The sword is the King's, and he that takes it from any hand but his, where God hath placed it, shall perish with the sword. In this the Covenanters, as ill as they like bishops, would be, in the Apostle's phrase,...the worst sort of Bishops, that is, meddlers in business was none of their own [I Peter 4:15]. The worshippers of the Covenant have therefore been well dealt with, as the worshippers of the Golden Calf were by Moses, Exod. 32:20.... But the Covenant is past, and let it go. I wish for quiet sake, we may never hear of the like again.

3. This was transient: But there still remains a permanent and habitual disturbance of our peace, in the multitude and swarms of SECTS and factions in religions, to which it is naturally and inseparably inherent: An incurable mischief; like the leprosy on the walls, that could not be cleansed, but by pulling down the house. From these we have felt already but too much, and have cause yet to fear more.

But can we charge them with doing a business is none of their own? Can any thing be more properly our own business, than the care of our souls, and to serve God in the best manner that our understandings and consciences shall direct us?

They are mistaken that think the charge lies upon this issue, what every man may do for himself and his own salvation. He may without question do very much, for he may keep all God's commandments, if he can....And again, he may serve and worship God with as much fervency and devotion as he can and will; he may abound in charity, meekness, humility, patience and temperance, and all other Christian virtues. And so long as ye thus follow that which is good, saith St. Peter, who will harm you? [I Peter 3:13] And I may say too, who can hinder you in all this? but if he makes himself a party in a sect, if there be assembling together in companies, gather congregations, incorporate in a body, module Churches, give laws of doctrine and worship, set up teachers and leaders of their own; to all this they have as little right, as they have need. A man may go far, ye see, in Religion, without troubling any; and if then they fall into some error or misbelief in religion, they ought not to be severely handled; but when they betake themselves to a sect, that alters the case, it will then be compassion mistaken. A locust alone is no such perilous beast to be feared or regarded by any; but when they come in shoals and swarms, and cover the face of the earth, they are a plague to the country where they light. So to look upon a sectary single, who out of simplicity and good meaning follows his conscience, our hearts should be every whit as tender for them, as their consciences are. But if we look upon them in company, they are as ill and dangerous as the company they are found in; and the danger of all popular meetings, and associations to a state, makes it the proper business of a King and his ministers to look to it, and to provide against it; wherein the care hath been taken, deserves a just commendation.

[1] The Act of Indemnity and Oblivion (1660) provided a general amnesty (excluding some named individuals), and prohibited public laying of blame for the wars.

[2] the Solemn League and Covenant (1643), in which the Long Parliament agreed to institute Presbyterianism in England in exchange for Scottish military support.

And yet when I assert and refer this business to the KING, I look to be called to an account for that; For they take the boldness by way of recrimination, to turn the text upon the King himself, That His Power is Civil, and Matters of the Church and Religion are Ecclesiastical, and so none of his business.

This is, I confess, too weighty a matter to be here thrust into the corner of a sermon; yet it will be necessary to say so much as may somewhat lay that loud clamour against it: For the Papists and Presbyterians both, how ill soever they may agree in other matters, hunt in couples against the King's power and SUPREMACY. But as we deny not all to others in their places; so we claim not all for the King. If I shall but only now set out his part in matters of the Church, it will appear sufficiently, that he...takes not upon him business which is not his own.

They say, he claims by his title of supremacy, To govern all persons in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil.

We acknowledge this to be his just title; but deny, that he doth any thing by it, which is not properly his own business, and in right of his crown. That he is the fountain also of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, though it be not expressly in his title, we acknowledge to be in his power.

. . . .

6. But lastly, is not this the same wrong and illusion we charge the Pope with, who in order to his spiritual end, usurps the temporal power; so the King in order to his temporal government, invades the ecclesiastical?

No, the case is far different. If the Pope did order temporals by spiritual means only,...we had the less to say against him; he is not out of the way of a bishop's power, though he should abuse it. But he for his spiritual end, usurps temporal means, and takes upon him to dispose of temporal estates, that is none of his business.... To return to our sectaries, who put us upon this digression, they still remain as we left them, guilty of doing much that is none of their own business.

What then is to be done with them? According to a late statute, a mittimus (I think) might be made to send them to prison;[1] but the Apostle here deals more kindly with them, and sends them only to school to study better, which is my fourth and last point.

IV. That ye study to do your own business. I will take no more out of the word study, than what any one understands to be in it: a serious weighing and considering of the matter; and there is need of it.

[1] The Five-Mile Act (1665) prohibited nonconformist ministers from preaching, teaching, or coming within five miles of the parish where they had officiated; mittimus a warrant to commit to prison.

1. The first thing the student is to do before he takes in hand any matter of importance, is to set down and consider whether it be his own business, or no; what title he can make to it. It is utterly a fault amongst us, to think that no part of our business, to consider whether it be our business or no. If a qualm comes over the stomach, that we begin to grow government-sick, or that the ceremonies and superstitions of the Church offend us, presently without further dispute, what ever comes of it, it is resolved we will have a better government, and a more pure and reformed Church. That is commonly concluded, before this be disputed. No good student will do so, conclude without premises. We must see whether it be our own business first, how we can derive a title to it.

We know, that government and religion come both originally from God; to which none can have right, but they to whom God hath set over, and entrusted the care and charge of either: Our part is to see by what mean conveyance it comes from them to us. If we have nothing to show that either of them have been particularly committed to us, we may safely and certainly conclude, it is none of our business.

2. Every student must observe a good method in his study; whereof one rule is, to proceed à manifestis ad obscuriora [from the obvious to the obscure]: Let him begin at that which is without question his own business. Hath he done all that belongs to his proper place and function, which is certainly his own? Or hath he a family at home to govern, that no doubt is his too? Are his wife, and children, and servants well ordered, all as they should be? St. Paul gives a charge to Timothy, not to set a bishop over the Church, who hath not governed his own family well. Though some have not a family without, yet everyone hath a family within, and a large one too: To rule his passions and inordinate desires only, asks a world of work, and they will find it so, whenever they set themselves upon it.

What a preposterous method and course is it to hunt eagerly after liberty from some imaginary pressure in government, or some poor ceremony in the Church, while in the mean time we are true slaves to some base, vile lust within us. Here we should begin to set our selves at liberty from our selves. And this the method of charity requires, as well as the method of art. Charity begins always at home, at our own business....

3. Study will be therefore needful in this case, because otherwise unconsidering men are apt to be carried away with the fair show of zeal and religion in reforming others; they take it for a wrong from any that think not so of it: But by considering well, they will find they are disappointed of that hope; for whatsoever sets them on work, it cannot be true religion, that is not contrary to itself. All students know, that one truth is not repugnant to another; nor one virtue to another.

1. Religion doth not make men tools, to employ themselves in that whereof there comes no good. All we do in other men's business, runs waste....

2. And yet, secondly, there is a worse matter in it than idleness. It charges our account more than needs; and there is no wisdom in that; for when the conscience brings us in more work than either God or man particularly requires, though it be not our own of duty here, it will be our own in account hereafter: For the conscience of doing it, makes it ours howsoever; and so guilty both of it, and all the mischief that comes by it.

3. 'Tis against justice....Justice lets every man enjoy his own. He that takes upon him another man's business, because he can do it better (for that's the great pretence, to do that which is best), may as well take another man's purse, because he will spend the money better. I think we will hardly allow of that justice.

4. 'Tis against hope, that Christian hope which supports us in all our sufferings and afflictions....

Lastly, as it disappoints them of the hope of that mercy from God; so it casts them into the snare of the Devil....There is no better fence against the Devil, than this...if he finds us diligently employed at home in our own business.

If for all this, the meddling reformers of others would be thought the men of religion, and of the first rate too; Let them know, That it is of such a religion as hath neither prudence in it, nor charity, nor justice, nor hope, nor safety. And when he hath weighed all these mischiefs that follow the breaking this rule:

Let him in the next place, consider the benefit that comes by keeping it. At that I began, and with that I will conclude. This lesson was set us of purpose by the Apostle to second and enforce the other of peace and quiet. The best way to be quiet with others, is to be busy with ourselves. It is the natural and genuine effect of it. All discord and dissension must be between two, either persons or parties; and that which commonly kindles the fire, is envy, or some supposed injury; now he that intends his own business only, can give no occasion to others, of either envy or complaint; and so in recompence of keeping to his own business, he shall quietly sit under his own vine, and under his own fig tree; he shall have own for own.

Lastly, besides this outward quiet with others, it will produce another within us, the quiet and tranquillity of the conscience, without which, outward peace may prove to some but a quiet passage here, to eternal misery hereafter. But this makes it a thorough quiet, both sides alike, within and without; for it lays those busy, unsatisfied thoughts within us, which otherwise gives trouble both to our selves and others: That when we see not, or think we see not all things so well carried in the Church and government, as we could wish; yet having gone as far to mend it, as the line of our own business will reach, and the farthest end of that is, having peaceably moved for it, and heartily prayed for it, we may with a safe and quiet conscience, leave the rest to God, and those to whom he hath committed that care and charge, whose proper business it is. And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy from the God of peace and mercy; to whom be all honour, glory and praise, for ever. Amen.

Francis Quarles

1592 – 1644

Quarles was born in Essex, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge and Lincoln's Inn. He was cupbearer to the Princess Elizabeth ("Elizabeth of Bohemia") at her wedding to the Elector Palatine in 1613, and went to Germany in her retinue. He returned to England in 1620. In 1626 he became secretary to James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh, who famously worked out a biblical chronology showing that the world was created in 4004 B.C.E., a chronology which can still be found in books published in the nineteenth century. He returned to England in 1633, and in 1635 published the work for which he is best remembered, the Emblems, Divine and Moral. This work was extraordinarily popular, and it is frequently said that Quarles was the best-selling British author of the century. Horace Walpole was to remark that Milton "had to wait until the world had done admiring Quarles." There is some irony in Quarles's reputation among his contemporaries; he was much admired by Puritans, but most of the engravings in his volume are copied or adapted from Jesuit emblem books. Quarles himself was an ardent Royalist and disliker of Puritan views.

The European vogue for emblems began with the Emblematum liber of Andrea Alciati, and the form was very popular for two hundred years. It typically consisted of a "word" or motto, a woodcut or engraving illustrating the motto, and an explicatio or unfolding of the idea expressed in the motto and the illustration. Often the emblem was bilingual or multilingual and so emblem books, in their origin learned, came to be used as language textbooks. Quarles was the most important of English emblem writers.

Emblem III
(from Book III)

Psalm 17:5

Stay my steps in thy paths, that my feet do not slide.

Whene'er the old exchange of profit rings
Her silver saints-bell of uncertain gains,
My merchant-soul can stretch both legs and wings;
How can I run, and take unwearied pains!
The charms of profit are so strong that I,
Who wanted legs to go, finds wings to fly.

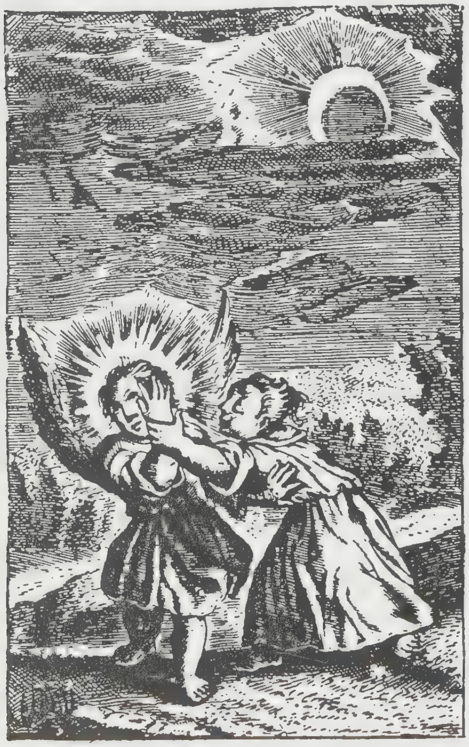
Emblem VII
(from Book III)

JOB 13:24
Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy?



Wherefore hidest thou thy face, & holdest mee for thine Enemy. Iob: 13.24
W.S. sc:

Why dost thou shade thy lovely face? O why
Doth that eclipsing hand so long deny
The Sun-shine of my soul-enliv'ning eye?
Without that Light what light remains in me?
Thou art my Life, my Way, my Light; in thee
I live, I move, and by thy beams I see.[1]

Thou art my Life; If thou but turn away,
My life 's a thousand deaths: thou art my Way:
Without thee, Lord, I travel not but stray.

My Light thou art; without thy glorious sight,
Mine eyes are darkened with perpetual night.
My God, thou art my Way, my Life, my Light.

Thou art my Way; I wander, if thou fly:
Thou art my Light; if hid, how blind am I!
Thou art my Life; if thou withdraw, I die.

Mine eyes are blind and dark, I cannot see;
To whom, or whether should my darkness flee,
But to the Light? And who 's that Light but thee?

My path is lost; my wand'ring steps do stray;
I cannot safely go, nor safely stay;
Whom should I seek but thee, my Path, my Way?

O, I am dead: to whom shall I, poor I,
Repair? to whom shall my sad ashes fly
But Life? And where is Life but in thine eye?

And yet thou turn'st away thy face, and fly'st me;
And yet I sue for grace, and thou deny'st me;
Speak, art thou angry, Lord, or onely try'st me?

Unscreen those heav'nly lamps, or tell me why
Thou shad'st thy face; perhaps thou think'st, no eye
Can view those flames, and not drop down and die.

[1] Thou art my Life, my Way, my Light "Jesus saith unto him, I am the way and the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me" (John 14:6). For Light, see John 1:1–14.

If that be all, shine forth, and draw thee nigher;
Let me behold and die; for my desire
Is Phœnix-like to perish in that fire.

Death-conquer'd Laz'rus was redeem'd by thee;[1]
If I am dead, Lord, set death's pris'ner free;
Am I more spent, or stink I worse then he?[2]

If my puffed light be out, give leave to tine [3]
My flameless snuff at that bright Lamp of thine;
O what's thy Light the less for lighting mine?

If I have lost my Path, great Shepherd, say,
Shall I still wander in a doubtful way?
Lord, shall a Lamb of Isr'el's sheepfold stray?

Thou art the Pilgrim's Path; the blind man's Eye;
The dead man's Life; on thee my hopes rely;
If thou remove, I err; I grope; I die.

Disclose thy sun-beams; close thy wings, and stay;
See, see how I am blind, and dead, and stray,
O thou, that art my Light, my Life my Way.

S. AUGUST. SOLILOQU. CAP. I.

Why dost thou hide thy face? Happily thou wilt say, none can see thy face and live: Ah Lord, let me die, that I may see thee; let me see thee, that I may die: I would not live, but die. That I may see Christ, I desire death; That I may live with Christ, I despise life.

ANSELM. MED. CAP. 5.

O excellent hiding, which is become my perfection! My God, Thou hidest thy treasure, to kindle my desire; Thou hidest thy pearl, to inflame the seeker; Thou delayest to give, that Thou may'st teach me to importune; seem'st not to hear, to make me persevere.

EPIG. 7.

If Heav'n's all-quickning eyes vouchsafe to shine
Upon our souls, we slight; If not, we whine:
Our Equinoctiall hearts can never lie
Secure beneath the Tropicks of that eye.

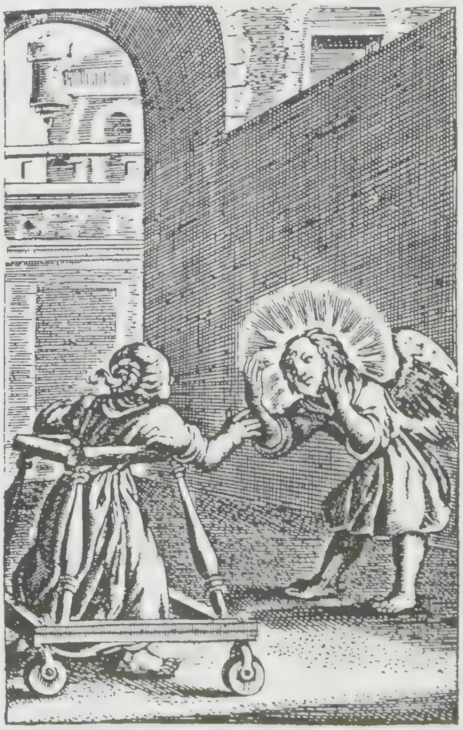
Epigram III
(from Book IV)

PSALM 17:5

Stay my steps in thy paths, that my feet do not slide.



Stay my ſtepps in thy Pathes that my feet do not ſlide. Ps. 17. 5.
W.M. ſc:

---

[1] Death-conquer'd Laz'rus For the story of the raising of Lazarus from the dead, see John 11.

[2] or stink I worse than he? "Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead four days" (John 11:39).

[3] to tine to ignite, to kindle (OED tind v). The verb also occurs in Henry Vaughan's "Cock-Crowing."

When ere the old Exchange of profit rings
Her silver Saint's-bell of uncertain gains,[1]
My merchant soul can stretch both legs and wings;
How I can run, and take unwearied pains!
The charms of profit are so strong, that I
Who wanted legs to go find wings to fly.

If time-beguiling Pleasure but advance
Her lustful trump, and blow her bold alarms,
O how my sportful soul can frisk and dance,
And hug that Siren in her twined arms!
The sprightly voice of sinew-strength'ning pleasure
Can lend my bedrid soul both legs and leisure.

If blazing Honour chance to fill my veins
With flatt'ring warmth, and flash of Courtly fire,
My soul can take a pleasure in her pains;
My lofty strutting steps disdain to tire;
My antic knees can turn upon the hinges
Of Compliment, and screw a thousand cringes.[2]

But when I come to Thee, my God, that art
The royal mine of everlasting treasure,
The real Honour of my better part,
And living Fountain of eternal pleasure,
How nerveless are my limbs! how faint and slow!
I have nor wings to fly, nor legs to go.

So when the streams of swift-foot Rhene convey
Her upland riches to the Belgick shore;
The idle vessel slides the wat'ry lay,
Without the blast, or tug, of wind, or oar;
Her slipp'ry keel divides the silver foam
With ease; so facile is the way from home.

But when the home-bound vessel turns her sails
Against the breast of the resisting stream,
O then she slugs; nor sail, nor oar prevails;
The stream is sturdy, and her tides extreme:
Each stroke is loss, and ev'ry tug is vain:
A boat-length's purchase is a league of pain.

Great All in All, that art my rest, my home;
My way is tedious, and my steps are slow:
Reach forth thy helpful hand, or bid me come:
I am thy child, O teach thy child to go:
Conjoin thy sweet commands to my desire
And I will venture, though I fall or tire.

S. AUGUST. SER. 15. DE VERB. APOST.

Be always displeased at what thou art, if thou desirest to attain to what thou art not: For where thou hast pleased thy self, there thou abidest: But if thou sayest, I have enough, thou perishest: Always add, always walk, always proceed; neither stand still, nor go back, nor deviate: He that standeth still, proceedeth not; He goest back, that continueth not; He deviateth, that revolteth; He goeth better that creepeth in his way, then he that runneth out of his way.[3]

EPIG. 3.

Fear not, my soul, to lose for want of cunning;
Weep not; Heav'n is not always got by running:

---

[1] Exchange of profit The Stock Exchange as we know it today did not then exist, but there are several relevant entries under OED exchange sb.

[2] antic grotesque, absurd (OED antic a).

[3] He deviateth, that revolteth He turns away, who goes back (to the place he came from); see OED revolt v I 4.

Thy thoughts are swift, although thy legs be slow;
True love will creep, not having strength to go.

Eclogue VIII [1]

Anarchus Canonicus

Anarchus

Graze on, my sheep; and let your souls defy
The food of common shepherds; Come not nigh
The Babylonish pastures of this nation;[2]
They are all heathenish, all abomination:
Their pastors are profane, and they have trod
The steps of Belial, not the ways of God.[3]
You are a chosen, a peculiar crew,
That blessed handful, that selected few
That shall have entrance; set apart and gifted
For holy exercises, cleans'd and sifted,
Like flour from bran, and separated from the coats
Of the unsanctified, like sheep from goats.
But who comes here? My lambs, why graze ye thus?
Why stand ye frighted? 'Tis Canonicus.

Canonicus

God-morrow, swain; God keep thee from the sorrow
Of a sad day; What speechless? Swain, [4] God-morrow!
What, shepherd, not a word to entertain
The wishes of a friend? God-morrow, swain!
Not yet? What mean these silent common-places
Of strange aspects? what mean these antic faces?
I fear, his costive words, too great for vent.[5]
Stick in his throat; how like a Jack-a-lent
He stands, for boys to spend their shrovetide throws.
Or like a puppet, made to frighten crows![6]

Anarchus

Thou art a limb of Satan; and thy throat
A sink of poison; thy canonical coat
Is nothing but a liv'ry of the Beast;[7]
Thy language is profane, and I detest
Thy sinful greetings, and that heath'nish fashion
Of this your Antichristian salutation;
In brief, God keep me from the greater sorrow
Of thee; and from the curse of thy God-morrow

[1] An eclogue may be any short poem, but the word was mostly used, as here, of a pastoral dialogue, as in Virgil's Bucolics. The participants in this dialogue represent Lawlessness and Order ("canonical" means that which is in conformity with ecclesiastical edict or canon law).

[2] Babylonish pastures with the implication that the order which Canonicus represents is really a captivity, as the people of Israel were taken in captivity to Babylon. Every English reader would have known this piece of biblical history and the famous Psalm 137, which begins "By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept: when we remembered thee, O Sion."

[3] Belial In various Old Testament passages, "sons of Belial" refers to dissolute and worthless people.

[4] God-morrow a contraction of the phrase, God give you good morrow; equivalent to our greeting "Good morning." See OED good morrow; Swain here, equivalent to "shepherd"; see OED swain sb 4.

[5] costive constipated (OED costive a).

[6] Jack-a-lent a figure of a man, set up to be pelted; an ancient form of the sport of "Aunt Sally," practised during Lent; figuratively, a butt for every one to throw at (OED Jack-a-Lent); shrovetide the period comprising Quinquagesima Sunday and the two following days. The first element of the word relates to the custom of confession and being "shriven" at the beginning of Lent. Not only were Jack-a-lents pelted; cockerels were tied up and pelted at this season; see OED shrovetide. Cruelty to animals has been practised in many countries in connection with various points of the Christian year.

[7] the Beast in reference to the Revelation to John, the last book of the New Testament. The two beasts of that book are said to refer to the Roman empire and to the cult established to further its aims, that of emperor worship and its priestcraft. Anarchus would be thinking of contemporary equivalents: the Roman Catholic church, Charles I and Archbishop Laud, who were thought to be crypto-Catholics.

Canonicus

How now, Anarchus? Has thy hungry zeal
Devoured all thy manners at a meal?
No scraps remain? Or has th' unfruitful year
Made charity so scarce, and love so dear,
That none's allowed, upon the slight occasions
Of interview, or civil salutation?
Is thy store hoarded up? or is it spent?
Will thou vent none? or hath thou none to vent?
The curse of my God-morrow? 'Tis most true.
God's blessing proves a curse to such as you.

Anarchus

To such as we? Go, save your breath, to blow
Your vain cathedral bagpipes; and bestow [1]
Your trivial pray'rs on those that cannot pray
Without their spectacles; that cannot say
Their unregarded prayers, unless they hold
The Let'ny, or the charms of Sorrocold [2]
Before their purblind eyes; that disinherit
Their souls of freedom, and renounce the Spirit;
Perchance, your idle prayers may find an ear
With them; Go spend your vain God-morrows there.

Canonicus

Art thou thy self, Anarchus? Is thy heart
Acquainted with that tongue, that does impart
This brain-sick language? Could thy passion lend
No slighter subject, for thy breath to spend
Her aspine venom at, but that, alone,[3]
That shuts and opens the Eternal Throne
Of the Eternal God? Is prayer become
So poor a guest, to be denied a room
In thy opinion? To be scorn'd, contemn'd,
Like school-boys' themes, whose errors have condemn'd
The guilty truant to the master's rod?
Can that displease thee, that delights thy God?

Anarchus

Thou child of wrath, and firebrand of Hell,
Flows wholesome water from a tainted well?
Or can those prayers be pleasing, that proceed
Form unregen'rate breasts? Can a foul weed
Delight the smell? or ugly shapes, the view?
I say, your prayers are all profane, like you;
They'r like that heatn'nish ruff of thine, that perks[4]
Upon thy stiff-necked collar, pranked with ferks
Of studied wit, starched with strong lines, and put
In a set form, of th' antichristian cut.[5]

Canonicus

Consult with reason, Shepherd, and advise;
Call home thy senses; and cast back thine eyes
On former days; No doubt, but there were they
That liv'd as sanctimonious, that could pray.
Lift up as holy hands, and did inherit
As great a share, and freedom of the Spirit,

[1] cathedral bagpipes Church organs were dismantled and destroyed during the Interregnum. It is clear from Milton's verse (e.g. lines 155–166 of Il Penseroso) that not all "puritans" would have approved of these acts of vandalism. For a splendid account of the organ as musical instrument see Diane Kelsey McColley, Poetry and Music in Seventeenth century England (Cambridge: Cambridge U P, 1997), 234–237.

[2] Let'ny. the Litany or General Supplication, in the Book of Common Prayer, used on certain special occasions after Morning Prayer. Puritans were opposed to set forms of prayer; Sorrocold that is, Thomas Sorocold, 1561–1617. The work of his referred to is Supplication of saints. A booke of prayers: diuided into three parts. 1. Daniels deuotion. 2. Paul, and his company. 3. David alone. prayers for seuerall dayes. seueral occasions. seuerall parties. Wherein are three most excellent prayers made by the late famous Queene Elizabeth, London, 1612. I am indebted to Professor Henry Limouze for this note.

[3] aspine venom The asp is a small venomous serpent, found only in Egypt and Libya; Cleopatra committed suicide by applying an asp to her breast (Antony and Cleopatra V ii 307); the word was also used of a European viper. Quarles's use of the adjective is the only one recorded in OED.

[4] ruff an article of neck-wear, usually consisting of starched linen or muslin arranged in horizontal flutings and standing out all around the neck, worn especially in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I (OED ruff sb^2 2).

[5] starched with strong lines The phrase "strong lines" is usually associated with poetry such as Donne's; here it seems to be applied to the work of Anglican preachers such as Donne and Andrewes.

As you; and these could count it no disgrace
To their profession, in a public place,
To use set forms; did not their wisdoms do
What you contemn, nay more, prescribe it too,
(Yet neither quench'd, nor wrong'd the sacred motion
Of the prompt Spirit), as helps to dull devotion?
Nay, more; has not th' unanimous consent
Of all reformed Churches (to prevent
Confused babbling, and to disenorm[1]
Prepost'rous service) bred us to a form
Of Common Prayer; prayers so divinely penn'd,
That human eloquence does even contend
With heavenly majesty, whilst both conspire
To kindle zeal, and so inflame desire?

Anarchus

The Book of Common Prayer? what tell'st thou me
Of that? My soul defies both that and thee:
Thou art Baal's Priest; and that vain book's no more
Then a mere relic of the Roman whore:[2]
Methinks a Christian tongue should be asham'd
To name such trash; I spit to hear it nam'd:
Tell me of Common Prayers? The midnight yelp
Of Bal my bandog is as great a help[3]
To raise devotion in a Christian's breast,
As that; the very language of the Beast;
That old worn Mass-book of the new Edition;
That Romish rabble, full of Superstition;
That paper Idol; that enchanting Spell;
That printed Image, sent from Rome, from Hell;
That broad-fac'd owl, upon a carved perch;
That Bel and Dragon of the English Church.[4]

Canonicus

Be not too lavish, Shepherd; half this stuff
Will make a coat, to prove thee fool enough:
Hold, hold: thy brain-sick language does bewray
The self-same spirit, whether rail or pray:
For fools that rave, and rage, not knowing, why,
A scourge is far more fit, then a reply:
But say, Anarchus, (If it be not treason
Against discretion, to demand a reason
From frantic tongues), resolve me, Shepherd, why
This book is grown so odious in thine eye?

Anarchus

Because it is an idol, whereunto
You bend you idle knees, as papists do
To their lewd Images.

Canonicus

Ay, but we pray
Not to, but by it;

Anarchus

Just so, Papists say:
Say, in what place th' Apostles ever did
Command Set Form?

Canonicus

Where was Set Form forbid?
What text commanded you to exercise
Your function over tables? Or baptise
In basins? What Apostle taught your tongue
To gibe at bishops? Or to vex and wrong
Your Mother Church? Who taught yee to oppose

[1] disenorm to free from irregularity; to make conformable to a norm or standard. This place is the only one cited in OED.

[2] the Roman whore the Roman Catholic church, associated by Protestants with the Whore of Babylon in Revelation 17.

[3] bandog a dog tied up either to guard a house or because of its ferocity; the word was proverbially associated with irrationality of speech (OED bandog).

[4] Bel and Dragon symbols of heathenism. The stories of Bel and the dragon are additions to the Book of Daniel, in the Apocrypha; the point of the tales was to ridicule idolatry and to discredit heathen priestcraft.

Your rulers? Or to whimper in the nose?[1]
But since you call for recedents, (although
'Tis more then our safe practice need to show)
Read, to what blessing that blest saint commends
The holy Church, saluted at the ends
Of all his sweet Epistles; Or if these
Suffice not, may your greater wisdoms please
To step into the Law, and read th' express
Commanded form, wherein the priest must bless
The parting people; Can thy brazen brow[2]
Deny all this? What refuge have yee now?
Y' are gone by Law and Gospel; They both us'd
Set Form; What Scripture now must be abus'd?

ANARCHUS
Well, if the Lord be pleased to allow
Set form to Prophets, are they set to you?
Or have ye so much boldness to compare
A Prelate's prattling, to a Prophet's pray'r?

CANONICUS
O, that some equal hearer now were by
To laugh his treble share, as well as I:
Examples are demanded; which, being given,
We must not follow: Giddybrains! bereaven
Of common sense! Where heaven does make no mention,
You style it with the term of man's invention:
Where heaven commandeth, and is pleas'd to hallow
With blest examples, there we must not follow.

ANARCHUS
So heaven (by blest examples) did enjoin,
Your bended knees to worship Bread, and Wine?

CANONICUS
When your cross-gartered knees fall down before
Your parlour-table, what do you adore?

ANARCHUS
So heaven commands, by conjuring words to bring
Vow'd hands together, with a hallow'd ring

CANONICUS
'Tis true; your fiery zeals cannot abide
Long circumstance; your doctrine's, Up and Ride.

ANARCHUS
So heaven commmanded, that religious praise
Be given to Saints, and worship to their days?

CANONICUS
Whom you contemn, because they did not preach
Those doctrines, that your western parlours teach.

ANARCHUS
So heaven commanded Bishops, and the rest
Of that lewd rank, rank members of the Beast?

CANONICUS
Ay, heaven commanded such, and gave them power
To scourge, and check such ill-pac'd beasts as you are:

ANARCHUS
So heaven commanded, that the high Commission
Should plague poor Christians, like the Inquisition?[3]

---

[1] to whimper in the nose one of many contemporary references to the vocal affectations of Puritan preachers.

[2] th'express / Commanded form Quarles's marginal note refers to Numbers 6:23, in which God prescribes a form of prayer for the Israelites.

[3] high Commission The Court of High Commission, abolished in 1641, was founded under Elizabeth to give the crown power to commission persons to try offences against the ecclesiastical establishment, and to crush any resistance to the crown in these matters (OED commission sb[1] 7).

Canonicus

Your plagues are what your own behaviours urge;
None, but the guilty, rail against the scourge.

Anarchus

So heaven commands your prayers, that buried dust
Of whores and thieves should triumph with the just?[1]

Canonicus

Man may not censure by external view;
Forbear; we, sometimes, pray for some of you.

Anarchus

So heaven commands your paintings, pipes, and copes,
Us'd in your Churches, and ordain'd by Popes?

Canonicus

Where Popish hands hath rais'd in every town
A parish church, shall we pull churches down?
But come, Anarchus let us leave to play
At childish Pushpin; Come, let not the day
Be lost in trifles, to a fruitless end;
Let 's fall to hotter service, and contend
By more substantial argument, whose weight
May vindicate the truth from light conceit;
Let 's try a Syllogism; (Art infuses Spirit into the children of the Muses)
Whereby, stout error shall be forc'd to yield,
And Truth shall sit sole Mistress of the Field.

Anarchus

Art me no arts; That which the Sp'rit infuses
Shall edge my tongue: What tell'st thou me of Muses.
Those pagan gods; the authors of your schisms?
P'sh! tell me not of arts, and silisismes:
I care not for your quirks, and new devices
Of studied wit: We use to play our prizes.
With common weapons; and, with downright knocks,
We beat down sin, and error, like an Ox
And cut the throat of heath'nish pop'ry too,
Like calves, prepar'd for slaughter; so we do
We rash in sunder heresy, like an ell
Of sarc'net, then convey it down to hell:[2]
We take just measure of a Christian's heart,
By th' yard of judgement; then, by dextrous art.
We cut out doctrines, and from notch to notch
We fit our holy stuff, (we do not botch
Like you; but make it jump, that it be neither
Too wide nor straight) then stitch it up together,
And make a Robe of Sanctity, to fit
The child of Grace; we meddle not with wit;
These be the means that overthrow our schisms,
And build Religion, without sigilismes.

Canonicus

A rare device! But tell me, wert thou made
A butcher, or a tailor by thy trade?
I look'd for scholarship; but it appears,
Hoods make no monks, nor beards, philosophers.

Anarchus

Surely, I was, at first, by occupation,[3]
A merchant tailor, till that lewder fashion
Of Spanish cassocks grew into request;
When having left that calling, I professed
To chandler, where I was enforc'd to vent
That hellish smoke, whose most unsavory scent

[1] buried dust / Of whores and thieves Arminian doctrine, favoured by Charles I and Archbishop Laud, meant that in principle everybody was potentially saved from damnation; Calvinist doctrine was that only "the elect" were to be saved, and all others doomed to hell.

[2] an ell / Of sarc'net The English ell was 45 inches; sarsanet or sarcenet was a fine and soft silk material (OED sarsanet).

[3] by occupation The puritan belief that learning was not necessary to a preacher was frequently mocked, as were the "mechanic" trades practised by some Puritan preachers.

Perfum'd my garments so, that I began
To be conceiv'd an unregenerate man:
Which called me from that course of life, to trade
In tape and inkle; ere I year'd and day'd
This new employment, O a strange mischance
O'er threw my dealings, which did disadvance
My mean estate; and whereupon, I fled
To Amsterdam; where being trencher-fed
By holy Brethren, liv'd in great respect,
Sr Rev'rence, footing stockings for th' Elect
Surely the savour of the Brethren's feet,
Perfum'd with comings in, is very sweet:
There, twice six months I had not led my life
But I became an husband to an wife,
The widow of an Elder; in whose stead,
I was, (though I could neither write, nor read)
Accounted worthy (though I say 't) and able
To preach the gospel at our holy table.

Canonicus

But say, what strange mischance was that, did move thee
To flee thy native soil? What mischief drove thee?
What dire disaster urg'd thy skilful hand
To find employment in a foreign Land?

Anarchus

Surely, I was, when that mischance befell,
But poor in purse, and was constrain'd to sell
Cadice and inkle; now because my trade[1]
Requir'd an help, I entertain'd a Maid;
An able Christian; (though I say't) begot
Of holy Parents; (though the nuptial knot
Of ceremonious marriage never tied
Their joined hands) She was a sanctified
And undefiled vessel; she would pray,
When others slept; and work when others play:
She was of exc'lent knowledge; and, indeed,
She could expound, and preach too, for a need:
She was my servant, and set up my trade
With her own hands; her skilful fingers made
The tape and inkle, where withal she stor'd
My thriving shop; whereby, I did afford
My Brethren better pennyworths; nay, more,
She had a gift, (was all the City o'er
Well known) in making puddings, whose mere view
Would make a proselyte, and convert a Jew;
Whose new religion would proclaim our hogs
As clean and holy as their Synagogues;
These would she bear from house to house, and sell
To holy Brethren, who would please her well;
For under that pretence, she oft repeated
Some close-preached sermon; oftentimes entreated
Of holy Discipline; sometimes gave warning
Of some rare Lecture held next Thursday morning
I know not how, (frail flesh and blood ye know
Can do no more than flesh and blood can do)
But to be short, she would so often fig
From place to place, that she was grown too big
To be conceal'd from wicked neighb'ring eyes;
T' avoid the scandal, I thought good t'arise,
And flee to Amsterdam, till I could gather,
By information, the reputed Father.

Canonicus

A wholesome hist'ry! able to transform
Abus'd Religion's sunshine to a storm
Of direful thunderbolts, to overthrow
All Christian rulers, that dare longer owe
Confusion to the varlets, and not grind them
To dust, and send them to the place design'd them
Had'st thou that impudence, that brazen face,
In the fag end of thy unsav'ry, base,
Triobular trades (foul beast;) nay, piping hot[2]
From thy close strumpet, thus to soil, and blot
The beauty of Religion, and to wrong
The Gospel's name with thy illiterate tongue?

---

[1] Cadice cotton wool (OED caddis, caddice); inkle a kind of linen tape (OED inkle sb).

[2] triobular worth three obols, that is, base, petty, contemptible; compare twopenny-halfpenny (OED triobolar).

ANARCHUS

Were not th' Apostles fishers, and not fly
Their trades, and preach'd the word as well as I?

CANONICUS

Avoid, presumptuous varlet; urge no more
My tired patience; Go, seek out thy whore,
Thy fit compere, and exercise thy trade
Upon her ruin'd stockings, much decayed
With long pursuit, and trudging all about
To find the father of her bastard out;
Whils't I remove my zenith, and go hence,[1]
To wail this fruitless hour's misexpence,
And pray to heaven, that heaven would please to keep
Such goats still separated from my sheep.
—1638/1643

---

[1] remove my zenith that is, move to a different place.

Henry King

1592 – 1669

Henry King was born into a family of churchmen who had been eminent for more than a century. His father had been a chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, was Bishop of London under James, and a friend of John Donne. Henry was educated at Westminster School, where he was an exact contemporary of George Herbert. Part of his education would have consisted of turning Greek and Latin verse into English verse; beyond this, Westminster was unlike other schools in having pupils write English verse as an exercise. The school was a great nursery for poets: Jonson, Herbert, Cowley, Dryden, Randolph, Strode, Corbet all studied there, and the list is not exhaustive.

Henry King married Anne Berkeley, of an ancient and famous family, higher in social rank than King's; at her death more than one writer commented on her modesty in the choice of a husband. King's feelings for her may be guessed at from the "Exequy," one of the greatest elegies in our language, and from another poem, "St. Valentine's Day," probably written more than twenty years after her death.

Though King, like his father, was much esteemed as a preacher, his rewards within the Church were to be short-lived; he was consecrated as Bishop of Chichester on February 6, 1642, the day after the bishops had been deprived of their seats in the House of Lords. An Act abolishing episcopacy was passed in the following year. In December of 1642 Chichester was taken by the Parliamentary forces under Sir William Waller, and King lost his ecclesiastical revenues. During the Interregnum, when it was feared that the Anglican church might die out, King was included in a plan, in the event not acted upon, to go to Charles II's court-in-exile and consecrate as bishops some of the divines who were with Charles. At the Restoration, King was restored to his bishopric and lived quietly in Chichester until his death three years later. His not being given further preferment has been explained by reference to Hyde's anger at his failure, as bishops died off, to consecrate successors in order to re-vivify the church, one of whose defining characteristics was episcopacy. For King to have done so would of course have been contrary to law. The story of how close the Church of England came to dying out, and of how it was kept alive, to flourish after the Restoration, is well told by R.S. Bosher in The Making of the Restoration Settlement.

An Exequy to his Matchless never to be forgotten Friend [1]

Accept, thou shrine of my dead saint!
Instead of Dirges this Complaint; [2]
And, for sweet flowers to crown thy hearse,
Receive a strew of weeping verse
From thy griev'd friend; whom thou might'st see
Quite melted into tears for thee.
    Dear Loss! since thy untimely fate
My task hath been to meditate
On thee, on thee: thou art the book,
The library whereon I look
Though almost blind. For thee (lov'd clay!)
I languish out, not live the day,

---

[1] Exequy OED glosses the word as "funeral rites" and remarks that "an alleged sense 'a funeral ode' has been wrongly inferred from the title of this poem." Friend The word was commonly applied to a spouse at the time. Anne King died in January 1624.

[2] Dirges The word could refer to songs sung at a funeral, but in view of the opposition set up in the line, King may have had in mind the more formal sense: Dirge was originally Dirige (Direct), taken from Psalm 5:8 which was the first word of the Antiphon at Matins in the Office of the Dead; Complaint in the early sense of "utterance of grief" (OED Complaint 1,2).

Using no other exercise
But what I practise with mine eyes.
By which wet glasses I find out
How lazily Time creeps about
To one that mourns: this, only this
My exercise and bus'ness is:
So I compute the weary hours
With sighs dissolved into showers.
Nor wonder if my time go thus
Backward and most preposterous; [1]
Thou hast benighted me. Thy set
This eve of blackness did beget,
Who wast my day, (though overcast
Before thou hadst thy noon-tide past)
And I remember must in tears,
Thou scarce hadst seen so many years
As day tells hours. By thy clear Sun
My love and fortune first did run;
But thou wilt never more appear
Folded within my hemisphere:
Since both thy light and motion
Like a fled star is fall'n and gone;
And 'twixt me and my soul's dear wish
The Earth now interposed is,
Which such a strange eclipse doth make
As ne're was read in almanac.
I could allow thee for a time
To darken me and my sad clime,
Were it a month, a year, or ten,
I would thy exile live till then;
And all that space my mirth adjourn,
So thou wouldst promise to return,
And putting off thy ashy shroud
At length disperse this sorrow's cloud.
But woe is me! the longest date
Too narrow is to calculate
These empty hopes. Never shall I
Be so much blest, as to descry
A glimpse of thee, till that day come
Which shall the Earth to cinders doom,
And a fierce fever must calcine
The body of this world, like thine,
(My little world!) That fit of fire
Once off, our bodies shall aspire
To our souls' bliss: then we shall rise,
And view our selves with clearer eyes
In that calm region, where no night
Can hide us from each other's sight.
Mean time, thou hast her Earth: much good
May my harm do thee. Since it stood
With Heaven's will I might not call
Her longer mine; I give thee all
My short liv'd right and interest
In her, whom living I lov'd best:
With a most free and bounteous grief,
I give thee what I could not keep.
Be kind to her: and prithee look
Thou write into thy Doomsday book
Each parcel of this rarity,
Which in thy casket shrin'd doth lie:
See that thou make thy reck'ning straight,
And yield her back again by weight;
For thou must audit on thy trust
Each grain and atom of this dust:
As thou wilt answer Him, that lent,
Not gave thee, my dear monument. [2]
So close the ground, and 'bout her shade
Black curtains draw, my bride is lay'd.
Sleep on (my love!) in thy cold bed
Never to be disquieted.
My last good-night! Thou wilt not wake
Till I thy fate shall overtake:
Till age, or grief, or sickness must
Marry my body to that dust
It so much loves; and fill the room
My heart keeps empty in thy tomb.
Stay for me there: I will not fail

---

[1] preposterous from the Latin praeposterus, reversed (prae before, posterus after).

[2] monument apparently used in a sense (tenderly ironical) unknown to OED. He needs no memorial or reminder; as he cannot forget her, she herself is a monument.

To meet thee in that hollow vale.
And think not much of my delay;
I am already on the way,
And follow thee with all the speed
Desire can make, or sorrows breed.
Each minute is a short degree
And e'ry hour a step towards thee.
At night when I betake to rest,
Next morn I rise nearer my west
Of life, almost by eight hours' sail,
Than when Sleep breath'd his drowsy gale.
    Thus from the sun my bottom steers, [1]
And my day's compass downward bears.
Nor labour I to stem the tide, [2]
Through which to thee I swiftly glide.
    'Tis true; with shame and grief I yield
Thou, like the Van, first took'st the field, [3]
And gotten hast the victory
In thus adventuring to die
Before me; whose more years might crave
A just precedence in the grave.
But hark! My pulse, like a soft drum
Beats my approach, tells thee I come;
And, slow howe'r my marches be,
I shall at last sit down by thee.
    The thought of this bids me go on,
And wait my dissolution
With hope and comfort. Dear! (forgive
The crime) I am content to live
Divided, with but half a heart,
Till we shall meet and never part.

Upon the Death of my ever Desired Friend Dr Donne Dean of Paul's [4]

To have lived eminent, in a degree
Beyond our loftiest flights, that is, like thee;
Or t'have had too much merit, is not safe;
For such excesses find no epitaph.
At common graves we have poetic eyes
Can melt themselves in easy elegies;
Each quill can drop his tributary verse,
And pin it, with the hatchments, to the hearse: [5]
But at thine, poem, or inscription
(Rich soul of wit and language!) we have none.
Indeed a silence does that tomb befit,
Where is no herald left to blazon it.
Widowed Invention justly doth forbear
To come abroad, knowing thou art not here,
Late her great patron, whose prerogative
Maintained and clothed her SO, as none alive
Must now presume to keep her at thy rate,
Though he the Indies for her dower estate.
Or else that awful fire, which once did burn
In thy clear brain, now fall'n into thy urn
Lives there to fright rude Empirics from thence, [6]
Which might profane thee by their ignorance.
Who ever writes of thee, and in a style
Unworthy such a theme, does but revile
Thy precious dust, and wake a learned spirit
Which may revenge his rapes upon thy merit.
For all a low-pitched fant'sy can devise
Will prove, at best, but hallowed injuries.
Thou, like the dying swan, didst lately sing

[2] stem the tide The verb can mean to check the tide, or to labour against it (OED stem v^2 2 and v^4).

Thy mournfull dirge in audience of the King;[1]
When pale looks, and faint accents of thy breath
Presented so to life, that piece of death,
That it was feared and prophesied by all,
Thou thither camst to preach thy funeral.
O! hadst thou in an elegiac knell
Rung out unto the world thine own farewell,
And in thy high victorious numbers beat
The solemn measure of thy grieved retreat;
Thou mightst the poet's service now have missed
As well, as then thou didst prevent the priest,
And never to the world beholden bee
So much as for an epitaph for thee.
I doe not like the office. Nor is't fit
Thou, who didst lend our age such sums of wit,
Shouldst now re-borrow from her bankrupt mine
That ore to bury thee, which once was thine.
Rather still leave us in thy debt; and know
(Exalted soul!) more glory tis to owe
Unto thy hearse, what we can never pay,
Then with embased coin those rites defray.
Commit we then thee to thyself: Nor blame
Our drooping loves, which thus to thy own fame
Leave thee executor. Since, but thy own,
No pen could do thee justice, nor bays crown
Thy vast desert; save that, wee nothing can
Depute to be thy ashes' guardian.
So jewellers no art, or metal trust
To form the diamond, but the diamond's dust.

Sic Vita[2]

Like to the falling of a star;
Or as the flights of eagles are;
Or like the fresh spring's gaudy hue;
Or silver drops of morning dew;
Or like a wind that chafes the flood;
Or bubbles which on water stood;
Even such is Man, whose borrowed light
Is straight called in, and paid to Night.

The wind blows out, the bubble dies;
The spring entombed in autumn lies:
The dew dries up; the star is shot:
The flight is past: And Man forgot.

William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle

1592 – 1676

Born at Welbeck Abbey, the family estate, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, Cavendish inherited a great fortune. He was created Earl of Newcastle in 1628, and in the early 1630s spent about £20,000 (a huge sum at that time) on two elaborate entertainments for Charles I. These included masques commissioned from Ben Jonson. In 1638 he was made a member of the Privy Council and was appointed governor of the Prince of Wales, the future Charles II. In the early years of the civil war he gave a great deal of money to the royal cause, and raised and commanded a troop of gentlemen for the King. With the defeat of the Royalist armies he moved to the continent, living in Paris (1645–48), where he appointed Thomas Hobbes as tutor to Prince Charles, and Antwerp (1648–60). It was also while in Paris that he met and married his second wife, Margaret Lucas, whose works would include a Life (1667) of her husband (for more on the Duchess of Newcastle, see the introduction to the selections from her works). After the Restoration Cavendish regained most of his estates and received a dukedom, though the Duchess of Newcastle in her Life calculated that the wars had cost him over £900,000 in unpaid rents and other losses. He was patron to James Shirley, Dryden, and Thomas Shadwell, and was himself the author of several poems and plays, though his best known publications were two books on horsemanship (famous among book collectors for their engraved illustrations).

Newcastle's lengthy letter of advice to Charles II (one extant manuscript is eighty-eight pages long) was a private document, and was not printed until this century. Presented to Charles in the spring of 1659, it was the last in a series of letters of instruction he had written since the late 1630s, when he had been appointed governor to the Prince. There is no evidence that the King read the letter, but it has been suggested that the pleasure-loving Cavendish, an accomplished horseman, fencer, and dancer, was an important influence on Charles (for the King's personality, see the character written by the Marquis of Halifax). As political advice, the letter has been described as both Machiavellian and Hobbesian. Cavendish's invocation of Elizabethan exempla also reflects a pervasive post-civil war nostalgia for the confidence, security, and apparent tranquility of Elizabethan England.

Advice to Charles II

May it please your most sacred Majesty,

I am bold humbly to present this book to your Majesty which is written particularly for your Majesty when you are enthroned. Why I present it now is because I think your Majesty will have more time and leisure to read it now than when you are enthroned. Besides, it is intended wholly for your Majesty's service and if it prove that which I am confident it will, I shall have reached my full intention, which service I would not have frustrated by my death. There is no oratory in it, or anything stolen out of books, for I seldom or ever read any. These discourses are out of my long experience, to present your Majesty with truths which great monarchs seldom hear. These truths are not only the most honest, but also the wisest, that a dutiful servant can offer to so gracious a master, and so wise a king as to be able to judge between truth and falsehood, though that falsehood be ever so subtly disguised. I ask pardon for the method, having no notes by me at all. If your Majesty like it, I have achieved my purpose with unspeakable joy and contentment; if you like it not, Sire, I humbly beg that favor of your Majesty to throw it into the fire so it may become a flaming sacrifice of my duty to your Majesty. May the great God ever preserve your Majesty.

* * * * *

FOR TRADE

Your Majesty will be pleased to consider that trade is a different business from the Church or the Law; these last two rob the hive of the commonwealth of its honey, and bring none to the hive. No, Sire, it is the merchant alone that brings honey to the hive. It is he alone who enriches kingdoms through trade, especially your Majesty's kingdom of England that is ordained for it. It is not a bad winter that the country man complains about that makes scarcity of money, but the decay of trade. A certain rule that never fails is that when everything is cheap, there is a scarcity of money; when everything is dear, then the kingdom is full of money. For example, imagine all the commonwealth in four or five persons, and they having five pounds apiece; a sixth person is to sell them a horse and that sixth person needs to sell it. Then he must sell it for no more than five pounds, for nobody has more to give, and he can get no more than there is. But put the case that these five persons had one hundred pounds apiece, then this sixth man that is to sell his horse may get one hundred pounds for him because those five persons have one hundred pounds apiece to give for it. Thus, your Majesty sees that plenty of money makes everything dear, and scarcity of money must of necessity make everything cheap. Therefore, your Majesty will be pleased to keep up the merchants; they alone can fill your kingdom with riches, and consequently enrich your Majesty, for if your kingdom is poor, where can your Majesty get wealth? Nowhere....

FOR CEREMONY AND ORDER

Although ceremony is nothing in itself, yet it does everything. For what is a king more than a subject, but for ceremony and order? When that fails him, he is ruined. What is the Church without ceremony and order? When that fails, the Church is ruined. What is the law without ceremony and order? When that fails, the law goes down. What are the universities, and all schools, without ceremony and order? Nothing. What are all corporations without ceremony and order? Nothing. What is a Lord more than a footman without ceremony and order? A despised title. What are parents and children, masters and servants, officers of all kinds in the commonwealth, without ceremony and order? Nothing at all. Aye, what is an army without ceremony and order? And there the strictest ceremony and order, for he that continues longest in order, which is in bodies [of men], wins the battle. What are all councils and states without ceremony and order? Nothing but confusion and ruin. So that ceremony and order, together with force, govern over all, in peace and in war, and keep every man and every thing within the circle of their own conditions. Aye, even bear-baiting, without ceremony and order, would be in more confusion than it is, and many other such things.

Therefore, your Majesty will be pleased to keep it up strictly, in your own person and at Court, to be a precedent to the rest of your nobles, and not make yourself too cheap by too much familiarity which, as the proverb says, breeds contempt. But when you appear, show yourself gloriously to your people, like a God, for the Holy Writ says: we have called you Gods.[1] When the people see you thus, they will get down on their knees, worship and pray for you with trembling fear and love as they did to Queen Elizabeth whose government is absolutely the best precedent for England's government. It is only that these horrid times must make a few amendments to set things straight and to keep them so. The Queen would say: "God bless you, my good people." Although this saying was no great matter in itself, yet, I assure your Majesty, it had a deep impact on the people. Aye, of a Sunday when she opened the window, the people would cry: "Oh Lord, I saw her hand, I saw her hand"; and some woman would cry out: "Oh Lord, the Queen is a woman!" There is certainly nothing that keeps up a king more than ceremony and order which creates distance, and this brings respect and duty, [hence] obedience, which is everything....

[1] See Psalm 82:6. James VI/I discusses this biblical passage in his 1610 Speech to Parliament.

So if your Majesty pleases, speak to your heralds, set down the ceremony and order for all degrees of your nobility, as for barons, viscounts, earls, marquises, and dukes, and to have it printed, and so for all the great officers, their ceremony and order, not any to intrench one upon the other, but to keep only what is right, and due, for their places and dignities. As one thing, none under the degree of a baroness can have carpets by her bed, and she but one or two at the most. And now every Turkey merchant's wife will have all her floor over with carpets, so now every citizen's wife will have six horses in her coach, which is most unfitting ... this your Majesty will rectify very easily. So to make no difference between great ladies and citizen's wives in apparel is abominable. No, they should go to their little black velvet caps, small gold chains, and little ruffs, as they were in my time, and their apprentices in their round black caps.[1]

But this must take a little time, for fear of offending too fast, until your Majesty is well settled in your saddle. When any of these orders are violated, [the offender] must be brought into the Marshall's Court and punished there.[2] That court, though it was spoken against in Parliament, is a most excellent court, for it keeps up ceremony and order, provided the court be kept within its bounds. Certainly, degrees of apparel [appropriate] to the several conditions and callings is of great consequence to the peace of the kingdom, for when lower degrees strive to outbrave higher degrees, it breeds envy in the better sort, pride in the meaner sort, and contempt of the nobility by the vulgar, all of which breeds faction and disorder, which are the causes of a civil war. Therefore, Sire, keep up your nobility and gentry to all their just rights and dignities. For was it not a part of the nobility and gentry that kept up your Royal Father so long when he had no money—that which is the sinews of war—maintaining themselves and the war almost at their own charge, and holding out beyond all expectation? It was neither the Church nor the Law that kept the King up so long, but part of the nobility and gentry; therefore your Majesty's wisdom will cherish them....

THE ERRORS OF STATE AND THEIR REMEDIES

The greatest error in these last two reigns was that the kings were always in want of money, which is the greatest error a king can make, whether it was out of profuseness in gifts or in unnecessary things, such as pictures, jewels, or the like, or for being cozened. It is certain that want, in a king, will, in the end, bring ruin, for being in necessity makes him put up many illegal taxes which much offend the people. Then the next Parliament becomes inflamed and the king is forced to remedy them in order to give contentments to his people, and so he falls in the opinion of his subjects, and makes even the clowns see that Parliament can order him

[1] Most early modern countries had sumptuary legislation that regulated what clothing could be worn by people of different social ranks and occupations; Cavendish suggests a return to such regulations as one way to reassert traditional social hierarchies.

[2] Marshall's Court Marshalsea, a court originally held before the steward and marshall of the royal household to settle disputes between members of the household; in the seventeenth century it dealt with debts and with cases committed within twelve miles of the court.

[about],[1] and so many will think that a Parliament has the transcendent power which it has not; on the contrary, far from it. Aye, even should none of those taxes be presented, but it was your necessity that urged you to call a Parliament, that Parliament would think they had your Majesty on the hip and would play upon you accordingly. They would give you no money until they had what they desired; this cannot be a free Parliament, for they would bargain with you and play upon your necessity, getting ten times the worth of what they buy, very much to your prejudice. Therefore, as the old saying goes, put your money in your purse and keep it. Henry the seventh, your royal ancestor, was a wise king and he did this; he would often say that England was a good farm if it were well husbanded, and his Majesty was the best husband of it that ever I heard of, and so he was not put to such plunges as princes in necessity are. A sparing prince is good for himself and for his people, but not for the courtiers, who are but a few in comparison with the rest. When you are rich, even your important neighbours will fear you; if you are poor, they will not care about you. When you are rich, and call a Parliament, your Majesty is then master of the field and you may do what you please, and they will have no ground to work off against you. In a king, oh Sire, riches, both at home and abroad, are more advantageous than I can express. Therefore, Sire, put money in your purse and be rich....

THE RECREATIONS FOR YOUR MAJESTY'S PEOPLE BOTH IN THE CITY AND THE COUNTRY

First for London: Paris Gardens will hold good for the meaner people.[2] Then for the several playhouses. There were at least five in my time: Black-Friars, The Cockpit, Salisbury Court, The Fortune and The Red Bull.[3] There were the boys that played at Black-Friars and at Paul's, while the King's Players acted at The Globe, now called The Phoenix.[4] Some played at The Boar's Head and at The Curtain-in-the-Fields and some at The Hope, which is The Bear Garden, and others at The White Friars.[5] But five or six playhouses are enough for all sorts of diversion and pleasure of that kind. Then there will be puppet plays to please them besides, as also dancers of the ropes with jugglers and tumblers, besides strange sights of beasts, birds, monsters and many other things, with several sorts of music and dancing. And all the old holidays,[6] with their mirth and rites set up again. There will be daily feasting in merry England, for England is so plentiful of all provisions, that if we do not eat them they will eat us, so we feast in our defence.

For the Country Recreations

May games, Morris dances, the Lord of the May, and the Lady of the May, the fool, and the hobby horse must not be forgotten, as also the Whitsun Lord and Lady, the thrashing of hens at Shrovetide, carols and wassails at Christmas, with good plum porridge and pies which are now forbidden as profane, ungodly things at wakes.[1] Fairs and markets maintain commerce and trade. And after evening prayer every Sunday and holiday, the country people with their fresher lasses will trip on the town green about the May Pole, to the loudest bagpipes, there to be refreshed with ale and cakes. King James, of blessed memory, wrote a little book,[2] not only in defence of dancing, but also commanded that his good people should rejoice themselves with dancing after evening prayer.

[1] clowns rustic, ignorant, or ill-bred people (OED clown 1, 2).

[2] Paris Gardens a tract of about one hundred wooded acres in Southwark, open to the public.

[3] in my time that is, before the theatres were closed in 1642. Blackfriars was demolished in 1655; the Cockpit (also known as the Phoenix) was reopened at the Restoration but closed within a few years due to competition from the Theatre Royal; Salisbury Court had its interior destroyed by soldiers in 1649, but was restored and reopened at the Restoration, only to be destroyed in the Great Fire; the Fortune was also dismantled by soldiers in 1649, and pulled down completely in 1661; the Red Bull reopened in 1660 but was demolished within a few years.

[4] The Globe, rebuilt after a fire in 1613, was demolished in the mid-1640s; Newcastle is confusing its name change with the Cockpit, which was renamed the Phoenix when rebuilt after a fire in 1617.

[5] The Boar's Head was one of the largest and most famous taverns in Eastcheap; the Curtain was a playhouse that had fallen into disuse by the mid-1620s; the Hope was a theatre converted from a bear-baiting arena that had probably reverted to baiting by about 1617; Whitefriars had been abandoned by about 1614.

[6] the old holidays treated in more detail in the following section on "country recreations."

Then there should be players to go up and down the countryside. In my time, most noble men had country players, rope-dancers, jugglers, tumblers, and indeed most of all those things I formerly spoke of goes down into the country. And these things will much divert and please the people. Mr. Thomas Killigrew, your Majesty's Master of the Revels,[3] I know, will manage all these things most discreetly for your Majesty's honour and the good of the commonwealth, looking least after his own interests, or else I am much mistaken. These divertissements will amuse the people's thoughts, and keep them in harmless action which will free your Majesty from faction and rebellion.

—(1659)

[1] Parliamentary legislation in the 1640s had banned the celebration of traditional holiday rites and pastimes; support of these traditions subsequently became a mark of Royalist loyalty (in e.g. the poetry of Robert Herrick). Cockthrashing involved tethering a cock by a leg and throwing objects at it in the attempt to knock it over.

[2] The Declaration of Sports (1618, reissued 1633), popularly known as the Book of Sports, responded to Puritan sabbatarianism by decreeing that traditional holiday pastimes be allowed on Sundays.

[3] The Revels Office was the regulatory body that licensed plays and theatre companies. Killigrew (1612–1683), playwright and theatre manager, did not officially become Master of the Revels until 1673, when his predecessor Sir Henry Herbert died.

George Herbert

1593 – 1633

George Herbert was born into a wealthy and aristocratic family, his eldest brother being Lord Herbert of Cherbury. His mother, Magdalen Herbert, a friend of Donne's, was probably one of the major influences in his decision to become a priest of the English Church, another being his friend Nicholas Ferrar, the founder of a religious community at Little Gidding. Herbert was educated first privately, then at Westminster School, then at Cambridge, where he had a brilliant career, and coming to the notice of King James in his capacity as the university's Public Orator. As the fifth son, he needed to make his own way in the world, and at first had hopes of preferment at Court, but the death of his patrons, the Duke of Richmond and the Marquess of Hamilton, and of James himself, brought those hopes to an end. His rectorship at Bemerton, though it only lasted three years, is one of the legends of early Anglicanism, thanks to Izaak Walton's description of it in his life of Herbert. He is said to have married his wife, Jane Danvers, on three days' acquaintance, having often heard her praised by her father, who desired the match. Herbert was a good linguist and musician and a "poet's poet," whose verse is often experimental and technically original.

The Altar

A broken ALTAR, Lord thy servant rears,
Made of a heart, and cemented with tears:[1]
Whose parts are as thy hand did frame;
No workman's tool hath touched the same.[2]
A HEART alone
Is such a stone,
As nothing but
Thy pow'r doth cut.
Wherefore each part
Of my hard heart
Meets in this frame,
To praise thy name.
That, if I chance to hold my peace,
These stones to praise thee may not cease.[3]
O let thy blessed SACRIFICE be mine,
And sanctify this ALTAR to be thine.
—1633

Redemption

Having been tenant long to a rich Lord,
Not thriving, I resolved to be bold,
And make a suit unto him, to afford
A new small-rented lease, and cancel th'old.[4]
In heaven at his manor I him sought:
They told me there, that he was lately gone
About some land, which he had dearly bought
Long since on earth, to take possession.
I straight returned, and knowing his great birth,
Sought him accordingly in great resorts;
In cities, theatres, gardens, parks, and courts:
At length I heard a ragged noise and mirth
Of thieves and murderers: there I him espied,
Who straight, Your suit is granted, said, and died.
—1633

Easter Wings[1] *

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store,
Though foolishly he lost the same,
Decaying more and more,
Till he became
Most poor:
With thee
O let me rise
As larks, harmoniously,
And sing this day thy victories:
Then shall the fall further the flight in me.[2]

My tender age in sorrow did begin:
And still with sicknesses and shame
Thou didst so punish sin,
That I became
Most thin.
With thee
Let me combine,
And feel this day thy victory:
For, if I imp my wing on thine,[3]
Affliction shall advance the flight in me.
—1633

Affliction (I)

When first thou didst entice to thee my heart,
I thought the service brave:[4]
So many joys I writ down for my part,
Besides what I might have
Out of my stock of natural delights,
Augmented with thy gracious benefits.

I looked on thy furniture so fine,
And made it fine to me:
Thy glorious household-stuff did me entwine,
And 'tice me unto thee.
Such stars I counted mine: both heav'n and earth
Paid me my wages in a world of mirth.

What pleasures could I want, whose King I served,
Where joys my fellows were?
Thus argued into hopes, my thoughts reserved
No place for grief or fear.
Therefore my sudden soul caught at the place,[5]
And made her youth and fierceness seek thy face.

At first thou gav'st me milk and sweetnesses;
I had my wish and way:
My days were strawed with flow'rs and happiness;[6]
There was no month but May.
But with my years sorrow did twist and grow,
And made a party unawares for woe.

My flesh began unto my soul in pain,[7]
Sicknesses cleave my bones;
Consuming agues dwell in every vein,[8]
And tune my breath to groans.
Sorrow was all my soul; I scarce believed,
Till grief did tell me roundly, that I lived.[9]

[2] fall referring to the "fortunate fall" (felix culpa), the belief that Adam and Eve's disobedience could be considered fortunate in that it occasioned the Incarnation and the possibility of redemption.

[3] imp from falconry: to engraft a damaged wing with feathers to restore or improve flight (OED imp v 4).

[4] service a situation or place as servant; the serving of a certain master or household (OED service sb 3a, b); brave fine, splendid (OED brave a 2,3).

[5] sudden quick to perform, prompt (OED sudden a 4).

[6] strawed strewn.

[7] The likeliest meaning is "My flesh began to remonstrate with my soul." The content of the flesh's complaint is given in the next three lines, in which the verbs are in the present tense.

[8] agues acute or violent fevers (OED ague 1).

[9] roundly plainly, bluntly (OED roundly adv 3).

When I got health, thou took'st away my life,
And more; for my friends die:[1]
My mirth and edge was lost; a blunted knife
Was of more use than I.
Thus thin and lean without a fence or friend,[2]
I was blown through with every storm and wind.

Whereas my birth and spirit rather took
The way that takes the town;
Thou didst betray me to a ling'ring book,
And wrap me in a gown.
I was entangled in the world of strife,
Before I had the power to change my life.

Yet, for I threatened oft the siege to raise,
Not simp'ring all mine age,
Thou often didst with Academic praise
Melt and dissolve my rage.
I took thy sweetened pill, till I came where
I could not go away, nor persevere.

Yet lest perchance I should too happy be
In my unhappiness,
Turning my purge to food, thou throwest me
Into more sicknesses.
Thus doth thy power cross-bias me, not making
Thine own gift good, yet me from my ways taking.[3]

Now I am here, what thou wilt do with me
None of my books will show:
I read, and sigh, and wish I were a tree;
For sure then I should grow
To fruit or shade: at least some bird would trust
Her household to me, and I should be just.

Yet, though thou troublest me, I must be meek;
In weakness must be stout.
Well, I will change the service, and go seek
Some other master out.
Ah my dear God! though I am clean forgot,
Let me not love thee, if I love thee not.

Prayer (I)

Prayer the Church's banquet, Angels' age,
God's breath in man returning to his birth,
The soul in paraphrase, heart in pilgrimage,
The Christian plummet sounding heav'n and earth;[4]
Engine against th' Almighty, sinner's tower,[5]
Reversed thunder, Christ-side-piercing spear,[6]
The six-days world transposing in an hour,[7]
A kind of tune, which all things hear and fear;
Softness, and peace, and joy, and love, and bliss,
Exalted Manna, gladness of the best,[8]
Heaven in ordinary, man well dressed,
The milky way, the bird of Paradise,
Church-bells beyond the stars heard, the soul's blood,
The land of spices; something understood.

[1] my friends die The reference is not necessarily to intimate friends, but rather to well-disposed men of power who could have furthered Herbert's worldly ambitions.

[2] fence means or method of defence (OED fence sb 3).

[3] cross-bias to counter, to run contrary to (OED).

[4] plummet a piece of lead or other metal attached to a line, and used for sounding or measuring the depth of water (OED plummet sb 2).

[5] Engine a machine or instrument used in warfare (OED engine sb 5a); tower a moveable structure used to attack a fortified place (OED tower sb 5a). The implied metaphor is of a siege against God, by which man will break into heaven. Compare Henry Vaughan's "I threaten heaven" in "Disorder and Frailty."

[6] spear See John 19:34.

[7] six-days world contrasting the six days it took to create the world with what prayer can accomplish in an hour.

[8] During their forty-year journey through the wilderness, after fleeing from Egypt, the Israelites were given manna to eat (Exodus 16:4).

Jordan (I) [1]

Who says that fictions only and false hair
Become a verse? Is there in truth no beauty?
Is all good structure in a winding stair?
May no lines pass, except they do their duty
Not to a true, but painted chair?

Is it no verse, except enchanted groves
And sudden arbours shadow coarse-spun lines?
Must purling streams refresh a lover's loves?
Must all be veiled,[2] while he that reads, divines,
Catching the sense at two removes?

Shepherds are honest people; let them sing: [3]
Riddle who list, for me, and pull for prime: [4]
I envy no man's nightingale or spring
Nor let them punish me with loss of rhyme
Who plainly say, My God, My King.

The H. Scriptures I

Oh Book! infinite sweetness! let my heart
Suck ev'ry letter, and a honey gain,
Precious for any grief in any part;
To clear the breast, to mollify all pain.
Thou art all health, health thriving till it make
A full eternity: thou art a mass
Of strange delights, where we may wish and take.
Ladies, look here; this is the thankful glass,
That mends the looker's eyes: this is the well
That washes what it shows. Who can endear
Thy praise too much? thou art heav'n's Lidger
here, [5]
Working against the states of death and hell.
Thou art joy's handsel:[6] heav'n lies flat in thee,
Subject to ev'ry mounter's bended knee.
—1633

The H. Scriptures II

Oh that I knew how all thy lights combine,
And the configurations of their glory!
Seeing not only how each verse doth shine,
But all the constellations of the story.
This verse marks that, and both do make a motion
Unto a third, that ten leaves off doth lie:
Then as dispersed herbs do watch a potion,
These three make up some Christian's destiny: [7]
Such are thy secrets, which my life makes good,
And comments on thee: for in ev'ry thing
Thy words do find me out, and parallels bring,
And in another make me understood.
Stars are poor books, and oftentimes do miss:
This book of stars lights to eternal bliss.

[1] Jordan the river in which Christ was baptized. The resonances are complex, but in effect Herbert here explores the baptism of his art. Inspired by the Jordan and the Christian story it represents (rather than by the springs of the muses and poetic traditions inspired by classical models), Herbert's poetry employs the techniques of secular art, but its subject is transformed.

[2] Must all be veiled referring to allegorical poetry.

[3] Shepherds…sing referring to pastoral poetry.

[4] Riddle who list let whomever wishes pose riddles; pull for prime draw for a winning hand in the card game primero (OED prime sb^{2} 6).

[5] Lidger ledger or lieger; a resident ambassador (OED ledger sb 6).

[6] handsel here, a token of what is to come (OED handsel 3).

[7] Then as…destiny a play on an affinity between "leaves" of plants and books: the general sense is that scattered biblical texts may combine into saving knowledge just as various herbs "watch" for opportunities to combine into medicine.

[8] betimes in good time, while there is yet time (OED betimes adv 3).

The Windows

Lord, how can man preach thy eternal word?
He is a brittle crazy glass:
Yet in thy temple thou dost him afford
This glorious and transcendent place,
To be a window, through thy grace.

But when thou dost anneal in glass thy story, [8]
Making thy life to shine within
The holy Preacher's; then the light and glory
More rev'rend grows, and more doth win:
Which else shows wat'rish, bleak, and thin.

Doctrine and life, colours and light, in one
When they combine and mingle, bring
A strong regard and awe: but speech alone
Doth vanish like a flaring thing,
And in the ear, not conscience ring.

Denial

When my devotions could not pierce
Thy silent ears;
Then was my heart broken, as was my verse:
My breast was full of fears
And disorder:

My bent thoughts, like a brittle bow,
Did fly asunder:
Each took his way; some would to pleasures go,
Some to the wars and thunder
Of alarms.

As good go anywhere, they say,
As to benumb
Both knees and heart, in crying night and day,

[1] The change from "it" to "his" in connection with the body is not especially surprising: "his" continued to be used as a neuter possessive until late in the century; elements punning on the elements of which the body is made and the content of learning in an "elementary" school, i.e. the letters of the alphabet; hence, the rudiments of learning (OED element sb pl IV 14).

[3] jet black marble (OED jet sb 2).

[4] them the tombstones and monuments, which will in time themselves fall down.

[5] thy stem / And true descent Words from the liturgy for Ash Wednesday are relevant: "Remember, o man, that thou art dust, and unto dust thou shalt return" (based on Genesis 2:7).

[6] glass hourglass.

[7] which also shall / Be crumbled into dust time, like flesh, will also come to an end; see Psalm 102:25–26 and Hebrews 1:11–12.

[8] anneal to fix colours painted on glass by heating it.

Come, come, my God, O come,
But no hearing.

O that thou shouldst give dust a tongue
To cry to thee,
And then not hear it crying! all day long
My heart was in my knee,
But no hearing.

Therefore my soul lay out of sight,
Untuned, unstrung:
My feeble spirit, unable to look right,
Like a nipped blossom, hung
Discontented.

O cheer and tune my heartless breast,
Defer no time;
That so thy favours granting my request,
They and my mind may chime,
And mend my rhyme.

Vanity (I)

The fleet Astronomer can bore,
And thread the spheres with his quick-piercing mind: [1]
He views their stations, walks from door to door,
Surveys, as if he had designed
To make a purchase there: he sees their dances, [2]
And knoweth long before
Both their full-eyed aspects, and secret glances. [3]

The nimble Diver with his side
Cuts through the working waves, that he may fetch
His dearly earned pearl, which God did hide
On purpose from the ventrous wretch; [4]
That he might save his life, and also hers,
Who with excessive pride
Her own destruction and his danger wears. [5]

The subtle Chymick can devest
And strip the creature naked, till he find
The callow principles within their nest: [6]
There he imparts to them his mind, [7]
Admitted to their bed-chamber, before
They appear trim and dressed
To ordinary suitors at the door.

What hath not man sought out and found,
But his dear God? who yet his glorious law
Embosoms in us, mellowing the ground
With showers and frosts, with love and awe,
So that we need not say, Where's this command?
Poor man, thou searchest round
To find out death, but missest life at hand. [8]
—1633

[1] spheres The universe was conceived as a series of concentric spheres.

[2] their dances The cosmic dance, like the ladder and the chain, was one of the categories used in "the Elizabethan world picture."

[3] Herbert deploys the vocabulary of astronomy ("aspect") to suggest a sexuality in the enterprise of the astronomer.

[4] Mention of the pearl helps to tie together the first and second stanzas, since we may think of the astronomer as metaphorically threading a necklace.

[5] Her own destruction because Pride is one of the seven deadly sins; her destruction is spiritual, the danger of the pearl-diver physical.

[6] Chymick alchemist. "Subtle" was the name of the principal character in Ben Jonson's The Alchemist; the word implied acumen and treachery as well as an established association with alchemy, regarded by many as a morally questionable enterprise.

[7] imparts to them his mind The metaphor is of the alchemist wooing the principles of nature; the phrase was used of a suitor (see the last line of the stanza) making his affections known to their object.

[8] This poem has been characterized, by Helen Vendler, as a "fearful repudiation of intellectual enquiry." It is not that; but its final stanza might be understood in relation to a saying of Sir Philip Sidney, in the Apologie for Poetrie, that "the ending end of all earthly learning being virtuous action, those skills that most serve to bring forth that, have a most just title to be princes over all the rest."

Virtue

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky:
The dew shall weep thy fall to night;
For thou must die.

Sweet rose, whose hue angry and brave
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye:
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.

Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses,
A box where sweets compacted lie; [1]
My music shows ye have your closes, [2]
And all must die.

Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives;
But though the whole world turn to coal,
Then chiefly lives.

The Pearl. Matth. 13:45

I know the ways of Learning; both the head
And pipes that feed the press, and make it run; [3]
What reason hath from nature borrowed,
Or of itself, like a good housewife, spun
In laws and policy; what the stars conspire,
What willing nature speaks, what forced by fire; [4]
Both th'old discoveries, and the new-found seas,
The stock and surplus, cause and history:
All these stand open, or I have the keys:
Yet I love thee.

I know the ways of Honour, what maintains
The quick returns of courtesy and wit:
In vies of favours whether party gains,
When glory swells the heart, and moldeth it
To all expressions both of hand and eye,
Which on the world a true-love-knot may tie,
And bear the bundle, whereso'er it goes.
How many drams of spirit there must be
To sell my life unto my friends or foes:
Yet I love thee.

I know the ways of Pleasure, the sweet strains,
The lullings and the relishes of it;
The propositions of hot blood and brains;
What mirth and music mean; what love and wit
Have done these twenty hundred years, and more:
I know the projects of unbridled store:
My stuff is flesh, not brass; my senses live,
And grumble oft, that they have more in me
Than he that curbs them, being but one to five:
Yet I love thee.

I know all these, and have them in my hand:
Therefore not seeled, but with open eyes
I fly to thee, and fully understand
Both the main sale, and the commodities; [5]
And at what rate and price I have thy love
With all the circumstances that may move:
Yet through these labyrinths, not my groveling wit,
But thy silk twist let down from heav'n to me,
Did both conduct and teach me, how by it
To climb to thee.

Man

My God, I heard this day,
That none doth build a stately
habitation,
But he that means to dwell therein.
What house more stately hath there been,
Or can be, than is Man? to whose creation
All things are in decay.

For Man is ev'ry thing,
And more: He is a tree, yet bears more fruit;
A beast, yet is, or should be more:
Reason and speech we only bring. [1]
Parrots may thank us, if they are not mute,
They go upon the score. [2]

Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one limb to another,
And all to all the world besides:
Each part may call the furthest, brother:
For head with foot hath private amity,
And both with moons and tides. [3]

Nothing hath got so far,
But Man hath caught and kept it, as his prey.
His eyes dismount the highest star:
He is in little all the sphere.
Herbs gladly cure our flesh; because that they Find their acquaintance there. [4]

For us the winds do blow,
The earth doth rest, heav'n move, and fountains flow.
Nothing we see, but means our good,
As our delight, or as our treasure:
The whole is, either our cupboard of food,
Or cabinet of pleasure.

The stars have us to bed;
Night draws the curtain, which the sun withdraws;
Music and light attend our head.
All things unto our flesh are kind
In their descent and being; to our mind
In their ascent and cause.

Each thing is full of duty:
Waters united are our navigation;
Distinguished, our habitation; [5]
Below, our drink; above, our meat; [6]
Both are our cleanliness. Hath one such beauty?
Then how are all things neat? [7]

More servants wait on Man,
Than he'll take notice of: in ev'ry path
He treads down that which doth befriend him,
When sickness makes him pale and wan. [8]
Oh mighty love! Man is one world, and hath
Another to attend him.

---

[1] Herbert argues that a human is more than a microcosm, or little world; he is that, and he is more. Donne wrote that "the Philosopher draws man into too narrow a table, when he says he is Microcosmos, an Abridgement of the world in little: Nazianzen gives him but his due, when he calls him Mundum Magnum, a world to which all the rest of the world is but subordinate" (XXVI Sermons, xxv.370, quoted by Hutchinson).

[2] They go upon the score They are indebted to man; see OED score sb 10.

[3] a reference to the idea that different parts of the body are affected by the movements of the heavenly bodies.

[4] a reference to the idea that each medicinal herb has an affinity with a particular part of the body; the root of the mandrake, for example, was thought to resemble a human form and accordingly to promote conception when eaten by women.

[5] See Genesis 1:9–10.

[6] above, our meat The rain makes the earth fertile to bring forth our food; meat is used in its general sense.

[7] If the element of water has so many uses, then the others may also be supposed to be suitable for the service of human beings.

[8] We walk unthinkingly on the herbs which cure our ailments.

Since then, my God, thou hast
So brave a Palace built; O dwell in it,
That it may dwell with thee at last!
Till then, afford us so much wit;
That, as the world serves us, we may serve thee,
And both thy servants be.

Jordan (II)

When first my lines of heav'nly joys made mention,
Such was their lustre, they did so excel,
That I sought out quaint words, and trim invention;
My thoughts began to burnish, sprout, and swell,
Curling with metaphors a plain intention,
Decking the sense, as if it were to sell.

Thousands of notions in my brain did run,
Off'ring their service, if I were not sped:
I often blotted what I had begun;
This was not quick enough, and that was dead.
Nothing could seem too rich to clothe the sun,
Much less those joys which trample on his head.

As flames do work and wind, when they ascend,
So did I weave myself into the sense.
But while I bustled, I might hear a friend —> christ
Whisper, How wide is all this long pretence!
There is in love a sweetness ready penned:
Copy out only that, and save expense. to be found in sweetn

The Quip

The merry world did on a day
With his train-bands and mates agree
To meet together, where I lay,[1]
And all in sport to jeer at me.

First, Beauty crept into a rose,
Which when I plucked not, Sir, said she,
Tell me, I pray, Whose hands are those?
But thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

Then Money came, and chinking still,
What tune is this, poor man? said he:
I heard in music you had skill.
But thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

Then came brave Glory puffing by
In silks that whistled, who but he?
He scarce allowed me half an eye.
But thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

---

[1] train-bands trained bands; London's citizen militia.

Then came quick Wit-and-Conversation,
And he would needs a comfort be,
And, to be short, make an oration.[1]
But thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

Yet when the hour of thy design
To answer these fine things shall come;
Speak not at large; say, I am thine:
And then they have their answer home.

Providence[2]

O Sacred Providence, who from end to end
Strongly and sweetly movest, shall I write,
And not of thee, through whom my fingers bend
To hold my quill? shall they not do thee right?

Of all the creatures both in sea and land
Only to Man thou hast made known thy ways,
And put the pen alone into his hand,
And made him Secretary of thy praise.

Beasts fain would sing; birds ditty to their notes;
Trees would be tuning on their native lute
To thy renown: but all their hands and throats
Are brought to Man, while they are lame and mute.

Man is the world's high Priest: he doth present
The sacrifice for all; while they below
Unto the service mutter an assent,
Such as springs use that fall, and winds that blow.[3]

He that to praise and laud thee doth refrain,
Doth not refrain unto himself alone,
But robs a thousand who would praise thee fain,
And doth commit a world of sin in one.

The beasts say, Eat me: but, if beasts must teach,
The tongue is yours to eat, but mine to praise.
The trees say, Pull me: but the hand you stretch,
Is mine to write, as it is yours to raise.[4]

Wherefore, most sacred Spirit, I here present
For me and all my fellows praise to thee:[5]
And just it is that I should pay the rent,
Because the benefit accrues to me.

We all acknowledge both thy power and love
To be exact, transcendent, and divine;
Who dost so strongly and so sweetly move,
While all things have their will, yet none but thine.

For either thy command or thy permission
Lay hands on all: they are thy right and left.
The first puts on with speed and expedition;
The other curbs sin's stealing pace and theft.

Nothing escapes them both; all must appear,
And be disposed, and dressed, and tuned by thee,
Who sweetly temper'st all. If we could hear
Thy skill and art, what music would it be![6]

Thou art in small things great, not small in any:
Thy even praise can neither rise, not fall.
Thou art in all things one, in each thing many:
For thou art infinite in one and all.

[1] oration Herbert had been Public Orator at Cambridge.

[2] This poem has many echoes of Psalm 104, of which the heading in the Authorized Version is A meditation upon the majesty and providence of God.

[3] One of the differences between Herbert and Vaughan is that the latter thought of the creatures as able to praise God for themselves, without Man as intermediary. Hutchinson quotes a relevant passage from Henry More's Antidote to Atheism: "One singular end of man's creation is that he may be a Priest in this magnificent Termple of the Universe, and send up Prayers and praises to the great Creator of all things in behalf of the rest of the Creatures."

[4] For a similarly anthropocentric version of humanity's relation to the non-human world, see Donne's Holy Sonnet 12, which begins "Why are we by all creatures waited on?"

[5] Herbert is addressing the Holy Spirit, third Person of the Trinity.

[6] temper'st In this context, it seems likely that Herbert has in mind the musical sense, to bring into harmony.

Tempests are calm to thee; they know thy hand,
And hold it fast, as children do their fathers',
Which cry and follow. Thou hast made poor sand
Check the proud sea, ev'n when it swells and gathers.

Thy cupboard serves the world: the meat is set,
Where all may reach: no beast but knows his feed.
Birds teach us hawking; fishes have their net:
The great prey on the less, they on some weed.

Nothing engendered doth prevent his meat: [1]
Flies have their table spread, ere they appear.
Some creatures have in winter what to eat;
Others do sleep, and envy not their cheer.

How finely dost thou times and seasons spin,
And make a twist checkered with night and day! [2]
Which as it lengthens winds, and winds us in,
As bowls go on, but turning all the way. [3]

Each creature hath a wisdom for his good.
The pigeons feed their tender off-spring, crying,
When they are callow; but withdraw their food
When they are fledge, that need may teach them flying.

Bees work for man; and yet they never bruise
Their master's flower, but leave it, having done,
As fair as ever, and as fit to use;
So both the flower doth stay, and honey run.

Sheep eat the grass, and dung the ground for more:
Trees after bearing drop their leaves for soil:
Springs vent their streams, and by expense get store:
Clouds cool by heat, and baths by cooling boil.

Who hath the virtue to express the rare
And curious virtues both of herbs and stones?
Is there an herb for that? O that thy care
Would show a root, that gives expressions!

And if a herb hath power, what have the stars?
A rose, besides his beauty, is a cure. [4]
Doubtless our plagues and plenty, peace and wars
Are there much surer than our art is sure.

Thou hast hid metals: man may take them thence;
But at his peril: when he digs the place,
He makes a grave; as if the thing had sense,
And threatened man, that he should fill the space. [5]

Ev'n poisons praise thee. Should a thing be lost?
Should creatures want for want of heed their due?
Since where are poisons, antidotes are most:
The help stands close, and keeps the fear in view.

The sea, which seems to stop the traveller,
Is by a ship the speedier passage made.
The winds, who think they rule the mariner,
Are ruled by him, and taught to serve his trade.

And as thy house is full, so I adore
Thy curious art in marshalling thy goods.
The hills with health abound; the vales with store;
The South with marble; North with furs and woods.

Hard things are glorious; easy things good cheap.
The common all men have; that which is rare

[1] prevent come, appear, or act before (OED prevent v 1c). No creature appears before there is food for it. This sense of "prevent" came down through the centuries in the Collect for Easter Day in the Book of Common Prayer, where we read of God's "special grace preventing us" and putting "into our minds good desires."

[2] twist the twisting of threads into a cord (OED twist sb ^{1} II).

[3] In lawn bowling, players roll a ball weighted on one side to make the ball move in a curved path.

[4] Oil of roses was used to mitigate the smart of wounds.

[5] Mining was thought to be a morally dubious activity from early times; compare Milton's reference to "treasures better hid" in Paradise Lost 1: 688.

Men therefore seek to have, and care to keep.
The healthy frosts with summer- fruits compare.

Light without wind is glass: warm without weight
Is wool and fur: cool without closeness, shade:
Speed without pains, a horse: tall without height,
A servile hawk: low without loss, a spade.

All countries have enough to serve their need:
If they seek fine things, thou dost make them run
For their offence; and then dost turn their speed
To be commerce and trade from sun to sun. [1]

Nothing wears clothes, but Man; nothing doth need
But he to wear them. Nothing useth fire,
But Man alone, to show his heav'nly breed:
And only he hath fuel in desire.

When th' earth was dry, thou mad'st a sea of wet:
When that lay gathered, thou didst broach the mountains:
When yet some places could no moisture get,
The winds grew gard'ners, and the clouds good fountains.

Rain, do not hurt my flowers; but gently speed
Your honey drops: press not to smell them here:
When they are ripe, their odour will ascend,
And at your lodging with their thanks appear.

How harsh are thorns to pears! and yet they make
A better hedge, and need less reparation. [2]
How smooth are silks compared with a stake,
Or with a stone! yet make no good foundation.

Sometimes thou dost divide thy gifts to man,
Sometimes unite. The Indian nut alone [3]
Is clothing, meat and trencher, drink and can, [4]
Boat, cable, sail and needle, all in one.

Most herbs that grow in brooks, are hot and dry.
Cold fruits warm kernels help, against the wind. [5]
The lemon's juice and rind cure mutually.
The whey of milk doth loose, the milk doth bind.

Thy creatures leap not, but express a feast, [6]
Where all the guests sit close, and nothing wants.
Frogs marry fish and flesh; bats, bird and beast;
Sponges, non-sense and sense; mines, th' earth and plants.

To show thou art not bound, as if thy lot
Were worse than ours, sometimes thou shiftest hands.
Most things move th' under-jaw; the Crocodile not.
Most things sleep lying; th' Elephant leans or stands. [7]

---

[1] In the fourth chapter of A Priest to the Temple, Herbert wrote, in effect, that God disposed matters so that no one country bears all things, in order that commerce might flourish.

[2] to compared to.

[3] Indian nut coconut.

[4] trencher "Until the fifteenth century and sometimes afterwards meat was served on to large trimmed squares of coarse bread...which served as a plate and mopped up the gravy. They were called trenchers, and as they were joined and replaced by wooden plates the name was retained" (Jacqueline Fearn, Domestic Bygones).

[5] This line can be read three ways; Grosart and Palmer thought of cold fruits as a genitive (the warm kernels of the cold fruits); Hutchinson as the object of help. I am reading it as the subject of warm and of help, and have supplied a comma after help. The sense is that the fruits, though cold, insulate the kernels and keep them warm in spite of the wind.

[6] This line expresses two related ideas, the fact that nature is gradual, with every rung of the ladder of being occupied; and the idea of nature's bounty, or plenitude.

[7] Hutchinson remarks that the supposed fact that the elephant does not lie down at night was a common illustration in mediaeval preaching; Sir Thomas Browne casts doubt on the idea in Pseudodoxia Epidemica.

But who hath praise enough? nay, who hath any?
None can express thy works, but he that knows them:
And none can know thy works, which are so many,
And so complete, but only he that owes them.[1]

All things that are, though they have sev'ral ways,
Yet in their being join with one advice
To honour thee: and so I give thee praise
In all my other hymns, but in this twice.

Each thing that is, although in use and name
It go for one, hath many ways in store
To honour thee; and so each hymn thy fame
Extolleth many ways, yet this one more.

Paradise

I bless thee, Lord, because I GROW
Among thy trees, which in a ROW
To thee both fruit and order OW.

What open force, or hidden CHARM
Can blast my fruit, or bring me HARM,
While the inclosure is thine ARM?

Inclose me still for fear I START.
Be to me rather sharp and TART,
Than let me want thy hand and ART.

When thou dost greater judgements SPARE,
And with thy knife but prune and PARE,
Ev'n fruitful trees more fruitful ARE.

Such sharpness shows the sweetest FREND:
Such cuttings rather heal than REND:
And such beginnings touch their END.

The Pilgrimage[2]

I travelled on, seeing the hill, where lay
My expectation.
A long it was and weary way.
The gloomy cave of Desperation
I left on th' one and on the other side
The rock of Pride.

And so I came to Fancy's meadow strowed
With many a flower:
Fain would I here have made abode,
But I was quickened by my hour.
So to Care's copse I came, and there got through
With much ado.

That led me to the wild of Passion, which
Some call the wold;[3]
A wasted place, but sometimes rich.
Here I was robbed of all my gold,
Save one good Angel, which a friend had tied
Close to my side.[4]

At length I got unto the gladsome hill,[5]
Where lay my hope,
Where lay my heart; and climbing still,
When I had gained the brow and top,
A lake of brackish waters on the ground
Was all I found.

[2] This poem may have led Henry Vaughan, a great admirer of Herbert, to write his more complex account of spiritual pilgrimage, "Regeneration."

[3] wold a piece of open country, a plain; in later use chiefly, an elevated tract of open country or moorland (OED wold 3). Hutchinson points out that the hilly tracts of Lincolnshire, which Herbert had visited, were so called.

[4] Angel an old English gold coin (OED angel sb III.6); it had on it the device of St. Michael, guardian angel of the British Isles; there is also a pun on the sense of guardian angel.

[5] Gladsome cheering, pleasant (OED gladsome a 1).

With that abashed and struck with many a sting
Of swarming fears,
I fell, and cried, Alas my King!
Can both the way and end be tears?
Yet taking heart I rose, and then perceived
I was deceived:

My hill was further: so I flung away,
Yet heard a cry
Just as I went, None goes that way
And lives: If that be all, said I,
After so foul a journey death is fair,
And but a chair.[1]

The Collar *

I struck the board, and cried, No more.
I will abroad.
What? shall I ever sigh and pine?
My lines and life are free; free as the road,
Loose as the wind, as large as store.[2]
Shall I be still in suit?
Have I no harvest but a thorn
To let me blood, and not restore
What I have lost with cordial fruit?
Sure there was wine
Before my sighs did dry it: there was corn
Before my tears did drown it.[3]
Is the year only lost to me?
Have I no bays to crown it?
No flowers, no garlands gay? all blasted?
All wasted?
Not so, my heart: but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands.
Recover all thy sigh-blown age
On double pleasures: leave thy cold dispute
Of what is fit, and not. Forsake thy cage,
Thy rope of sands,
Which petty thoughts have made, and made to thee
Good cable, to enforce and draw,
And be thy law,
While thou didst wink and wouldst not see.
Away; take heed:
I will abroad.
Call in thy death's head there: tie up thy fears.[4]
He that forbears
To suit and serve his need,
Deserves his load.
But as I raved and grew more fierce and wild
At every word,
Me thoughts I heard one calling, Child:
And I replied, My Lord.

The Pulley[5]

When God at first made man,
Having a glass of blessings standing by;
Let us (said he) pour on him all we can:
Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
Contract into a span.

So strength first made a way;
Then beauty flowed, then wisdom, honour,
pleasure:
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that alone of all his treasure
Rest in the bottom lay.

[2] store plenty, abundance (OED store sb 4b).

[3] corn grain.

[4] The death's head, or skull, was a common emblem during the Renaissance, a reminder of the fragility and shortness of earthly life and the inevitability of death and the life hereafter.

[5] This poem reworks a version of the classical story of Pandora's box, in which hope remained at the bottom of her box after the divine blessings it had contained escaped when she opened it.

For if I should (said he)
Bestow this jewel also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature:
So both should losers be.

Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining restlessness:
Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet weariness
May toss him to my breast.

The Flower *

How fresh, O Lord, how sweet and clean
Are thy returns! ev'n as the flowers in spring;
To which, besides their own demean, [1]
The late-past frosts tributes of pleasure bring.
Grief melts away
Like snow in May,
As if there were no such cold thing.

Who would have thought my shrivelled heart
Could have recovered greenness? It was gone
Quite under ground; as flowers depart
To see their mother-root, when they have blown;
Where they together
All the hard weather,
Dead to the world, keep house unknown.

These are thy wonders, Lord of power, old testament God
Killing and quick'ning, bringing down to hell
And up to heaven in an hour;
Making a chiming of a passing-bell.
We say amiss,
This or that is:
Thy word is all, if we could spell.

O that I once past changing were,
Fast in thy Paradise, where no flower can wither!
Many a spring I shoot up fair,
Off'ring at heav'n, growing and groaning thither:
Nor doth my flower
Want a spring shower,
My sins and I joining together.

But while I grow in a straight line,
Still upwards bent, as if heav'n were mine own,
Thy anger comes, and I decline:
What frost to that? what pole is not the zone,
Where all things burn,
When thou dost turn,
And the least frown of thine is shown?

And now in age I bud again, A
After so many deaths I live and write; B
I once more smell the dew and rain, A
And relish versing: O my only light, B
It cannot be C
That I am he C
On whom thy tempests fell all night. B

These are thy wonders, Lord of love, new testa men Ecc
To make us see we are but flowers that glide: [2]
Which when we once can find and prove,
Thou hast a garden for us, where to bide.
Who would be more, [3]
Swelling through store,
Forfeit their Paradise by their pride.

Aaron

Holiness on the head,
Light and perfections on the breast,
Harmonious bells below, raising the dead
To lead them unto life and rest:
Thus are true Aarons drest.[1]

Profaneness in my head,
Defects and darkness in my breast,
A noise of passions ringing me for dead
Unto a place where is no rest:
Poor priest thus am I drest.

Only another head
I have, another heart and breast,
Another music, making live not dead,
Without whom I could have no rest:
In him I am well drest.

Christ is my only head,
My alone only heart and breast,
My only music, striking me ev'n dead;
That to the old man I may rest,[2]
And be in him new drest.

So holy in my head,
Perfect and light in my dear breast,
My doctrine tuned by Christ, (who is not dead
But lives in me while I do rest)
Come people; Aaron's drest.
—1633

[1] true Aarons Aaron, the brother of Moses, was the first priest; for the description of his garments, see Exodus 28:2–43.

[2] old man the "old man" of sin, before the believer is "new dressed" in the imputed righteousness of Christ.

The Elixir

Teach me, my God and King,
In all things thee to see,
And what I do in any thing,
To do it as for thee:

Not rudely, as a beast,
To run into an action;
But still to make thee prepossessed,
And give it his perfection.

A man that looks on glass,
On it may stay his eye;
Or if he pleaseth, through it pass,
And then the heav'n espy.

All may of thee partake:
Nothing can be so mean,[3]
Which with his tincture (for thy sake)
Will not grow bright and clean.[4]

A servant with this clause
Makes drudgery divine:
Who sweeps a room, as for thy laws,
Makes that and th' action fine.[5]

This is the famous stone
That turneth all to gold:[6]
For that which God doth touch and own
Cannot for less be told.
—1633

[3] mean shabby (OED mean a 3d).

[4] tincture the action of dyeing, staining, or colouring (tincture *OED sb*3). The "tincture" is Christ's blood, shed for sinners. The Old and New Testaments contain many references to the cleansing power of sacrificially let blood. See Exodus 30:10, Leviticus 1, Psalm 51, Hebrews 13:12, Revelation 7:14.

[5] See Colossians 3:23: "And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men."

[6] famous stone the fabled "philosopher's stone."

Love (III) *

Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back,
Guilty of dust and sin.
But quick-eyed Love, observing me grow slack
From my first entrance in,
Drew nearer to me, sweetly questioning,
If I lacked any thing.

A guest, I answered, worthy to be here:
Love said, You shall be he.
I the unkind, ungrateful? Ah my dear,
I cannot look on thee.
Love took my hand, and smiling did reply,
Who made the eyes but I?

Truth Lord, but I have marred them: let my shame
Go where it doth deserve.
And know you not, says Love, who bore the blame?
My dear, then I will serve.
You must sit down, says Love, and taste my meat:
So I did sit and eat.

L'Envoy[1]

King of Glory, King of Peace,
With the one make war to cease;
With the other bless thy sheep,
Thee to love, in thee to sleep.
Let not sin devour thy fold,
Bragging that thy blood is cold,
That thy death is also dead,
While his conquests daily spread;
That thy flesh hath lost his food,
And thy cross is common wood.
Choke him, let him say no more,
But reserve his breath in store,
Till thy conquests and his fall
Make his sighs to use it all,
And then bargain with the wind
To discharge what is behind.

Blessed be God alone,
Thrice blessed three in one.

Thomas Carew

1594/5 – 1640

Thomas Carew was the son of Matthew Carew, a notable lawyer, and his wife Alice Ryvers, whose father and grandfather had been Lord Mayors of London. Nothing is known of Carew's boyhood and early education. He went up to Merton College, Oxford, at the age of thirteen. That college may have been chosen because its Warden, Henry Savile, was a kinsman by marriage. Savile is notable for having expressed a preference for "the plodding student," saying that if he wanted wits he would "go to Newgate" (a London prison). Carew took his B.A. in 1611, and then studied law at the Middle Temple. His period of study there may have been cut short by serious financial losses his father suffered. He became secretary to Sir Dudley Carleton, ambassador to Venice. This position enabled him to spend a considerable time in Italy, and his work indicates a close knowledge of Italian poetry and philosophy. However, he was eventually dismissed, to his father's rage and despair, for writing a satire on his employer and his wife. In 1619 he became secretary to Sir Edward (later Lord) Herbert of Cherbury, and, along with a hundred or so other persons, accompanied Herbert on his embassy to Paris. There is only one reference to Carew in Herbert's autobiography; he is described as "that excellent wit." While in Paris Carew may have met Giambattista Marino, upon whose "fantastic" Italian lyrics he modelled some of his own poems. The Earl of Clarendon mentions Carew as one of the notable wits with whom he was acquainted, in the period 1625–1632 (others in this circle included Ben Jonson, John Selden, Charles Cotton, Sir Kenelm Digby, and Thomas May). Clarendon writes of Carew that he was "a Person of a pleasant and facetious Wit, and made many Poems (especially in the amorous Way) which for the Sharpness of the Fancy, and the Elegancy of the Languge, in which that Fancy was spread, were at least equal, if not superior, to any of that Time." Carew's "A Rapture" is almost certainly one of the poems "in the amorous Way" here mentioned, though it circulated only in manuscript until its publication in 1640; it is echoed in an anonymous tragedy, Nero, printed in 1624. In 1630 Carew was appointed to the Court position of "gentleman of the Privy Chamber" and to the post of Sewer in Ordinary to the king. This title, from the Latin verb assidere, to sit, originally signified one who superintended the arrangement of the table, the seating of guests, and the tasting and serving of dishes. By Carew's time it seems to have been applied to one who assisted at ceremonies. Carew's masque Coelum Britannicum, with a set designed by Inigo Jones, was performed by the King and his gentleman in 1634. Carew for the most part distanced himself from the political stresses of the 1630s, but he was in the expedition which Charles I led against Scotland in 1639 in the first Bishops' War, as we learn from his poem "To my friend G.N. from Wrest." This campaign may have hastened his death; contemporary accounts confirm the "raging storms" and "cold nights...by the banks of Tweed" mentioned in the poem; the spring of 1639 was abnormally cold, and the expedition was badly supplied. This poem seems to have been completed very shortly before Carew's death in March 1640.

A Deposition from Love

I was foretold, your rebel sex,
Nor love, nor pity knew;
And with what scorn, you use to vex
Poor hearts, that humbly sue;
Yet I believed, to crown our pain,
Could we the fortress win,
The happy lover sure should gain
A Paradise within:

I thought love's plagues, like dragons sate,
Only to fright us at the gate.

But I did enter, and enjoy,
What happy lovers prove;
For I could kiss, and sport, and toy,
And taste those sweets of love;
Which had they but a lasting state,
Or if in Celia's breast,
The force of love might not abate,
Jove were too mean a guest.
But now her breach of faith, far more
Afflicts, than did her scorn before.

Hard fate! to have been once possessed
As victor, of a heart,
Achieved with labour, and unrest,
And then forced to depart.
If the stout foe will not resign,
When I besiege a town,
I lose, but what was never mine;
But he that is cast down
From enjoyed beauty, feels a woe,
Only deposed kings can know.
—1640

Disdain Returned

He that loves a rosy cheek,
Or a coral lip admires,
Or from star-like eyes doth seek
Fuel to maintain his fires;
As old Time makes these decay,
So his flames must waste away.

But a smooth, and steadfast mind,
Gentle thoughts, and calm desires,
Hearts, with equal love combined,
Kindle never dying fires.
Where these are not, I despise
Lovely cheeks, or lips, or eyes.

No tears, Celia, now shall win,
My resolved heart, to return;
I have searched thy soul within,
And find nought, but pride, and scorn;
I have learned thy arts, and now
Can disdain as much as thou.
Some power, in my revenge convey
That love to her, I cast away.
—1640

To Saxham[1]

Though frost, and snow, locked from mine eyes
That beauty which without door lies;
Thy gardens, orchards, walks, that so
I might not all thy pleasures know;
Yet (Saxham) thou within thy gate,
Art of thy self so delicate;
So full of native sweets, that bless
Thy roof with inward happiness;
As neither from, nor to thy store
Winter takes ought, or Spring adds more.
The cold and frozen air had sterved
Much poor, if not by thee preserved;[2]
Whose prayers have made thy table blest
With plenty, far above the rest.
The season hardly did afford
Course cates unto thy neighbour's board,
Yet thou hadst dainties, as the sky
Had only been thy Volary;[3]

---

[1] Little Saxham was the home of Sir John Crofts, whose son John accompanied Carew on the embassy of Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Carew had close relations with the family, as a number of poems attest. Compare Jonson's To Penshurst.

[2] sterved killed by the cold.

[3] Volary a large bird-cage or aviary (OED volary).

Or else the birds, fearing the snow
Might to another deluge grow:
The pheasant, partridge, and the lark,
Flew to thy house, as to the Ark.
The willing ox, of himself came
Home to the slaughter, with the lamb,
And every beast did thither bring
Himself, to be an offering.
The scaley herd, more pleasure took,
Bathed in thy dish, than in the brook:
Water, earth, air, did all conspire,
To pay their tributes to thy fire,
Whose cherishing flames themselves divide
Through every room, where they deride
The night, and cold abroad; whilst they
Like suns within, keep endless day.
Those cheerful beams send forth their light,
To all that wander in the night,
And seem to beckon from aloof,
The weary pilgrim to thy roof;
Where if refreshed, he will away,
He's fairly welcome, or if stay
Far more, which he shall hearty find,
Both from the master, and the hind.
The strangers welcome, each man there
Stamped on his cheerful brow, doth wear;
Nor doth this welcome, or his cheer
Grow less, 'cause he stays longer here.
There's none observes (much less repines)
How often this man sups or dines.
Thou hast no porter at the door
T'examine, or keep back the poor;
Nor locks, nor bolts; thy gates have been
Made only to let strangers in;
Untaught to shut, they do not fear
To stand wide open all the year;
Careless who enters, for they know,
Thou never didst deserve a foe;
And as for thieves, thy bounty's such,
They cannot steal, thou giv'st so much.
—1640

A Rapture

I will enjoy thee now my Celia, come
And fly with me to love's Elysium: [1]
The giant, Honour, that keeps cowards out,
Is but a masker, and the servile rout
Of baser subjects only, bend in vain
To the vast idol, whilst the nobler train
Of valiant lovers, daily sail between
The huge Colossus' legs, and pass unseen [2]
Unto the blissful shore; be bold, and wise,
And we shall enter, the grim Swiss denies
Only tame fools a passage, that not know
He is but form, and only frights in show [3]
The duller eyes that look from far; draw near,
And thou shalt scorn, what we were wont to fear.
We shall see how the stalking pageant goes
With borrowed legs, a heavy load to those
That made, and bear him; not as we once thought
The seed of gods, but a weak model wrought
By greedy men, that seek to enclose the common,
And within private arms impale free woman.
Come then, and mounted on the wings of love
We'll cut the flitting air, and soar above
The monster's head, and in the noblest seats
Of those blest shades, quench, and renew our heats.
There, shall the Queen of Love, and Innocence,
Beauty and Nature, banish all offence
From our close ivy twines, there I'll behold
Thy bared snow, and thy unbraided gold.
There, my enfranchised hand, on every side

[1] Elysium abode or state of the blessed after death in Greek mythology (OED Elysium).

[2] Colossus a statue or image of the human form of very large dimensions; the most famous in the ancient world being the bronze statue of Apollo at Rhodes, one of the seven wonders of the world, reputed to have stood astride the entrance to the Rhodian harbour (OED Colossus).

[3] the grim Swiss in allusion to the Swiss guardsmen at the Vatican, and other places in early modern Europe.

Shall o'er thy naked polished ivory slide.
No curtain there, though of transparent lawn,
Shall be before thy virgin-treasure drawn;
But the rich mine, to the enquiring eye
Exposed, shall ready still for mintage lie,
And we will coin young Cupids. There, a bed
Of roses, and fresh myrtles, shall be spread
Under the cooler shade of cypress groves:
Our pillows, of the down of Venus' doves,
Whereon our panting limbs we'll gently lay
In the faint respites of our active play;
That so our slumbers, may in dreams have leisure,
To tell the nimble fancy our past pleasure;
And so our souls that cannot be embraced,
Shall the embraces of our bodies taste.
Meanwhile the bubbling stream shall court the shore,
Th'enamoured chirping wood-choir shall adore
In varied tunes the deity of love;
The gentle blasts of western winds, shall move
The trembling leaves, and through their close bow's breath
Still music, whilst we rest our selves beneath
Their dancing shade; till a soft murmur, sent
From souls entranced in amorous languishment
Rouse us, and shoot into our veins fresh fire,
Till we, in their sweet ecstasy expire.
　Then, as the empty bee, that lately bore,
Into the common treasure, all her store,
Flies 'bout the painted field with nimble wing,
Deflowring the fresh virgins of the spring;
So will I rifle all the sweets, that dwell
In my delicious paradise, and swell
My bag with honey, drawn forth by the power
Of fervent kisses, from each spicy flower.
I'll seize the rose-buds in their perfumed bed,
The violet knots, like curious mazes spread
O'er all the garden, taste the ripned cherry,
The warm, firm apple, tipped with coral berry:
Then will I visit, with a wandring kiss,
The vale of lilies, and the bower of bliss:
And where the beauteous region doth divide
Into two milky ways, my lips shall slide
Down those smooth allies, wearing as I go
A tract for lovers on the printed snow;
Thence climbing o'er the swelling Appenine,
Retire into thy grove of eglantine;
Where I will all those ravished sweets distill
Through love's alembic, and with chymic skill
From the mixed mass, one sovereign balm derive,
Then bring that great elixir to thy hive.
　Now in more subtle wreathes I will entwine
My sinewy thighs, my legs and arms with thine;
Thou like a sea of milk shalt lie displayed,
Whilst I the smooth, calm ocean, invade
With such a tempest, as when Jove of old
Fell down on Danae in a storm of gold: [1]
Yet my tall pine, shall in the Cyprian strait
Ride safe at anchor, and unlade her freight: [2]
My rudder, with thy bold hand, like a tried,
And skillful pilot, thou shalt steer, and guide
My bark into love's channel, where it shall
Dance, as the bounding waves do rise or fall:
Then shall thy circling arms, embrace and clip [3]
My willing body, and thy balmy lip
Bathe me in juice of kisses, whose perfume
Like a religious incense shall consume,
And send up holy vapours, to those powers
That bless our loves, and crown our sportful hours,
That with such halcyon calmness, fix our souls
In steadfast peace, as no affright controls.
There, no rude sounds shake us with sudden starts,
No jealous ears, when we unrip our hearts
Suck our discourse in, no observing spies
This blush, that glance traduce; no envious eyes

[1] as when Jove of old / Fell down on Danae The shower of gold was one of Jove's many disguises; see OCD Perseus.

[2] the Cyprian strait Cyprus was in ancient times famous for the worship of Aphrodite or Venus.

[3] clip hug or embrace (OED clip v 1).

Watch our close meetings, nor are we betrayed
To rivals, by the bribed chamber-maid.
No wedlock bonds unwreathe our twisted loves;
We seek no midnight arbor, no dark groves
To hide our kisses, there, the hated name
Of husband, wife, lust, modest, chaste, or shame,
Are vain and empty words, whose very sound
Was never heard in the Elysian ground.
All things are lawful there, that may delight
Nature, or unrestrained appetite;
Like, and enjoy, to will, and act, is one,
We only sin when love's rites are not done.
    The Roman Lucrece there, reads the divine
Lectures of love's great master, Aretine,
And knows as well as Lais, how to move
Her pliant body in the act of love. [1]
To quench the burning ravisher, she hurls
Her limbs into a thousand winding curls,
And studies artful postures, such as be
Carved on the bark of every neighbouring tree
By learned hands, that so adorned the rind
Of those fair plants, which as they lay entwined,
Have fanned their glowing fires. The Grecian dame, [2]
That in her endless web, toiled for a name
As fruitless as her work, doth there display
Her self before the youth of Ithaca,
And th'amorous sport of gamesome nights prefer,
Before dull dreams of the lost traveller.
Daphne hath broke her bark, and that swift foot,
Which th'angry Gods had fastened with a root
To the fixed earth, doth now unfettered run,
To meet th'embraces of the youthful sun: [3]
She hangs upon him, like his Delphic lyre,
Her kisses blow the old, and breath new fire:
Full of her god, she sings inspired lays,
Sweet odes of love, such as deserve the bays,
Which she her self was. Next her, Laura lies
In Petrarch's learned arms, drying those eyes
That did in such sweet smooth-paced numbers flow,
As made the world enamoured of his woe.
These, and ten thousand beauties more, that died
Slave to the tyrant, now enlarged, deride
His cancelled laws, and for their time misspent,
Pay into love's exchequer double rent.
    Come then my Celia, we'll no more forbear
To taste our joys, struck with a panic fear,
But will depose from his imperious sway
This proud usurper and walk free, as they
With necks unyoked; nor is it just that he Should fetter your soft sex with chastity,
Which nature made unapt for abstinence;
When yet this false impostor can dispense
With humane justice, and with sacred right,
And maugre both their laws command me fight [4]
With rivals, or with emulous loves, that dare
Equal with thine, their mistress' eyes, or hair:
If thou complain of wrong, and call my sword
To carve out thy revenge, upon that word
He bids me fight and kill, or else he brands
With marks of infamy my coward hands,
And yet religion bids from blood-shed fly,
And damns me for that act. Then tell me why
This goblin Honour which the world adores,
Should make men atheists, and not women whores.

[1] The Roman Lucrece a model of chastity; but "Aretine's Lucretia sold her maidenhead a thousand times before she was twenty years old" (Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, Part III, Sect. II, Mem. I, Subs. II). Pietro Aretino was a famous Italian poet of eroticism, author of Sonnetti Lussuriosi, 1523. Jonson refers to him both in Volpone and The Alchemist; Lais a famous courtesan of Corinth.

[2] The Grecian dame Penelope, the wife of Odysseus.

[3] Daphne hath broke her bark Daphne was loved by Apollo, but she would have none of him; when he chased her, she prayed for help, and was turned into a laurel tree.

[4] maugre in spite of (OED maugre B 1).

To Ben Jonson

Upon occasion of his Ode of defiance annexed to his Play of the New Inn.

Tis true (dear Ben:) thy just chastizing hand
Hath fixed upon the sotted Age a brand
To their swol'n pride, and empty scribbling due,
It can nor judge, nor write, and yet 'tis true
Thy comic Muse from the exalted line
Touched by thy Alchemist, doth since decline
From that her zenith, and foretells a red
And blushing evening, when she goes to bed,
Yet such, as shall out-shine the glimmering light
With which all stars shall gild the following night.
Nor think it much (since all thy eaglets may Endure the sunny trial) if we say
This hath the stronger wing, or that doth shine
Tricked up in fairer plumes, since all are thine;
Who hath his flock of cackling geese compared
With thy tuned choir of swans? or else who dared
To call thy births deformed? but if thou bind
By city-custom, or by gavel-kind, [1]
In equal shares thy love on all thy race,
We may distinguish of their sex, and place,
Though one hand form them, & though one brain strike
Souls into all, they are not all alike.
Why should the follies then of this dull age
Draw from thy pen such an immodest rage
As seems to blast thy (else-immortal) bays,
When thine own tongue proclaims thy itch of praise?
Such thirst will argue drouth. No, let be hurled
Upon thy works, by the detracting world,
What malice can suggest; let the rout say;
The running sands, that (ere thou make a play)
Count the slow minutes, might a Goodwin frame [2]
To swallow when th'hast done thy ship-wreck's name.
Let them the dear expense of oil upbraid
Sucked by thy watchfull lamp, that hath betrayed
To theft the blood of martyred authors, spilt
Into thy ink, whilst thou growest pale with guilt.
Repine not at the taper's thrifty waste,
That sleeks thy terser poems, nor is haste
Praise, but excuse; and if thou overcome
A knotty writer, bring the booty home;
Nor think it theft, if the rich spoils so torn
From conquered authors, be as trophies worn.
Let others glut on the extorted praise
Of vulgar breath, trust thou to after days
Thy laboured works shall live, when Time devours
Th'abortive off-spring of their hasty hours.
Thou art not of their rank, the quarrel lies
Within thine own verge, then let this suffice,
The wiser world doth greater thee confess
Than all men else, than thy self only less.

An Elegy Upon the Death of the Dean of Pauls, Dr. John Donne [3]

Can we not force from widowed poetry,
Now thou art dead (great Donne) one elegy
To crown thy hearse? Why yet dare we not trust
Though with unkneaded dough-baked prose thy dust,
Such as the uncisored churchman from the flower
Of fading rhetoric, short lived as his hour, [4]

---

[1] gavel-kind a form of inheritance in which intestate property was divided equally among sons.

[2] Goodwin the Goodwin sands, a famous navigational hazard.

[3] Donne had died on March 31, 1631; references by other poets suggest that Carew's poem was written some time before its publication. It is interesting as literary criticism and as a basis for the discussion of Donne's work.

[4] uncisored unscissored, that is, with uncut hair.

Dry as the sand that measures it, should lay
Upon thy ashes, on the funeral day? [1]
Have we no voice, no tune? Didst thou dispense
Through all our language, both the words and sense?
'Tis a sad truth; The pulpit may her plain,
And sober Christian precepts still retain,
Doctrines it may, and wholesome uses frame,
Grave homilies, and lectures, but the flame
Of thy brave soul, (that shot such heat and light,
As burnt our earth, and made our darkness bright,
Committed holy rapes upon our will,
Did through the eye the melting heart distill;
And the deep knowledge of dark truths so teach,
As sense might judge, what fancy could not reach;)
Must be desir'd for ever. So the fire,
That fills with spirit and heat the Delphic choir,
Which kindled first by thy Promethean breath,
Glow'd here a while, lies quench't now in thy death;
The muses' garden with pedantic weeds
O'rspread, was purg'd by thee; the lazy seeds
Of servile imitation thrown away;
And fresh invention planted, thou didst pay
The debts of our penurious bankrupt age;
Licentious thefts, that make poetic rage
A mimic fury, when our souls must be
Possessed, or with Anacreon's ecstasy,
Or Pindar's, not their own; the subtle cheat
Of sly exchanges, and the juggling feat
Of two-edg'd words, or whatsoever wrong
By ours was done the Greek, or Latin tongue,
Thou hast redeemed, and opened us a mine
Of rich and pregnant fancy, drawn a line
Of masculine expression, which had good
Old Orpheus seen, or all the ancient brood
Our superstitious fools admire, and hold
Their lead more precious, than thy burnished gold,
Thou hadst been their exchequer, and no more
They each in other's dust, had raked for ore.
Thou shalt yield no precedence, but of time,
And the blind fate of language, whose tuned chime
More charms the outward sense; yet thou mayst claim
From so great disadvantage greater fame,
Since to the awe of thy imperious wit
Our stubborn language bends, made only fit
With her tough-thick-ribbed hoops to gird about
Thy giant fancy, which had proved too stout
For their soft melting phrases. As in time
They had the start, so did they cull the prime
Buds of invention many a hundred year,
And left the rifled fields, besides the fear
To touch their harvest, yet from those bare lands
Of what is purely thine, thy only hands
(And that thy smallest work) have gleaned more
Than all those times, and tongues could reap before;
But thou art gone, and thy strict laws will be
Too hard for libertines in poetry.
They will repeal the goodly exiled train
Of gods and goddesses, which in thy just reign
Were banished nobler poems, now, with these
The silenced tales o'th' Metamorphoses
Shall stuff their lines, and swell the windy page, [2]
Till verse refined by thee, in this last age
Turn ballad rhyme, or those old idols be
Adored again, with new apostasy;
Oh, pardon me, that break with untuned verse
The reverend silence that attends thy hearse,
Whose awful solemn murmurs were to thee
More than these faint lines, a loud elegy,
That did proclaim in a dumb eloquence

---

[1] the sand that measures it the sand of the hourglass.

[2] Metamorphoses Ovid's Metamorphoses had been the inspiration for a good many Elizabethan poems.

The death of all the arts, whose influence
Grown feeble, in these panting numbers lies
Gasping short winded accents, and so dies:
So doth the swiftly turning wheel not stand
In th'instant we withdraw the moving hand,
But some small time maintain a faint weak course
By virtue of the first impulsive force:
And so whilst I cast on thy funeral pile
Thy crown of bays, oh, let it crack a while,
And spit disdain, till the devouring flashes
Suck all the moisture up, then turn to ashes.
I will not draw the envy to engross
All thy perfections, or weep all our loss; [1]
Those are too numerous for an elegy,
And this too great, to be express'd by me.
Though every pen should share a distinct part,
Yet art thou them enough to tire all art;
Let others carve the rest, it shall suffice
I on thy tomb this epitaph incise.

"Here lies a King, that rul'd as he thought fit
The universal monarchy of wit;
Here lie two flamens, and both those, the best.
Apollo's first, at last, the true God's priest."

To a Lady that Desired I would Love her

Now you have freely given me leave to love,
What will you do?
Shall I your mirth, or passion move
When I begin to woo;
Will you torment, or scorn, or love me too?

Each petty beauty can disdain, and I
Spight of your hate
Without your leave can see, and die;
Dispense a nobler Fate,
'Tis easy to destroy, you may create.

Then give me leave to love, and love me too,
Not with design
To raise, as Love's cursed rebels do,
When puling poets whine,
Fame to their beauty, from their blubbr'd eyn.

Grief is a puddle, and reflects not clear
Your beauty's rays,
Joys are pure streams, your eyes appear
Sullen in sadder lays,
In cheerful numbers they shine bright with praise;

Which shall not mention to express you fair
Wounds, flames, and darts,
Storms in your brow, nets in your hair,
Suborning all your parts,
Or to betray, or torture captive hearts.

I'll make your eyes like morning suns appear,
As mild, and fair;
Your brow as crystal smooth, and clear,
And your dishevell'd hair
Shall flow like a calm region of the air.

Rich Nature's store, (which is the poet's treasure)
I'll spend, to dress
Your beauties, if your mine of pleasure
In equal thankfulness
You but unlock, so we each other bless.

A Song

Ask me no more where Jove bestows,
When June is past, the fading rose:

---

[1] the envy of other poets.

For in your beauty's orient deep,
These flowers as in their causes, sleep.

Ask me no more whither doth stray,
The golden atoms of the day:
For in pure love heaven did prepare
Those powders to enrich your hair.

Aske me no more whither doth haste,
The nightingale when May is past:
For in your sweet dividing throat,
She winters and keeps warm her note.

Ask me no more where those stars light,
That downwards fall in dead of night:
For in your eyes they sit, and there,
Fixed become as in their sphere.

Ask me no more if East or West,
The Phoenix builds her spicy nest:
For unto you at last she flies,
And in your fragrant bosom dies.

The Second Rapture

No worldling, no, tis not thy gold,
Which thou dost use but to behold
Nor fortune, honour, nor long life,
Children, or friends, nor a good wife,
That makes thee happy; these things be
But shadows of felicity.
Give me a wench about thirteen,
Already voted to the Queen
Of lust and lovers, whose soft hair,
Fann'd with the breath of gentle air
O'er spreads her shoulders like a tent,
And is her veil and ornament:
Whose tender touch, will make the blood
Wild in the aged, and the good;
Whose kisses fastened to the mouth
Of threescore years and longer slouth,
Renew the age, and whose bright eye
Obscures those lesser lights of sky:
Whose snowy breasts (if we may call
That snow, that never melts at all)
Makes Jove invent a new disguise,
In spite of Juno's jealousies:
Whose every part doth re-invite
The old decayed appetite:
And in whose sweet embraces I,
May melt myself to lust, and die.

This is true bliss, and I confess,
There is no other happiness.

The Spring

Now that the winter's gone, the earth hath lost
Her snow-white robes, and now no more the frost
Candies the grass, or casts an icy cream
Upon the silver lake, or crystal stream:
But the warm sun thaws the benumbed earth,
And makes it tender, gives a sacred birth
To the dead swallow; wakes in hollow tree
The drowsy cuckoo, and the humble-bee.
Now do a choir of chirping minstrels bring
In triumph to the world, the youthful spring.
The valleys, hills, and woods, in rich array,
Welcome the coming of the long'd for May.
Now all things smile; only my Love doth lour:
Nor hath the scalding noonday sun the power
To melt that marble ice, which still doth hold
Her heart congealed, and makes her pity cold.
The ox which lately did for shelter fly
Into the stall, doth now securely lie
In open fields; and love no more is made
By the fire side; but in the cooler shade

Amyntas now doth with his Chloris sleep[1]
Under a sycamore, and all things keep
Time with the season, only she doth carry
June in her eyes, in her heart January.

In Praise of his Mistress

You, that will a wonder know,
Go with me,
Two suns in a heaven of snow
Both burning be,
All they fire, that but eye them,
Yet the snow's unmelted by them.

Leaves of crimson tulips met
Guide the way
Where two pearly rows be set
As white as day:
When they part themselves asunder
She breathes oracles of wonder.

Hills of milk with azure mixed
Swell beneath,
Waving sweetly, yet still fixed,
While she doth breathe.
From those hills descends a valley
Where all fall, that dare to dally.

As fair pillars under-stand
Statues two,
Whiter than the silver swan
That swims in Po;
If at any time they move her
Every step begets a lover.

All this but the casket is
Which contains
Such a jewel, as the miss
Breeds endless pains;
That's her mind, and they that know it
May admire, but cannot show it.

Edward Winslow

1595 – 1655

One of the founders of the Plymouth colony in Massachusetts, Winslow was born in Droitwich, Worcester, and moved to Leiden in 1617 to join John Robinson's Separatist church. One document from this period describes him as a printer by trade; he may be the same Edward Winslow who was made a freeman of the Stationers' Company in 1634. Winslow sailed to North America in the Mayflower, arriving with the other pilgrim settlers in November 1620. His first wife died during that winter, and his marriage to the widow Mrs. Susanna White was the colony's first. Winslow sat on the ruling council of the colony for more than twenty years, and served as Governor for three one-year periods in the 1630s and 1640s. During a visit to England in the 1630s he was imprisoned briefly by Archbishop William Laud for his role in the Plymouth church. In 1646 he returned to England to defend the colony against accusations made against it by the religious radical Samuel Gorton, and spent the following nine years holding minor posts under Oliver Cromwell. In 1655 he was sent as a commissioner to the West Indies, but died on board ship near Jamaica.

One of Winslow's responsibilities in the colony was to negotiate with the local native tribe, the Wampanoag, on whose friendliness the colony depended; he succeeded in winning the friendship of their chief, Massasoit. Winslow appended the following discussion of native religion and manners to his Good News from New England (1624), a narrative of the colony's activities in its first few years. In addition to works of religious controversy, Winslow edited The Glorious Progress of the Gospel amongst the Indians in New England (1649). For another European account of native North American life and manners, see the selections from Pierre-Esprit Radisson.

Good News from New England
(excerpt)

The Religion and Customs of the Indians Near New Plymouth

A few things I thought meet to add hereunto, which I have observed amongst the Indians, both touching their religion, and sundry other customs amongst them.

And first, whereas myself and others, in former Letters (which came to the press against my will and knowledge) wrote,[1] that the Indians about us, are a people without any religion, or knowledge of any God; therein I erred, though we could then gather no better. For as they conceive of many divine powers: so of one, whom they call Kiehtan,[2] to be the principal and maker of all the rest; and to be made by none. He (they say) created the heavens, earth, sea, and all creatures contained therein. Also that he made one man and one woman; of whom they, and we, and all mankind came: but how they became so far dispersed, that know they not.

At first, they say, there was no Sachem, or King, but Kiehtan; who dwelleth above in the heavens: whither all good men go when they die, to see their friends, and have their fill of all things. This his habitation lieth far westward in the heavens, they say. Thither the bad men go also, and knock at his door: but he bids them, Quatchet, that is to say, Walk abroad, for there is no place for such; so that they wander in restless want and penury. Never man saw this Kiehtan. Only old men tell them of him: and bid them tell their children, yea, to charge them, to teach their posterities the same, and lay the like charge on them. This power they acknowledge to be good; and when they would obtain any great matter, meet together, and cry unto him: and so likewise, for plenty, victory, &c., sing, dance, feast, give thanks; and hang up garlands and other things, in memory of the same.

[1] referring to A Relation, or Journal, of the Beginning and Proceedings of the English Plantation Settled at Plymouth, in New England, commonly known as Mourt's Relation from the name of the editor, printed in London in 1622 while Winslow was still in New England. The Relation is based on letters and journals by Winslow, William Bradford, and others.

[2] The meaning of the word Kiehtan, I think hath reference to antiquity: for Chise is an old man; Kiehchise, a man that exceedeth in age [note by Winslow].

Another power they worship, whom they call Hobbamock; and to the northward of us, Hobbamoqui. This, as far as we can conceive, is the Devil; him they call upon to cure their wounds and diseases. When they are curable, he persuades them he sends the same for some conceived anger against them; but upon their calling on him, can and doth help them. But when they are mortal, and not curable in nature, then he persuades them, Kiehtan is angry, and sends them, which none can cure. Insomuch as, in that respect only, they somewhat doubt whether he be simply good, and therefore in sickness never call upon him.

This Hobbamock appears in sundry forms unto them, as in the shape of a man, a deer, a fawn, an eagle, &c., but most ordinarily a snake. He appears not to all, but the chiefest and most judicious amongst them, though all of them strive to attain to that hellish height of honour.

He appeareth most ordinary and is most conversant with three sorts of people.[1] One I confess I neither know by name nor office directly: of these they have few but esteem highly of them; and think that no weapon can kill them. Another they call by the name of Powah; and the third Pinese.

The office and duty of the Powah is to be exercised principally in calling upon the Devil, and curing diseases of the sick or wounded. The common people join with him in the exercise of invocation, but do but only assent, or as we term it, say Amen to what he saith; yet sometime break out into a short musical note with him. The Powah is eager and free in speech, fierce in countenance, and joineth many antic and laborious gestures with the same over the party diseased. If the party be wounded, he will also seem to suck the wound, but if they be curable (as they say) he toucheth it not; but a Skooke, that is the snake, or Wobsacuck, that is the eagle, sitteth on his shoulder and licks the same. This none sees but the Powah; who tells them he doth it himself. If the party be otherwise diseased, it is accounted sufficient if in any shape he but come into the house, taking it for an undoubted sign of recovery.

And as in former ages Apollo had his temple at Delphos, and Diana at Ephesus; so have I heard them call upon some as if they had their residence in some certain places, or because they appeared in those forms, in the same. In the Powah's speech he promiseth to sacrifice many skins of beasts, kettles, hatchets, beads, knives, and other the best things they have to the fiend, if he will come to help the party diseased: But whether they perform it I know not. The other practices I have seen, being necessarily called at some times to be with their sick, and have used the best arguments I could make them understand against the same. They have told me I should see the Devil at those times come to the party, but I assured myself and them of the contrary, which so proved: yea, themselves have confessed they never saw him when any of us were present. In desperate and extraordinary travail in childbirth, when the party cannot be delivered by the ordinary means, they send for this Powah, though ordinarily their travail is not so extreme as in our parts of the world, they being of a more hardy nature. For on the third day after childbirth I have seen the mother with the infant upon a small occasion in cold weather in a boat upon the sea.

[1] appeareth most ordinary appears ordinarily to.

Many sacrifices the Indians use, and in some cases kill children. It seemeth they are various in their religious worship in a little distance, and grow more and more cold in their worship to Kiehtan; saying in their memory he was much more called upon. The *Nanohigganset*s [Narragansetts] exceed in their blind devotion, and have a great spacious house wherein only some few (that are, as we may term them, priests) come. Thither at certain known times resort all their people, and offer almost all the riches they have to their gods, as kettles, skins, hatchets, beads, knives, &c., all which are cast by the priests into a great fire that they make in the midst of the house, and there consumed to ashes. To this offering every man bringeth freely, and the more he is known to bring, hath the better esteem of all men. This the other Indians about us approve of as good, and wish their Sachems would appoint the like: and because the plague hath not reigned in Nanohigganset as at other places about them,[1] they attribute to this custom there used.

The Pineses are men of great courage and wisdom, and to these also the Devil appeareth more familiarly than to others, and as we conceive maketh covenant with them to preserve them from death, by wounds with arrows, knives, hatchets, &c. or at least both themselves and especially the people think themselves to be freed from the same. And although against their battles all of them by painting disfigure themselves, yet they are known by their courage and boldness, by reason whereof one of them will chase almost a hundred men, for they account it death for whomsoever stand in their way. These are highly esteemed of all sorts of people, and are of the Sachem's council, without whom they will not war or undertake any weighty business. In war their Sachems for their more safety go in the midst of them. They are commonly men of the greatest stature and strength, and such as will endure most hardness, and yet are more discreet, courteous, and humane in their carriages than any amongst them, scorning theft, lying, and the like base dealings, and stand as much upon their reputation as any men.

And to the end they may have store of these,[2] they train up the most forward and likeliest boys from their childhood in great hardness, and make them abstain from dainty meat, observing divers orders prescribed, to the end that when they are of age the Devil may appear to them; causing to drink the juice of sentry and other bitter herbs, till they cast,[3] which they must disgorge into the platter, and drink again, and again, till at length through extraordinary oppressing of nature it will seem to be all blood, and this the boys will do with eagerness at the first, and so continue till by reason of faintness they can scarce stand on their legs, and then must go forth into the cold. Also they beat their shins with sticks, and cause them to run through bushes, stumps, and brambles, to make them hardy and acceptable to the Devil, that in time he may appear unto them.

Their Sachems cannot be all called Kings, but only some few of them, to whom the rest resort for protection, and pay homage unto them. Neither may they war without their knowledge and approbation, yet to be commanded by the greater as occasion serveth. Of this [greater] sort is Massassowat our friend, and Conanacus of Nanohigganset our supposed enemy.

Every Sachem taketh care for the widow and fatherless, also for such as are aged, and any way maimed, if their friends be dead or not able to provide for them.

[1] Nanohigganset now Rhode Island.

[2] store supply (of Pineses).

[3] sentry centaury, a plant of the gentian family with medicinal properties; cast vomit.

A Sachem will not take any to wife but such a one as is equal to him in birth; otherwise they say their seed would in time become ignoble. And though they have many other wives, yet are they no other than concubines or servants, and yield a kind of obedience to the principal, who ordereth the family, and them in it. The like their men observe also, and will adhere to the first during their lives; but put away the others at their pleasure.

This government is successive and not by choice. If the father die before the son or daughter be of age, then the child is committed to the protection and tuition of some one amongst them, who ruleth in his stead till he be of age, but when that is I know not.

Every Sachem knoweth how far the bounds and limits of his own country extendeth, and that is his own proper inheritance. Out of that if any of his men desire land to set their corn, he giveth them as much as they can use, and sets them their bounds. In this circuit whosoever hunteth, if they kill any venison, bringeth him his fee, which is the fore parts of the same, if it be killed on the land, but if in the water, then the skin thereof. The great Sachems or Kings, know their own bounds or limits of land, as well as the rest.

All travellers or strangers for the most part, lodge at the Sachem's; when they come they tell them how long they will stay, and to what place they go, during which time they receive entertainment according to their persons, but want not.

Once a year the Pineses use to provoke the people to bestow much corn on the Sachem. To that end they appoint a certain time and place near the Sachem's dwelling, where the people bring many baskets of corn, and make a great stack thereof. There, the Pineses stand ready to give thanks to the people on the Sachem's behalf, and after acquainteth the Sachem therewith, who fetcheth the same, and is no less thankful, bestowing many gifts on them.

When any are visited with sickness, their friends resort unto them for their comfort, and continue with them oft times till their death or recovery. If they die they stay a certain time to mourn for them. Night and morning they perform this duty many days after the burial in a most doleful manner, insomuch as though it be ordinary and the note musical, which they take one from another, and all together, yet it will draw tears from their eyes, and almost from ours also. But if they recover then because their sickness was chargeable, they send corn and other gifts unto them at a certain appointed time, whereat they feast and dance, which they call Commoco.

When they bury the dead, they sew up the corpse in a mat and so put it in the earth. If the party be a Sachem they cover him with many curious mats, and bury all his riches with him, and inclose the grave with a pale.[1] If it be a child the father will also put his own most special jewels and ornaments in the earth with it, also will cut his hair and disfigure himself very much in token of sorrow. If it be the man or woman of the house, they will pull down the mats and leave the frame standing, and bury them in or near the same, and either remove their dwelling, or give over house-keeping.

The men employ themselves wholly in hunting, and other exercises of the bow, except at some times they take some pains in fishing.

The women live a most slavish life. They carry all their burdens, set and dress their corn, gather it in, seek out for much of their food, beat and make ready the corn to eat, and have all household care lying upon them.

The younger sort reverence the elder; and do all mean offices whilst they are together, although they be strangers. Boys and girls may not wear their hair like men and women, but are distinguished thereby.

[1] pale palisade, fence (OED pale sb 1, 2).

A man is not accounted a man till he do some notable act, or show forth such courage and resolution as becometh his place. The men take much tobacco, but for boys so to do they account it odious.

All their names are significant and variable; for when they come to the state of men and women, they alter them according to their deeds and dispositions.

When a maid is taken in marriage she first cutteth her hair, and after weareth a covering on her head till her hair be grown out. The women are diversely disposed, some as modest as they will scarce talk one with another in the company of men, being very chaste also: yet other some light, lascivious and wanton.

If a woman have a bad husband, or cannot affect him,[1] and there be war or opposition between that and any other people, she will run away from him to the contrary party and there live, where they never come unwelcome: for where are most women, there is greatest plenty.

When a woman hath her monthly terms she separateth her self from all other company, and liveth certain days in a house alone: after which she washeth her self and all that she hath touched or used, and is again received to her husband's bed or family.

For adultery the husband will beat his wife and put her away, if he please. Some common strumpets there are as well as in other places, but they are such as either never married, or widows, or put away for adultery: for no man will keep such a one to wife.

In matters of unjust and dishonest dealing, the Sachem examineth and punisheth the same. In cases of thefts, for the first offence he is disgracefully rebuked, for the second beaten by the Sachem with a cudgel on the naked back, for the third he is beaten with many strokes, and hath his nose slit upward, that thereby all men may both know and shun him. If any man kill another, he must likewise for the same. The Sachem not only passeth the sentence upon malefactors, but executeth the same with his own hands, if the party be then present; if not, sendeth his own knife, in case of death, in the hands of others to perform the same. But if the offender be to receive other punishment, he will not receive the same but from the Sachem himself, before whom being naked he kneeleth, and will not offer to run away though he beat him never so much, it being a greater disparagement for a man to cry during the time of his correction, than is his offence and punishment.

As for their apparel they wear breeches and stockings in one like some Irish, which is made of deer skins, and have shoes of the same leather. They wear also a deer skin loose about them like a cloak, which they will turn to the weather side. In this habit they travel, but when they are at home or come to their journey's end, presently they pull off their breeches, stockings, and shoes, wring out the water if they be wet, and dry them, and rub or chafe the same. Though these be off, yet have they another small garment that covereth their secrets. The men wear also when they go abroad in cold weather an otter or fox skin on their right arm, but only their bracer on the left.[2] Women and all of that sex wear strings about their legs, which the men never do.

The people are very ingenious and observative. They keep account of time by the moon, and winters or summers; they know divers of the stars by name, in particular, they know the North Star and call it maske, which is to say "the bear." Also they have many names for the winds. They will guess very well at the wind and weather beforehand, by observations in the heavens. They report also, that some of them can cause the wind to blow in what part they list, can raise storms and tempests which they usually do when they intend the death or destruction of other people, that by reason of the unseasonable weather they may take advantage of their enemies in their houses. At such times they perform their greatest exploits, and in such seasons when they are at enmity with any, they keep more careful watch than at other times.

As for the language it is very copious, large, and difficult. As yet, we cannot attain to any great measure thereof; but can understand them, and explain ourselves to their understanding, by the help of those that daily converse with us. And though there be difference in a hundred miles distance of place, both in language and manners, yet not so much but that they very well understand each other. And thus much of their lives and manners.

Instead of records and chronicles, they take this course. Where any remarkable act is done, in memory of it, either in the place, or by some pathway near adjoining, they make a round hole in the ground about a foot deep, and as much over, which when others passing by behold, they enquire the cause and occasion of the same, which being once known, they are careful to acquaint all men, as occasion serveth therewith. And lest such holes should be filled, or grown up by an accident, as men pass by they will oft renew the same. By which means many things of great antiquity are fresh in memory. So that as a man travelleth, if he can understand his guide, his journey will be the less tedious, by reason of the many historical discourses will be related to him.

James Shirley

1596 – 1666

James Shirley was born in St. Mary Woolchurch, London. He was educated at Merchant Taylor's School from 1608–1612 and then spent a few years at St. John's College, Oxford, before proceeding to Catharine Hall, Cambridge, where he received his B.A. He published his earliest known poem, Eccho, or the Unfortunate Lovers, in 1618. After taking orders Shirley moved to St. Albans in Hertfordshire where, from 1623–5, he held the mastership at the grammar school. In 1618 Shirley married Elizabeth Gilmet, by whom he had several children. Sometime during this period, although exactly when is unclear, Shirley converted to Catholicism. Around 1625, the year of the accession of Charles I, Shirley left the scholarly life and went to London where he became a playwright. His first play, Love Tricks, with Complements, was licensed in 1625–6, and was the first of many successful plays. Shirley became a respected dramatist, and won the favour of a variety of persons of rank. In 1636, the London theatres were closed because of plague, and Shirley went to Ireland, where he remained for four years, writing for the Irish theatre. Upon his return to London in 1640, he became the chief playwright for the King's Men at Blackfriars. In September 1642, as civil war was breaking out, Shirley left London and joined his patron, the Earl of Newcastle, in the wars. In 1644, after the Parliamentary victory at the Battle of Marston Moor, Shirley returned to London, where a number of his friends helped him to become re-established. In 1646 he published a volume of verse and also composed commendatory verses for the works of various other writers. Although he resumed school teaching, primarily at Whitefriars, he continued to publish both poems and plays. His final publications were in 1659. In 1666, James Shirley and his second wife, Frances, were driven from their home by the great fire of London. Both died shortly thereafter.

"The glories of our blood and state"

The glories of our blood and state,
Are shadows, not substantial things,
There is no armour against fate,
Death lays his icy hand on kings,
Scepter and crown,
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made,
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill, [1]
But their strong nerves at last must yield,
They tame but one another still;
Early or late,
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath,
When they pale captives creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds,
Upon Death's purple altar now,
See where the victor-victim bleeds,
Your heads must come,
To the cold tomb,
Only the actions of the just
Smell sweet, and blossom in their dust.

Rachel Speght

ca. 1597 – post 1621

Rachel Speght, the poet and polemical pamphleteer, was the daughter of James Speght, a Calvinist minister and rector of the London churches of St. Mary Magdalene, Milk Street (1592–1637) and St. Clement, Eastcheap (1611–1637). Her mother's identity is unknown. James Speght wrote A brief demonstration, who have, and of the certainty of their salvation, that have the Spirit of Christ (1613), and an epiphany sermon, The Day-spring of Comfort (1615). Speght's writings reveal that she had received some instruction in rhetoric and logic, a thorough knowledge of Scripture, a facility in Latin, and a familiarity with a wide range of authoritative classical and Christian texts.

In her first publication, A Muzzle for Melastomus, the Cynical Baiter of, and foul mouthed Barker against Eve's Sex (1617), Speght defends the nature and worth of women in response to Joseph Swetnam's notorious anti-feminist pamphlet, the Arraignment of Lewd, Idle, Froward and Unconstant Women (1615).[1] Of the three direct refutations of Swetnam's treatise, Speght's was the first and the only one published under the author's own name.[2] In 1621, the year of her marriage to William Procter, Speght published Mortality's Memorandum with a Dream Prefixed. The title poem of Mortality's Memorandum is an extended meditation on death, while the prefixed dream is an allegorical dream vision. In "The Dream" Speght allegorizes the female struggle to acquire knowledge, progressing from ignorance to enlightenment. "The Dream" may be read as a counter-myth to the Edenic tragedy in which female knowledge is inextricably bound up with sin and death. Nothing is known of Speght's life after her marriage.

A Muzzle for Melastomus

Not unto the veriest Idiot that ever set Pen to Paper,
but to the Cynical Baiter of Women,
or metamorphosed Misogunes, Joseph Swetnam. [3]

From standing water, which soon putrifies, can no good fish be expected; for it produceth no other creatures but those that are venomous or noisome, as snakes, adders, and such like.[4] Semblably, no better stream can we look, should issue from your idle corrupt brain, than that whereto the rough of your fury (to use your own words) hath moved you to open the sluice.[5] In which excrement of your roving cogitations you have used such irregularities touching concordance, and observed so disordered a method, as I doubt not to tell you, that a very accidence scholar would have quite put you down in both.[6] You appear herein not unlike that painter, who seriously endeavouring to portray Cupid's bow, forgot the string: for you being greedy to botch up your mingle mangle invective against women, have not therein observed, in many places, so much as a grammar sense.[1] But the emptiest barrel makes the loudest sound; and so we will account of you.

[1] Melastomus "black mouth"; Swetnam Swetnam published under the pseudonym of Thomas Tel-troth.

[2] The two other responses to Swetnam's defamation of women were Ester Sowernam's Esther Hath Hang'd Haman (1617) and Constantia Munda's The Worming of a Mad Dog: or, A Sop For Cerberus the Jailer of Hell (1617). Later, an anonymous play was published, Swetnam the Woman-hater Arraigned by Women (1620).

[3] Misogunes a woman-hater (i.e. misogynist) (OED misogyne).

[4] noisome injurious (OED noisome a 1).

[5] Semblably similarly (OED semblably adv 1); rough of…own words Swetnam wrote, "I being in a great choler against some women, I mean more than one; And so in the rough of my fury, taking my pen in hand…." (sig. A2); sluice dam (OED sluice sb. 1b).

Many propositions have you framed, which (as you think) make much against women, but if one would make a logical assumption, the conclusion would be flat against your own sex.[2] Your dealing wants so much discretion, that I doubt whether to bestow so good a name as the dunce upon you: but minority bids me keep within my bounds;[3] and therefore I only say unto you, that your corrupt heart and railing tongue, hath made you a fit scribe for the devil.

In that you have termed your virulent foam, the Bear-baiting of women, you have plainly displayed your own disposition to be cynical, in that there appears no other dog or bull, to bait them, but yourself.[4] Good had it been for you to have put on that muzzle, which Saint James would have all Christians to wear; Speak not evil one of another: and then had you not seemed so like the serpent Porphyrus, as now you do; which, though full of deadly poison, yet being toothless, hurteth none so much as himself.[5] For you having gone beyond the limits not of humanity alone, but of Christianity, have done greater harm unto your own soul, than unto women, as may plainly appear. First, in dishonouring of God by palpable blasphemy, wresting and perverting every place of Scripture, that you have alleged; which by the testimony of Saint Peter, is to the destruction of them that so do.[6] Secondly, it appears by your disparaging of, and opprobrious speeches against, that excellent work of God's hands, which in his great love he perfected for the comfort of man. Thirdly, and lastly, by this your hodge-podge of heathenish sentences, similes, and examples, you have set forth yourself in your right colours, unto the view of the world: and I doubt not but the judicious will account of you according to your demerit: As for the vulgar sort, which have no more learning than you have showed in your book, it is likely they will applaud you for your pains.[7]

Of Woman's Excellency, with the causes of her creation, and of the sympathy which ought to be in man and wife each toward other.

The work of creation being finished, this approbation thereof was given by God himself, that All was very good:[8] If all, then woman, who, excepting man, is the most excellent creature under the canopy of heaven. But if it be objected by any:

First, that woman, though created good, yet by giving ear to Satan's temptations, brought death and misery upon all her posterity.

Secondly, that Adam was not deceived, but that the woman was deceived, and was in the transgression.[9]

Thirdly, that Saint Paul saith, It were good for a man not to touch a woman.[10]

Fourthly, and lastly, that of Solomon, who seems to speak against all of our sex; I have found

one man of a thousand, but a woman among them all have I not found, whereof in its due place.[1]

To the first of these objections I answer; that Satan first assailed the woman, because where the hedge is lowest, most easy it is to get over, and she being the weaker vessel was with more facility to be seduced: like as a crystal glass sooner receives a crack than a strong stone pot.[2] Yet we shall find the offence of Adam and Eve almost to parallel: For as an ambitious desire of being made like unto God, was the motive which caused her to eat, so likewise was it his; as may plainly appear by that Ironia, Behold, man is become as one of us:[3] Not that he was so indeed; but hereby his desire to attain a greater perfection than God had given him, was reproved. Woman sinned, it is true, by her infidelity in not believing the Word of God, but giving credit to Satan's fair promises, that she should not die; but so did the man too:[4] And if Adam had not approved of that deed which Eve had done, and been willing to tread the steps which she had gone, he being her head would have reproved her, and have made the commandment a bit to restrain him from breaking his Maker's injunction: For if a man burn his hand in the fire, the bellows that blowed the fire are not to be blamed, but himself rather, for not being careful to avoid the danger: Yet if the bellows had not blowed, the fire had not burnt; no more is woman simply to be condemned for man's transgression: for by the free will, which before his fall he enjoyed, he might have avoided, and been free from being burnt, or singed with that fire which was kindled by Satan, and blown by Eve. It therefore served not his turn a whit, afterwards to say, The woman which thou gavest me, gave me of the tree, and I did eat:[5] For a penalty was inflicted upon him, as well as on the woman, the punishment of her transgression being particular to her own sex, and to none but the female kind:[6] but for the sin of man the whole earth was cursed.[7] And he being better able, than the woman, to have resisted temptation, because the stronger vessel, was first called to account,[8] to show, that to whom much is given, of them much is required; and that he who was the sovereign of all creatures visible, should have yielded greatest obedience to God.

To the second objection I answer, that the Apostle doth not hereby exempt man from sin, but only giveth to understand, that the woman was the primary transgressor; and not the man, but that man was not at all deceived, was far from his meaning: for he afterward expressly saith, that as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive.[9]

For the third objection, It is good for a man not to touch a woman: the Apostle makes it not a positive prohibition, but speaks it only because of the Corinthians' present necessity, who were then persecuted by the enemies of the Church, for which cause, and no other, he saith, Art thou loosed from a wife? Seek not a wife:[10] meaning whilst the time of these perturbations should continue in their heat; but if thou art bound, seek not to be loosed: if thou marriest,

[7] but for...was cursed "And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree... cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life" (Genesis 3:17).

thou sinnest not, only increasest thy care: for the married careth for the things of this world, and I wish that you were without care, that ye might cleave fast unto the Lord without separation:

. . . .

The fourth and last objection, is that of Solomon, I have found one man among a thousand, but a woman among them all have I not found: for answer of which, if we look into the story of his life, we shall find therein a commentary upon this enigmatical sentence included: for it is there said, that Solomon had seven hundred wives, and three hundred concubines, which number connexed make one thousand.[1] These women turning his heart away from being perfect with the Lord his God, sufficient cause had he to say, that among the said thousand women found he not one upright. He saith not, that among a thousand women never any man found one worthy of commendation, but speaks in the first person singularly, I have not found, meaning in his own experience: for this assertion is to be holden a part of the confession of his former follies, and no otherwise, his repentance being the intended drift of Ecclesiastes.

The other end for which woman was made, was to be a companion and helper for man; and if she must be an helper, and but an helper, then are those husbands to be blamed, which lay the whole burden of domestical affairs and maintenance on the shoulders of their wives. For, as yoke-fellows they are to sustain part of each other's cares, griefs, and calamities: But as if two oxen be put in one yoke, the one being bigger than the other, the greater bears most weight; so the husband being the stronger vessel is to bear a greater burden than his wife; and therefore, the Lord said to Adam, In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread, till thou return to the dust. And Saint Paul saith, That he that provideth not for his household is worse than an infidel. Nature hath taught senseless creatures to help one another; as the male pigeon, when his hen is weary with sitting on her eggs, and comes off from them, supplies her place, that in her absence they may receive no harm, until such time as she is fully refreshed.... Seeing then that these unreasonable creatures, by the instinct of nature, bear such affection each to other, that without any grudge, they willingly, according to their kind, help one another, I may reason à minore ad maius, that much more should man and woman, which are reasonable creatures, be helpers each to other in all things lawful, they having the Law of God to guide them, his Word to be a lantern unto their feet, and a light unto their paths, by which they are excited to a far more mutual participation of each other's burden, than other creatures.[2] So that neither the wife may say to her husband, nor the husband unto his wife, I have no need of thee, no more than the members of the body may so say each to other, between whom there is such a sympathy, that if one member suffer, all suffer with it....[3] Marriage is a merry-age, and this world's Paradise, where there is mutual love.

The Dream

from Mortality's Memorandum, with a Dream Prefixed

When splendent Sol, which riseth in the East,
Returning thence took harbour in the West;
When Phoebe laid her head in Titan's lap,
And creatures sensitive made haste to rest;[4]

[4] Phoebe... Titan's lap Phoebe is emended from Phoebus. Titan, an older god who existed before the Olympians, is often used in poetry for Hyperion, the Sun, and Phoebe for Artemis, the Moon; hence, the

When sky which erst looked like to azure blue,
Left colour bright, and put on sable hue.

Then did Morpheus close my drowsy eyes,
And stood as porter at my senses' door,
Diurnal cares excluding from my mind;
Including rest, (the salve for labours sore.) [1]
Night's greatest part in quiet sleep I spent,
But nothing in this world is permanent.

For ere Aurora spread her glittering beams,
Or did with robes of light herself invest,
My mental quiet sleep did interdict,
By entertaining a nocturnal guest. [2]
A dream which did my mind and sense possess,
With more than I by pen can well express.

At the appointment of supernal power,
By instrumental means me thought I came
Into a place most pleasant to the eye,
Which for the beauty some did Cosmus name, [3]
Where stranger-like on everything I gazed,
But wanting wisdom was as one amazed. [4]

Upon a sudden, as I gazing stood,
Thought came to me, and asked me of my state,
Inquiring what I was, and what I would,
And why I seemed as one disconsolate:
To whose demand, I thus again replied,
I, as a stranger in this place abide.

The haven of my voyage is remote,
I have not yet attained my journey's end;
Yet know I not, nor can I give a guess,
How short a time I in this place shall spend.
For that high power, which sent me to this place,
Doth only know the period of my race. [5]

The reason of my sadness at this time,
Is 'cause I feel myself not very well,
Unto you I shall much obliged be,
If for my grief a remedy you'll tell.
Quoth she, if you your malady will show,
My best advice I'll willingly bestow.

My grief, quoth I, is called Ignorance,
Which makes me differ little from a brute:
For animals are led by nature's lore,
Their seeming science is but custom's fruit; [6]
When they are hurt they have a sense of pain;
But want the sense to cure themselves again.

And ever since this grief did me oppress,
Instinct of nature is my chiefest guide;
I feel disease, yet know not what I ail,
I find a sore, but can no salve provide;
I hungry am, yet cannot seek for food;
Because I know not what is bad or good.

And sometimes when I seek the golden mean,
My weakness makes me fail of mine intent,[7]
That suddenly I fall into extremes,
Nor can I see a mischief to prevent;[8]
But feel the pain when I the peril find,
Because my malady doth make me blind.

What is without the compass of my brain, [1]
My sickness makes me say it cannot be;
What I conceive not, cannot come to pass;
Because for it I can no reason see.
I measure all men's feet by mine own shoe,
And count all well, which I appoint or do.

The pestilent effects of my disease
Exceed report, their number is so great;
The evils, which through it I do incur,
Are more than I am able to repeat.
Wherefore, good Thought, I sue to thee again,
To tell me how my cure I may obtain.

Quoth she, I wish I could prescribe your help;
Your state I pity much, and do bewail;
But for my part, though I am much employed,
Yet in my judgment I do often fail.
And therefore I'll commend unto your trial
Experience, of whom take no denial.

For she can best direct you, what is meet
To work your cure, and satisfy your mind;
I thanked her for her love, and took my leave,
Demanding where I might Experience find.
She told me if I did abroad inquire,
'Twas likely Age could answer my desire.

I sought, I found, she asked me what I would;
Quoth I, your best direction I implore:
For I am troubled with an irksome grief,
Which when I named, quoth she declare no more:
For I can tell as much, as you can say,
And for your cure I'll help you what I may.

The only medicine for your malady,
By which, and nothing else your help is wrought,
Is Knowledge, of the which there is two sorts,
The one is good, the other bad and nought;
The former sort by labour is attained,
The latter may without much toil be gained.

But 'tis the good, which must effect your cure,
I prayed her then, that she would further show,
Where I might have it, that I will, quoth she,
In Erudition's garden it does grow:
And in compassion of your woeful case,
Industry shall conduct you to the place.

Dissuasion hearing her assign my help,
(And seeing that consent I did detect)
Did many remoraes to me propose, [2]
As dullness, and my memory's defect;
The difficulty of attaining lore,
My time, and sex, with many others more.

Which when I heard, my mind was much perplexed,
And as a horse new come into the field,
Who with a Harquebus at first doth start, [3]
So did this shot make me recoil and yield.
But of my fear when some did notice take,
In my behalf, they this reply did make.

First quoth Desire, Dissuasion, hold thy peace,
These oppositions come not from above:
Quoth Truth, they cannot spring from reason's root,
And therefore now thou shalt no victor prove.
No, quoth Industry, be assured [of] this,
Her friends shall make thee of thy purpose miss.

For with my sickle I will cut away
All obstacles, that in her way can grow,
And by the issue of her own attempt,
I'll make thee labor omnia vincet know. [4]

Quoth Truth, and sith her sex thou do'st object, [1]
Thy folly I by reason will detect.

Both man and woman of three parts consist,
Which Paul doth body, soul, and spirit call: [2]
And from the soul three faculties arise,
The mind, the will, the power; then wherefore shall
A woman have her intellect in vain,
Or not endeavour knowledge to attain.

The talent, God doth give, must be employed, [3]
His own with vantage he must have again: [4]
All parts and faculties were made for use; [5]
The God of Knowledge nothing gave in vain.
'Twas Mary's choice our Saviour did approve,
Because that she the better part did love. [6]

Cleobulina, and Demophila,
With Telesilla, as historians tell,
(Whose fame doth live, though they have long been dead)
Did all of them in poetry excel.
A Roman matron that Cornelia hight
An eloquent and learned style did write. [7]
Hypatia in astronomy had skill,
Aspatia was in rhetoric so expert,
As that Duke Pericles of her did learn;
Areta did devote herself to art:
And by consent (which shows she was no fool)
She did succeed her father in his school. [8]

And many others here I could produce,
Who were in Science counted excellent;
But these examples which I have rehearsed,
To show thy error are sufficient.
Thus having said, she turned her speech to me,
That in my purpose I might constant be.

My friend, quoth she, regard not vulgar talk;
For dung-hill cocks at precious stones will spurn,
And swine-like natures prize nor crystal streams,
Contemned mire, and mud will serve their turn. [9]
Good purpose seldom oppositions want:
But constant minds Dissuasion cannot daunt.

Shall every blast disturb the sailor's peace?
Or boughs and bushes travellers affright?
True valour doth not start at every noise;
Small combats must instruct for greater fight.
Disdain to be with every dart dismayed;
'Tis childish to be suddenly afraid.

[7] Cleobulina...did write Cleobuline (sixth century B.C.E.) and her father Cleobulus of Lindos co-authored a collection of riddles. Damophyle (seventh century B.C.E.), the lyric poet of Pamphilia, composed erotic poems and hymns to Artemis. Telesilla (fifth century B.C.E.), the Argive poetess, wrote hymns to Apollo and Artemis. She was renowned for arming the women of Argos against Spartan invaders. Cornelia (second century C.E.), the daughter of P. Scipio Africanus and mother of the two Gracchi tribunes, was a Roman letter writer whose epistles, admired by Cicero, were accounted models of style; hight called (OED hight v^1 B.II.5).

If thou didst know the pleasure of the place,
Where Knowledge grows, and where thou mayst it gain;
Or rather knew the virtue of the plant
Thou would'st not grudge at any cost, or pain,
Thou canst bestow, to purchase for thy cure
This plant, by which of help thou shalt be sure.

Let not Dissuasion alter thy intent;
'Tis sin to nip good motions in the head; [1]
Take courage, and be constant in thy course,
Though irksome be the path, which thou must tread.
Sick folks drink bitter medicines to be well,
And to enjoy the nut men crack the shell.

When Truth had ended what she meant to say,
Desire did move me to obey her will,
Whereto consenting I did soon proceed,
Her counsel, and my purpose to fulfill;
And by the help of Industry my friend,
I quickly did attain my journey's end.

Where being come, Instruction's pleasant air
Refreshed my senses, which were almost dead,
And fragrant flowers of sage and fruitful plants,
Did send sweet savours up into my head;
And taste of science appetite did move,
To augment Theory of things above.

There did the harmony of those sweet birds,
(Which higher soar with Contemplation's wings,
Then barely with a superficial view,
Denote the value of created things.)
Yield such delight as made me to implore,
That I might reap this pleasure more and more.

And as I walked wand'ring with Desire,
To gather that, for which I thither came;
(Which by the help of Industry I found)
I met my old acquaintance, Truth by name;
Whom I requested briefly to declare,
The virtue of that plant I found so rare.

Quoth she, by it God's image man doth bear, [2]
Without it he is but a human shape,
Worse than the Devil; for he knoweth much;
Without it who can any ill escape?
By virtue of it evils are withstood;
The mind without it is not counted good. [3]

Who wanteth Knowledge is a scripture fool, [4]
Against the ignorant the prophets pray;
And Hosea threatens judgment unto those,
Whom want of Knowledge made to run astray. [5]
Without it thou no practic good canst show,
More than by hap, as blind men hit a crow. [6]

True Knowledge is the window of the soul,
Through which her objects she doth speculate; [7]
It is the mother of faith, hope, and love;
Without it who can virtue estimate?
By it, in grace thou shalt desire to grow;
'Tis life eternal God and Christ to know. [8]

Great Alexander made so great account,
Of Knowledge, that he oftentimes would say,
That he to Aristotle was more bound
For Knowledge, upon which Death could not prey,

[8] 'Tis life.... Christ to know "John 17:3" (original marginalia).

Than to his father Philip for his life,
Which was uncertain, irksome, full of strife. [1]

This true report put edge unto Desire,
Who did incite me to increase my store,
And told me 'twas a lawful avarice,
To covet Knowledge daily more and more.
This counsel I did willingly obey,
Till some occurrence called me away.

And made me rest content with that I had,
Which was but little, as effect does show;
And quenched hope for gaining any more,
For I my time must other-ways bestow.
I therefore to that place returned again,
From whence I came, and where I must remain.

But by the way I saw a full fed beast,
Which roared like some monster, or a devil, [2]
And on Eve's sex he foamed filthy froth,
As if that he had had the falling evil;[3]
To whom I went to free them from mishaps,
And with a muzzle sought to bind his chaps. [4]

But, as it seems, my mood out-run my might,
Which when a self-conceited creature saw,
She passed her censure on my weak exploit,
And gave the beast a harder bone to gnaw;
Haman she hangs, 'tis past he cannot shun it;
For Ester in the Pretertense hath done it. [5]

And yet her enterprise had some defect,
The monster surely was not hanged quite:
For as the child of Prudence did conceive,
His throat not stopped, he still had power to bite.
She therefore gave to Cerberus a sop,
Which is of force his beastly breath to stop. [6]

But yet if he do swallow down that bit,
She other-ways hath bound him to the peace;
And like an artist takes away the cause,
That the effect by consequence may cease.
This frantic dog, whose rage did women wrong,
Hath Constance wormed to make him hold his tongue. [7]

Thus leaving them I passed on my way,
But ere that I had little further gone,
I saw a fierce insatiable foe,
Depopulating countries, sparing none;
Without respect of age, sex, or degree,
It did devour, and could not daunted be.

Some feared this foe, some loved it as a friend;
For though none could the force of it withstand,

[1] Great Alexander…of strife Alexander the Great of Macedonia (356–323 B.C.E.), son of Philip II, was tutored by Aristotle. While his political inheritance led, in the final year of his life, to misgovernment and disloyalty, Aristotle's legacy to Alexander, according to Plutarch, was a death-defying knowledge.

[5] Ester in the Pretertense "Ester Sowernam" (punning on "Swe[e]tnam"), author of Ester hath hang'd Haman (1617), wrote that though Speght claimed "to defend women" in A Muzzle, she did "rather charge and condemn women." Speght uses "pretertense" (the Latin past tense) to expose Sowernam's self-conceit in claiming to have killed off Swetnam. See Esther 3–7 for the biblical story of Esther and Haman.

[6] For as…to stop Constantia Munda's The Worming of a Mad Dog; Or, a Sop for Cerberus the Jailor of Hell (1617) is dedicated to her mother, "Lady Prudentia Munda." Cerberus, the three-headed dog who guarded Hades, prevented Aeneas's entry until the Sibyl threw the dog a drugged morsel which put him to sleep (Aeneid, Book 6).

[7] wormed extracted the "worm" or lytta (a small tendon) from the dog's tongue to safeguard against madness (OED worm v II.3).

Yet some by it were sent to Tophet's flames, [1]
But others led to heavenly Canaan land. [2]
On some it seized with a gentle power,
And others furiously it did devour.

The name of this impartial foe was Death
Whose rigour whil'st I furiously did view,
Upon a sudden, ere I was aware;
With piercing dart my mother dear it slew;
Which when I saw it made me so to weep,
That tears and sobs did rouse me from my sleep.

But, when I waked, I found my dream was true;
For Death had ta'en my mother's breath away,
Though of her life it could not her bereave,
Sith she in glory lives with Christ for aye; [3]
Which makes me glad, and thankful for her bliss,
Though still bewail her absence, whom I miss.

A sudden sorrow piercing to the quick,
Speedy encounters fortitude doth try;
Unarmed men receive the deepest wound,
Expected perils time doth lenify; [4]
Her sudden loss hath cut my feeble heart,
So deep, that daily I endure the smart.

The root is killed, how can the boughs but fade?
But sith that Death this cruel deed hath done,
I'll blaze the nature of this mortal foe, [5]
And show how it to tyrannize begun.
The sequel then with judgment view aright,[6]
The profit may and will the pains requite.

Thomas Edwards

1599 – 1647

As a preacher at Cambridge, Edwards earned the nickname "young Luther," and his Presbyterianism kept him in trouble with church authorities throughout the 1630s. But the civil war enabled him to switch from persecuted to persecutor. With the rise to power of the Presbyterian party in the early 1640s, Edwards emerged as one of their most tireless supporters. The threat posed by the growing popularity of Independency in mid-decade prompted Edwards to publish virulent attacks on the rapidly evolving beliefs of religious radicals. The most notorious of his books was Gangraena: or a Catalogue and Discovery of Many of the Errours, Heresies, Blasphemies, and Pernicious Practices of the Sectaries of this Time, which appeared in three substantial parts in 1646 and attracted numerous responses, including a remarkable series of pamphlets by William Walwyn which defended the ideal of religious toleration. Milton refers to "shallow Edwards" in his sonnet "On the New Forcers of Conscience under the Long Parliament." By 1647, the Independents were in the ascendant, and the resentment caused by Edwards' abuse led him to retire to Holland, where he soon died of the ague.

Edwards began the first part of Gangraena with the following catalogue of errors and heresies. While he goes on to name names and provide particulars, he here summarizes the arguments and practices that he believed were leading the country to ruin: toleration, pacifism, women preachers, the priesthood of all believers, denial of predestination, denial of the need for a state church, denial of the need for set forms of worship, and denial of the authority of the magistrate in matters of religion. For works by some of the writers Edwards was arguing against, see the selections by Richard Overton, John Milton, William Walwyn, and Lawrence Clarkson.

Gangraena
(excerpt)

The Catalogue of the Errors, Heresies, Blasphemies, is as follows

Of the Scriptures

1. That the Scriptures cannot be said to be the word of God; there is no word but Christ, the Scriptures are a dead letter, and no more to be credited than the writings of men, not divine, but human invention.

2. That the Scripture, whether a true manuscript or no, whether Hebrew, Greek or English, is but human, and so not able to discover a divine God. Then where is your command to make that your rule or discipline, that cannot reveal you God, nor give you power to walk with God? so that Christ letting out himself as he is in himself, ought to be a Christian's rule in obedience to himself.[1]

3. That the Scriptures are insufficient and uncertain, there is no certainty to build any doctrine upon them, they are not an infallible foundation of faith.

4. As the condition of Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, &c. was, that they did walk with God by the teaching of God, so is ours: that is not to limit Christ to Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, David, John and the Disciples. As they were not to tie God to any things before them recorded, but each of them had a new record; so are not we to limit God in the general records of those paths, but wait upon him in the enlargement of the Gospel what he will record you; and far be it from me to conclude either in doctrine or practice, that half of his glory is revealed as yet: As that I should enclose Christ in such a small compass as we have recorded: though I rejoice to understand it in the searching thereof, yet pressing toward the mark for the price of the high calling of God, waiting what he will record in my heart, and in that measure worship him in spirit and truth from the teaching of the spirit.

[1] Here and in number 4 below, the second sentence appears to be Edwards' rebuttal of the opinion in question.

5. That the holy writings and sayings of Moses and the Prophets, of Christ and his Apostles, and the proper names, persons and things contained therein are allegories, and these allegories are the mystery and spiritual meaning of them.

6. That the penmen of Scripture, every one of them, writ as themselves conceived, they were the actions of their own spirit; and for what is said they were moved by the holy Ghost, that was no other spirit than that which moved them to write and speak other things, for in him we live and move and have our being.

7. That the Scriptures of the Old Testament do not concern nor bind Christians now under the New Testament: so that when places of Scripture are brought out of the Old Testament to prove points, many sectaries make slight of them, and say, Give us a text out of the New, we are ignorant of the Old; and hereupon some of them do not bind the Old Testament with the New, nor read it.

8. That right reason is the rule of faith, and that we are to believe the Scriptures, and the doctrine of the Trinity, Incarnation, Resurrection, so far as we see them agreeable to reason, and no farther.

9. That the New Testament, nor no place of Scripture in it, binds any further than the spirit for present reveals to us that such a place is the Word of God.

10. To read Scripture in English to a mixed congregation without present expounding it, is dangerous, and worse than to read it in Latin; for in Latin, as it doth no good, so it doth no harm.

OF GOD

11. That God hath a hand in, and is the author of, the sinfulness of his people; that he is the author not of those actions alone, in and with which sin is, but of the very pravity, ataxy, anomie, irregularity and sinfulness itself which is in them.[1]

12. That all lies come forth from out of the mouth of God.

13. 'Tis the will and command of God, that since the coming of his Son the Lord Jesus, a permission of the most Paganish, Jewish, Turkish, or Antichristian consciences and worships be granted to all men in all nations and countries: and they are only to be fought against with the sword of God's spirit, the word of God; and for the Parliament to use any civil coercive means to compel men of different judgment, is one of the greatest sins that can be named, 'tis committing a greater rape, than if they had forced or ravished the bodies of all the women in the world. Yea, if it be men's consciences, the Magistrate may not punish for blasphemies, nor for denying the Scriptures, nor for denying there is a God.

14. That no man was cast into Hell for any sin, but only because God would have it so.

15. That man had life before God breathed into him, and that which God breathed into him was part of the divine essence, and shall return into God again.

16. That we should think of ourselves no better than was meet, for God loves the creatures that creep upon the ground as well as the best Saints;[2] and there's no distance between the flesh of a man, and the flesh of a toad.

---

[1] pravity depravity, moral corruption (OED); ataxy want of order or discipline (OED); anomie disregard of divine law (OED anomy).

[2] Saints not traditional saints, but the living Saints: another term for the Godly, the religious Independents.

17. That the prince of the air that rules in the children of disobedience is God;[1] and that there is no other spirit but one, which spirit is God.

18. That God hath not decreed all the actions of men, because men doing what God decreed, do not sin.

19. That God was never angry nor displeased with man; for if he were ever displeased and pleased again, then there is a changeableness in God.

20. That God loved not one man more than another before the world, neither is there an absolute particular election, but only general and conditional upon perseverance; and the Scripture nowhere speaks of reprobates or reprobation.

21. That the soul dies with the body, and all things shall have an end, but God only shall remain forever.

22. Every creature in the first estate of creation was God, and every creature is God, every creature that hath life and breath being an efflux from God,[2] and shall return into God again, be swallowed up in him as a drop is in the ocean.

23. That to a saving knowledge of God, it sufficeth not to know him in the book of nature; nor secondly as revealed in the holy Scriptures, but that we must know him as abstract from his mercies and all his attributes.

24. That in the unity of the God-head there is not a trinity of persons, but the Doctrine of the Trinity believed and professed in the Church of God, is a popish tradition and a doctrine of Rome.

25. There are not three distinct persons in the divine essence, but only three offices; the Father, Son and holy Ghost are not three persons, but offices.

26. That there is but one person in the divine nature.

OF CHRIST

27. That Jesus Christ is not very God, not God essentially, but nominally, not the eternal Son of God by eternal generation, no otherwise may he be called the Son of God but as he was man.

28. That Christ's human nature is defiled with original sin as well as ours, Christ had from the birth to his death the same original corruption as ours, he took our sin into his nature as well as our flesh upon him: Christ is not of a holier nature than we; but in this appears God's love to us, that he will take one of us in the same condition, to convince us of what he is to us, and hath made us to be in him: methinks the beholding of Christ to be holy in the flesh is a dishonour to God, in that we should conceive holiness out of God, and again a discomfort to the Saints, that he should be of a more holy nature than they, as being no ground for them to come near with boldness to God.

29. That we did look for great matters from one crucified at Jerusalem 16 hundred years ago, but that does us no good, it must be a Christ formed in us, the deity united to our humanity, Christ came into the world to live thirty two years, and to do nothing else that he knew, and blessed God he never trusted in a crucified Christ.

30. Christ was true man when he created us: yea from eternity, and though he had not flesh, yet was he very man without flesh.

31. That Christ died for all men alike, for the reprobate as well as for the elect, and that not only sufficiently, but effectually, for Judas as well as Peter, for the damned in Hell as well as the saints in Heaven.

32. That by Christ's death, all the sins of all the men in the world, Turks, pagans, as well as Christians committed against the moral law and first Covenant, are actually pardoned and forgiven, and this is the everlasting Gospel.

[1] See Ephesians 2:2.

[2] efflux a flowing outward (OED).

33. That Christ did only satisfy for the sins against the first Covenant, but not for the sins against the second Covenant, as unbelief, he died not for the unbelief of any.

34. Christ died only for sins past, i.e. before the Gospel is revealed to the sinner, and the sins of men committed after conversion Christ died not for, but they are pardoned by his being a continual sacrifice.

35. Every man satisfies for himself for the sins against the second Covenant, namely unbelief: because he that believes not, the wrath of God abides upon him; so that for a year's unbelief a man bears a year's wrath, and this is all the satisfaction God requires.

36. That no man shall perish or go to Hell for any sin but unbelief only.

37. That the heathen who never heard of Christ by the word, have the Gospel, for every creature, as the sun, moon and stars preach the Gospel to men, and in them is revealed the knowledge of Christ crucified, and sin pardoned, if they had eyes to see it.

38. Those heathen that perish, do perish only for not believing according to the Gospel they enjoy.

39. Christ did not by his death purchase life and salvation for all, no nor for the elect: For it was not the end of God in the coming of Christ to purchase love and life; but Christ himself was purchased by love, that he might make out love and purchase us to love. For Christ came not to reconcile God to man, but man to God, for though Christ doth hold forth love and life, yet he did not purchase it, but was purchased by it.

40. Christ Jesus came into the world to witness and declare the love of God to us, not to procure it for us, or to satisfy God (as some say,) Christ was a most glorious publisher of the Gospel, he was sent to preach the Gospel, to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives: in all that Christ saith to be the end of his coming, is not a word mentioned of anything done by him in way of satisfying God. Christ's coming was more like a conqueror to destroy the enmity in our nature, and so to convince us of the love of God to us, by destroying in our nature that which we thought stood between God and us.

41. That the unction which the saints are said to receive from the holy One, 1 John 2:20, is one with the Christ-hood of Christ.

42. That Christ was a legal preacher, for till after his ascension the Gospel was not preached; Christ lived in a dark time, and so he preached the Law, but afterward then the Gospel came to be preached.

43. That Christ shall come and live again upon the earth, and for a thousand years reign visibly as an earthly monarch over all the world, in outward glory and pomp, putting down all monarchy and empires.

44. That when Christ in his own person hath subdued the disobedient nations, then the Church of the Jews and Gentiles shall live without any disturbance, from within or without it: all Christians shall live without sin, without the Word, sacraments or any ordinance, they shall pass those thousand years in worldly delights, begetting many children, eating and drinking, and enjoying all lawful pleasures which all the creatures then redeemed from their ancient slavery can afford.

45. That men may be saved without Christ, and the very heathens are saved, if they serve God according to the knowledge God hath given them, though they never heard of Christ.

46. That the least truth is of more worth than Jesus Christ himself.

47. Christ by his death hath freed all men from a temporal death which Adam's sin only deserved, by purchasing them a resurrection, and hath opened them a way to come to the Father if they will: thus far he died for all, no farther for any.

OF THE SPIRIT OF GOD, AND OF SANCTIFICATION

48. The Spirit of God dwells not, nor works in any: it is but our conceits and mistakes to think so, 'tis no spirit that works but our own.

49. That the same spirit which works in the children of disobedience is that spirit which sanctifies the hearts of the elect.

50. That there is a perfect way in this life, not by Word, sacraments, prayer and other ordinances, but by the experience of the spirit in a man's self.

51. That a man baptized with the holy Ghost, knows all things even as God knows all things, which point is a deep mystery and great ocean, where there is no casting anchor, nor sounding the bottom.

52. That if a man by the spirit knew himself to be in the state of grace, though he did commit murder or drunkenness, God did see no sin in him.

53. That sanctification is not an evidence of justification, and all notes and signs of a Christian's estate are legal and unlawful.[1]

54. Believers have no inherent sanctification, nor spiritual habits of grace infused into their hearts, but all their sanctification is that which is inherent in Christ, and they for this and no other cause, are said in Scripture phrase to be sanctified, but because of Christ's sanctification and inherent holiness.

OF ADAM AND MANKIND

55. Though Adam had continued in his estate of innocency, and not fallen, yet he had died a natural death, for death now is not a fruit of sin to believers.

56. God's image on man, is only our face and countenance; and every wicked man hath therefore God's image as well as good men.

57. That Adam, and so mankind in him, lost not the image of God by his fall, only incurred a temporal or corporal death, which was suspended for a time upon the promise of a Saviour.

58. There is no original sin in us, only Adam's first sin was original sin.

59. That the guilt of Adam's sin is imputed to no man, no man is punished for Adam's sin.

60. That one man is no more spiritual than another, nor is there any such inward difference between man and man; but all the spiritualness and difference lies without us in the word, which guides some men, and not others.

61. That all men who have the Gospel preached to them, and so manifested to their understandings, are immediately without any more ado able of themselves to believe and receive Christ.

62. There is no free-will in man either to good or evil, either in his natural estate or glorified estate.

63. That there is a power in man to resist grace, and that the grace which would convert one man, would not convert another.

64. Natural men may do such things as whereunto God hath by way of promise annexed grace and acceptation, and that if men improve their natural abilities to the utmost in seeking grace, they shall find it.

65. That regenerate men who have true grace, may fall totally and finally away from the state of grace.

OF THE MORAL LAW, JUSTIFICATION, FAITH, REPENTANCE, GOOD WORKS

66. That the moral law is of no use at all to believers, that 'tis no rule for believers to walk by, nor to examine their lives by, and that Christians are freed from the mandatory power of the law.

67. Persons justified, are not justified by faith, but are justified from all eternity.

68. Neither faith, nor repentance, nor humiliation, nor self-denial, nor use of ordinances, nor doing as one would be done to, are duties required

[1] legal probably legalistic, a term applied to the doctrine of justification by works (OED legalism, legalist).

of Christians, or such things as they must exercise themselves in, or they can have no part in Christ.

69. True faith is without all doubts of salvation, and if any man have doubts of his salvation, his faith is to be noted with a black mark.

70. That to credere [believe], faith in a proper sense is imputed to justification, and not Christ's righteousness imputed to justification.

71. That the doctrine of repentance is a soul-destroying doctrine.

72. In the old Covenant (that is before Christ came in the flesh) in the Prophets' days, repentance is declared as a means to obtain remission, and neither remission nor the knowledge of remission to go before, but to follow contrition; but this is not the Gospel which is established upon better promises.

73. That 'tis as possible for Christ himself to sin, as for a child of God to sin.

74. That there ought to be no fasting days under the Gospel and that men ought not to afflict their souls, no not in a day of humiliation.

75. That God doth not chastise any of his children for sin, and let believers sin as fast as they can, there is a fountain open for them to wash in, and that not for the sins of God's people, but for swearers and drunkards the land is punished.

76. That believers have nothing to do to take care, or to look to themselves to keep from sin, God must look to them, if he will.

77. God loves his children as well sinning, as praying, hearing and doing the holiest duties, he accounts of them never the better for their good works, nor never the worse for their ill works.

78. That God's children are not at all to be humbled, troubled or grieved for sin after conversion, and what Peter did in this kind after his foul fact of denying his Master, issued from the weakness of his faith.

79. That God's children are not to ask the pardon and forgiveness of their sins, they need not, they ought not, and 'tis no less than blasphemy for a child of God to ask pardon of sins, 'tis infidelity to ask pardon of sins, and David's asking forgiveness of sin was his weakness.

80. That when Abraham denied his wife, and in outward appearance seemed to lie in his distrust, lying, dissembling and equivocating that his wife was his sister, even then truly all his thoughts, words and deeds were perfectly holy and righteous from all spot of sin in the sight of God freely.

81. The called of God have sin in the flesh, they have sin in the conversation, but they have no sin, neither can they have any in the conscience, for the true faith of God's elect, and sin in the conscience, can no more stand together than light and darkness, and this reconciles those two Scriptures, if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves [1 John 1:8], and he that is born of God doth not commit sin, neither can he, because he is born of God [1 John 3:9].

82. The great Antichrist is that mystical body of iniquity which opposeth Jesus Christ, and not the Pope of Rome, or any particular succession of men, only he is a part of Antichrist. Denn makes the opposition of Antinomian errors to be the man of sin and the great Antichrist, as is to be seen in several pages of his Man of Sin Discovered.[1] And sectaries make them who deny Christ's dying for all, to be Antichrist: others make Antichristianism to consist in the coercive power of the Magistrate in matters of religion.

OF MAN AFTER THIS LIFE; OF THE SOUL; RESURRECTION FROM THE DEAD; HEAVEN AND HELL

83. That the soul of man is mortal as the soul of a beast, and dies with the body.

84. That the souls of the faithful after death, do sleep till the day of judgment, and are not in a

[1] Henry Denne, The Man of Sin Discovered (1645). Antinomianism was the belief that divine grace freed true believers from the need to observe any moral law.

capacity of acting anything for God, but 'tis with them as 'tis with a man that is in some pleasing dream.[1]

85. That the bodies of the faithful shall not rise again at the Resurrection (namely the same that died) but their souls shall have other bodies made fit for them, either by creation or faction from some pre-existing matter, and though the bodies be new, yet the men are the same, because the same souls remain still.

86. Infants rise not again, because they are not capable of knowing God, and therefore not of enjoying him.

87. That the perfection and resurrection spoken of by Paul, 1 Cor. 15:51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, the hope set before us, the eternal inheritance, a city having foundations, whose builder and maker is God, are to be attained in the fullness and perfection of them now in this present time before the common death of the body.

88. That none of the souls of the Saints go to Heaven where Christ is, but Heaven is empty of the Saints till the resurrection of the dead.

89. There is no resurrection at all of the bodies of men after this life, nor no Heaven nor Hell after this life, nor no devils.

90. There shall be in the last day a resurrection from the dead of all the brute creatures, all beasts and birds that ever lived upon the earth, every individual of every kind of them that died shall rise again, as well as of men, and all these creatures shall live for ever upon the earth.

91. There is no Hell, but in this life, and that's the legal terrors and fears which men have in their consciences.

OF THE CHURCH, GOSPEL, MINISTRY AND SACRAMENTS

92. That there is no Church of Christ upon the earth, no true ministry, no sacraments, no Gospel, no faith, because there are no visible nor infallible gifts.

93. No man is damned but for rejecting the Gospel, and none can reject the Gospel, but those who have it tendered unto them, as they had it in the Apostles' days being confirmed by miracles.

94. That the pure preaching of the Word, and right administration of the sacraments, are no notes nor signs of a true visible Church.

95. 'Tis the will of God that miracles should attend the ministry, the Apostles make a marriage of doctrine and miracles, so that they who preach the Gospel, must be so gifted as to confirm it by signs and wonders.

96. That many Christians in these days have more knowledge than the Apostles, and when the time is come that there shall be true churches and ministry erected, they shall have greater gifts, and do greater miracles than the Apostles ever did, because the Christian Church was but then in its infancy.

97. That there ought to be in these times no making or building of churches, nor use of church ordinances, as ministering of the Word, sacraments, but waiting for a church, being in readiness upon all occasions to take knowledge of any passenger, of any opinion or tenet whatsoever, the Saints as pilgrims do wander as in a temple of smoke, not able to find religion, and therefore should not plant it by gathering or building a pretended supposed house, but should wait for the coming of the Spirit, as the Apostles did.

98. There is a salvation that shall be revealed in the last times, which was not known to the Apostles themselves.

---

[1] The entries on the mortality of the soul probably refer to Richard Overton, Mans Mortallitie (1643, 1644). This pamphlet was named, along with Milton's Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643), as the subject of a Parliamentary inquiry. Sir Thomas Browne discusses "mortalism" in Religio Medici as one of the ancient heresies with which he sympathized.

99. That within a while God will raise up Apostles, men extraordinarily endowed with visible and infallible gifts to preach the Gospel, and that shall precede the fall of Rome.

100. That in points of religion, even in the articles of faith, and principles of religion, there's nothing certainly to be believed and built on, only that all men ought to have liberty of conscience, and liberty of prophesying.

101. That the Scriptures nowhere speak of sacraments, name or thing.

102. That the covenant whereof circumcision was the seal, was only of temporal promises, as e.g. of the land of Canaan; that the covenant God made with Abraham, had nothing spiritual in it; and that circumcision was a seal of the righteousness of faith to no other but to Abraham alone quatenus [in so far as] a father, and not to his children.

103. That baptism is not a seal nor sign of the covenant of grace.

104. That paedobaptism is unlawful and antichristian, and that 'tis as lawful to baptize a cat, or a dog or a chicken, as to baptize the infants of believers.

105. 'Tis as lawful to break any of the Ten Commandments, as to baptize an infant: yea, 'tis as lawful to commit adultery and murder, as to baptize a child.

106. That baptizing belongs not to ministers only, all gifted brethren and preaching disciples (though no ministers) may baptize.

107. Baptizedness is not essential to the baptizer, nor essential to preaching; so that persons, not only not in office, but not so much as baptized, may both baptize and preach.

108. Miracles are essential to the administration holden forth in the commission of baptism, Matthew 28:19.

109. That none are to be admitted to the Lord's Supper, though believers and Saints, nor their children to be baptized, but only they who are members in a church-way.

110. There is no Scripture against a man's being often baptized; neither is it more unlawful to be baptized often, than to receive the Lord's Supper often.

111. That Christ's words in the institution of his Supper, This is my body, and This is my blood, are to be understood literally.[1]

112. That Christians in receiving the Lord's Supper should receive with their hats on, with their heads covered, but the ministers should administer it with their hats off, uncovered.

113. That 'tis as necessary to be joined in church fellowship, as with Christ the head; and there's such a necessity of entering into a church-way, as there is no expectation of salvation without it.

114. That the Church of England and the ministry thereof is antichristian, yea of the devil, and that 'tis absolutely sinful and unlawful to hear any of their ministers preach in their assemblies.

115. That the Church of Rome was once a true church, but so was the Church of England never, therefore 'tis likelier the Church of Rome should be in the right in the doctrines of free-will, universal redemption, original sin, &c. than the Church of England.

116. That the calling and making of ministers of the Word and sacraments are not jure Divino [by divine right], but a minister comes to be so, as a merchant, bookseller, tailor, and such like.

117. That all settled certain maintenance for ministers of the Gospel, especially that which is called tithes, is unlawful, Jewish and antichristian.

118. That ministers of the Gospel in these days ought to work with their hands, and to follow some calling, that they may not be chargeable to the Church.

[1] Matthew 26:26–28; Mark 14:22–24; Luke 22:19–20.

119. That there ought to be no distinct order of ministers, nor such calling of some persons distinct and separated from the people, but that all men who have gifts are in their turns and courses, by the appointment of the rest of the company, to preach, pray, baptize, and they are for that turn instead of ministers, and as ministers.

Of Preaching and Hearing, of Praying, Singing of Psalms, of the Christian Sabbath or Lord's-day

120. That all days are alike to Christians under the New Testament, and they are bound no more to the observation of the Lord's day, or first day of the week than to any other.

121. That the Jewish Sabbath or Saturday is still to be kept by Christians for their Sabbath.

122. That Christians are not bound to meet one day in seven constantly, according to the manner of the nations, nor to pray and preach thus long, and in this manner two or three hours, according to the custom of the nations.

123. No man hath more to do to preach the Gospel than another, but every man may preach the Gospel, as well as any.

124. That 'tis lawful for women to preach, and why should they not, having gifts as well as men? and some of them do actually preach, having great resort to them.[1]

125. 'Tis a part of the Christian liberty of Christians, not to hear their own ministers, but to go and hear where they will, and whom they think they may profit most by.

126. That 'tis unlawful to worship God in places consecrated, and in places where superstition and idolatry have been practised, as in our churches.

127. That men ought to preach and exercise their gifts without study and premeditation, and not to think of what they are to say till they speak, because it shall be given them in that hour, and the Spirit shall teach them.

128. That there is no need of human learning, nor of reading authors for preachers, but all books and learning must go down, it comes from the want of the Spirit, that men write such great volumes, and make such ado of learning.

129. There are some women, ten or eleven in one town or vicinity, who hold it unlawful to hear any man preach, either publicly or privately, because they must not be like those women in [1] Timothy [2:11], ever learning, and never coming to the knowledge of the truth.

130. That 'tis unlawful to preach at all, sent or not sent out (as in a Church-state) but only thus, a man may preach as a waiting disciple, that is, Christians may not preach in a way of positive asserting and declaring things, but all they may do, is to confer, reason together, and dispute out things.

131. That 'tis unlawful for the Saints to join in receiving the Lord's Supper, where any wicked men are present, and that such mixed Communion doth pollute and defile them.

132. 'Tis unlawful for the Saints to join in prayer where wicked men are, or to pray with any of the wicked.

133. That 'tis unlawful for Christians to pray so much as privately with those (though godly) that are not members of a true church, but are members of the Church of England, and the assemblies thereof.

134. That how ever conference and discourse may be had with all, yet 'tis not lawful to join in prayer or giving of thanks, no not before meat, with those (though otherwise acknowledged Saints and godly, and are members of churches in the church-way) that are not of the same judgment and way.

135. That 'tis unlawful for Christians to pray at all with any others (either as being the mouth in prayer, or as joining in prayer), though never so godly, and of their own judgments, either in the public assemblies, or in their families, unless such persons who prayed had an infallible spirit, as the Apostles.

[1] Again, the second sentence is Edwards' outraged comment on the practical consequences of this opinion.

136. That Christians are not bound to pray constantly every day at set times, as morning and evening, but only at such times as the Spirit moves them to it, and if they find not themselves so moved in many days and weeks together, they ought not to pray.

137. That wicked and unregenerate men ought not to pray to God at all.

138. That all singing of psalms, as David's, or any other holy songs of Scripture, is unlawful, and not to be joined with.

139. That the singing which Christians should use, is that of hymns and spiritual songs, framed by themselves, composed by their own gifts, and that upon special occasions, as deliverances, &c. sung in the congregation by one of the assembly, all the rest being silent.

140. That love-feasts, or feasts of love (with which the Lord's Supper is to be administered also) is a perpetual ordinance of Christ, at which only church-members are to be present, and to partake.

Of Church Government

141. That there is no distinction concerning government of ecclesiastical and civil, for all that government which concerns the church, ought to be civil, but the maintaining of that distinction is for maintaining the interests of church-men.

142. That a few private Christians, as six or seven gathering themselves into a covenant and church-fellowship, have an absolute entire power of the keys,[1] and all government within themselves, and are not under any authoritative power of any classes, synods, or general councils, whatsoever they do, or what ways soever they take.

143. That the Presbytery and Presbyterial government, are the false prophet, and the beast spoken of in the Revelations: Presbytery is a third part of the city of Rome, yea that beast, in Revelation 11[:7] that ascends, and shall kill the two witnesses, namely the Independents.

Of Revelations and Miracles

144. That there are revelations and visions in these times, yea to some they are more ordinary, and shall be to the people of God generally within a while.

145. That the gift of miracles is not ceased in these times, but that some of the sectaries have wrought miracles, and miracles have accompanied them in their baptism, &c. and the people of God shall have power of miracles shortly.

146. That anointing the sick with oil by the elders praying over them, with laying on of hands, is a church-ordinance for church members that are sick, for their recovery.

147. 'Tis ordinary for Christians now in these days, with Paul to be rapt up to the third Heavens [II Corinthians 12:2], and to hear words unutterable, and they cannot well have assurance of being Christians, that have not found and had experience of this.

Of the Civil Magistrate

148. That Christian magistrates have no power at all to meddle in matters of religion, or things ecclesiastical, but in civil only concerning the bodies and goods of men.

149. That for a people to wait upon man for a form to worship God by, was idolatry: Nay, for a people to wait upon Parliament or assembly for a

---

[1] the keys perhaps the keys of the kingdom of Heaven (Matthew 16:19), but more likely Edwards is referring to the practical issue of his opponents' claim to be independent of any higher church authority.

form to worship God by, was worse than corporal idolatry.[1]

150. Whatsoever errors or miscarriages in religion the church should bear withal in men, continuing them still in communion with them, as brethren, these the magistrates should bear with in men, continuing them in the Kingdom or Commonwealth in the enjoyment of the liberty of subjects.

151. That the Parliament having their power from, and being entrusted by the people, the people may call them to an account for their actions, and let them right and straight: and seeing this present Parliament doth engross law-making and also law-executing into their own hands, contrary both to reason, and the true meaning of the law, the freemen of England ought not only to choose new members where they are wanting once every year, but also to renew and enquire once a year after the behaviour and carriage of those they have chosen. And if they find they never did any good, or are groundedly suspected to be unserviceable, that then those that choose and sent them may have liberty to choose more faithful, able, and better men in their places.

152. If God command such a thing to be done in his word, and the magistrate now come and command the same to be done, though a Christian ought to have, and would have done it, because of God's command, yet now he ought not to do it, because the magistrate commands it.

153. All the earth is the Saints', and there ought to be a community of goods, and the Saints should share in the lands and estates of gentlemen, and rich men.

OF MARRIAGE AND OF PARENTS AND CHILDREN

154. That 'tis lawful for a man to put away his wife upon indisposition, unfitness, or contrariety of mind arising from a cause in nature unchangeable;[2] and for disproportion and deadness of spirit, or something distasteful and averse in the immutable bent of nature; and man in regard of the freedom and eminency of his creation, is a law to himself in this matter, being head of the other sex, which was made for him, neither need he hear any judge therein above himself.

155. 'Tis lawful for one man to have two wives at once.

156. That children are not bound to obey their parents at all, if they be ungodly.

157. That parents are not to catechise their little children, nor to set them to read the Scripture, or to teach them to pray, but must let them alone for God to teach them.

OF WAR, AND OF FIGHTING AND KILLING

158. 'Tis unlawful for Christians to defend religion with the sword, or to fight for it when men come with the sword to take it away, religion will defend itself.

159. 'Tis unlawful for Christians to fight, and take up arms for their laws and civil liberties.

160. 'Tis unlawful to fight at all, or to kill any man, yea to kill any of the creatures for our use, as a chicken, or on any other occasion.

[ADDITIONAL SUBJECTS]

161. That using of set forms of prayer prescribed is idolatry.

162. David's saying, I am a worm, and no man [Psalm 22:6] must be understood literally: yea, he was both a man, and no man in the same literal sense.

163. That the Scripture speaks but of one kind of faith.

[1] referring to the Presbyterian Directory of Public Worship (1645) published by the Westminster Assembly of Divines.

[2] A marginal note indicates that Edwards is referring to arguments made by Milton in his Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643).

164. Some of the sectaries in London do hold, that in Suffolk there is a prophet raised up to come and preach the everlasting Gospel to them, and he stays but for a vocal call from Heaven to send him, which is expected daily, and that this man is that prophet spoken of in the Scripture, 1 John 25; that prophet in that Scripture, distinguished from Christ and Elias, is this man raised up in Suffolk.

165. That it could not stand with the goodness of God, to damn his own creatures eternally.

166. That God the Father did reign under the law, God the Son under the Gospel, and now God the Father and God the Son are making over the Kingdom to God the holy Ghost, and he shall reign and be poured out upon all flesh.

167. That there shall be a general restoration, wherein all men shall be reconciled to God and saved, only those who now believe and are Saints before this restoration shall be in a higher condition than those that do not believe.

168. That 'tis not lawful for a Christian to be a magistrate, but upon turning Christian he should lay down his magistracy; neither do we read after Cornelius was baptized (though he were a Centurion before, and a man in command and authority) that ever he meddled any more with his band called the Italian band [Acts 10:1].

169. Man lost no more by the fall, than all the rest of the whole creation fell into with Adam, all the world being condemned to death and desolation, yea the heavens and the earth also: so that you may as safely conclude that all the whole creation lost life and salvation to glorification by Adam's transgression, as to conclude that man lost salvation by Adam's transgression.

170. Man hath not by Christ brought unto him eternal life and salvation, but only such a life as all the whole creation hath together with him, for the second Adam hath not purchased eternal life to glorification for man.

171. All the creatures shall assuredly partake of the Gospel of peace, and that our Lord the great Prophet spake something to this purpose, when he saith, Go preach the gospel to every creature, though they cannot hear to life and glorification; and Christ is the great prophet of his Father, to declare his Father's counsel to the whole creation, and he is the great High Priest, which offereth up himself a sacrifice of full satisfaction, not for all men only, but for all that by man was lost, even the whole creation of God.

172. That a Directory,[1] or order to help in the way of worship, is a breach of the second Commandment, and there is no word of God to warrant the making of that Directory book, more than Jeroboam had for the making of calves of gold, which he set upon two high places, one at Dan, the other at Bethel, to the confusion of himself and his posterity [1 Kings 12:28-30].

173. No man is yet in Hell, neither shall any be there until the judgment; for God doth not hang first, and judge after.

174. Men say that faith is supernatural, but how can it be above nature to believe that which we see sufficient ground to believe; and to believe anything of which we have no plain ground and reason, is so far from being above nature, that it is below it, and proper to fools and not to reasonable men.

175. The Law doth not pronounce eternal death in hell-fire on those that obey it not, nor were men to have perished in hell-fire in relation to the law or Adam's sin, but the Gospel pronounceth eternal death in hell-fire on those that obey it not; and if we had been to suffer Hell in relation to Adam or the Law, then Christ also should have suffered in Hell for us, to have redeemed us from thence, which he did not.

176. It is not suitable to God, to pick and choose amongst men in showing mercy; if the love of God be manifested to a few, it is far from being infinite; if God show not mercy to all, to ascribe it to his will or pleasure, is to blaspheme his excellent name and nature.

Now unto these many more might be added that I know of, and are commonly known to others, which have been preached and printed within these four last years in England (as the necessity of dipping and burying underwater all persons to be baptized, and the necessity of a church covenant, as that ministers may not lawfully baptize, or administer the Lord's Supper out of their own particular congregations, neither preach ministerially, but as gifted brethren, out of their own church, with many such errors of the church way) but because they are but light in comparison, I will not name them.

I could relate also to you other errors, that have been reported to me and others by honest understanding men, to have been vented (and 'tis likely enough they may be true) as that 'tis lawful for wives to give without their husbands' consents something out of their husbands' estates, for the maintenance of the Church and ministers whereunto they belong: as that the Lord's Prayer, called and cried up by many to be so, it could not be the Lord's Prayer in regard there was a petition for pardon of sins, which Christ would not have taught, or words to that purpose; as also that if a man were strongly moved by the spirit to kill, to commit adultery, &c. and upon praying against it again and again it continued, and yet was still strongly pressed, he should then do it; but because I have not these upon so good grounds, nor such a concurrence of circumstances, or further confirmation upon enquiry, I therefore forbear to put them down particularly in the catalogue of errors, or to assert them with that authority.

King Charles I

1600 – 1649

In the summer of 1637, King Charles I and William Laud, the Archbishop of Canterbury, attempted to introduce a revised Prayer Book for use in the Church of Scotland. Many Scots, however, failed to see why an English desire for uniformity of worship meant that they were the ones who needed to change. The new liturgy subsequently became a focus for discontent, a symbol of a royal policy that had imposed numerous administrative, legal, and religious changes on Scotland over the previous decades. Well-planned riots greeted readings of the new service, followed over the next two years by the chain of events that comprise what is often called the Scottish Revolution. In February 1638, the Scots drafted the National Covenant, vowing to withstand innovations and maintain the Presbyterian cause. Charles tried to subdue the Covenanters by force, but a series of compromises and English humiliations culminated in the Scottish occupation of Newcastle upon Tyne in the summer of 1640. These two "Bishops' Wars" (1639–40) played a significant role in the buildup to the civil wars that would soon engulf all three nations Charles ruled.

The following royal proclamation was written in response to a widely circulated Scottish pamphlet, An Information to All Good Christians within the Kingdom of England (Edinburgh, 1639), in which the Covenanter leaders blamed the troubles on the "popishly affected" English bishops and appealed to an English Parliament to judge their case. Realizing that the Scots had gone over his head by using the press to present their side of events to an English audience, Charles responded in kind by printing ten thousand copies of this proclamation and ordering it to be read in every church in the kingdom. The ensuing paper skirmishes between King and Covenanter set the pattern for the subsequent pamphlet warfare between King and Parliament: while both sides continued the formality of addressing their texts to one another, their primary audience was the public, an entity increasingly recognized as one that could be addressed in print.

A Proclamation and Declaration to Inform Our Loving Subjects of Our Kingdom of England of the Seditious Practices of Some in Scotland, Seeking to Overthrow Our Regal Power under False Pretences of Religion

Whereas we have endeavoured now for a long time together by all calm and fair ways to appease the disorders and tumultuous carriages caused by some evil affected persons in our realm of Scotland, but hitherto all in vain, we have now thought it not only fit, but necessary in general to inform all our loving subjects in this our realm of England, what the truth is of our proceedings, what our leniency and gentleness hath been towards them, and what froward and perverse returns they have made to us, notwithstanding all their specious pretences, the better to insinuate themselves and their odious cause into the minds of our loyal subjects here. These disorders and tumults have been thus raised in Scotland, and fomented by factious spirits, and those traitorously affected, begun upon pretences of religion, the common cloak for all disobedience; but now it clearly appears, the aim of these men is not religion (as they falsely pretend and publish) but it is to shake off all monarchical government, and to vilify our regal power justly descended upon us over them: Nay their malice reaches so far, both against our power and person, as that in a most cunning and subtle way they have endeavoured to poison the hearts of our good and loyal subjects of this our kingdom, and to seduce them (were it in their power) to the like rebellious courses with themselves: Now though we are most confident of our people's affections towards us (of which they have given us clear testimony by their ready and cheerful assistance in this cause) and have not the least thought that those turbulent spirits shall any way prevail with them; yet we cannot but hold it requisite to give them timely notice of their traitorous intentions, which very many ways appears unto us.

As first, by the multitude of their printed pamphlets, or rather indeed infamous libels, stuffed full of calumnies against our regal authority, and our most just proceedings, and spreading of them in divers parts of this our kingdom.

Secondly, by their sending of letters to private persons, to incite them against us, and sending of some of their fellow-Covenanters to be at private meetings in London, and elsewhere, to pervert our good people from their duty; and some of these meetings we know, and some of those letters (lewd enough) we have seen.

Thirdly, by their public contemning of all our just commands, and their mutinous protesting against them, a course not fit to be endured in any well ordered kingdom.

Fourthly, by their rejecting of the Covenant commanded by our authority, because it was commanded by us, whereas no Covenant or band of that nature in that kingdom hath ever been or can be legal and warrantable, which hath not been commanded, or at least assented unto by royal authority... : By which Covenant of theirs, they have treacherously induced many of our people to swear to a band against us; which band and Covenant (or rather conspiracy) of theirs, could not be with God, being against us the Lord's anointed over them: But it was and is a band and Covenant pretended to be with God, that they may with the better countenance do the works of the devil; such as all treasons and rebellions are.

And lastly, by their most hostile preparations in all kinds, as if we were not their King, but their sworn enemy: For what can their intentions be, being thus prepared, but to invade this Kingdom, should they not find us ready, both to resist their force and to curb their insolences: For many, and some of the chiefest among them, are men, not only of unquiet spirits, but of broken fortunes, and would be very glad of any occasion (especially under the colour of religion) to make them whole upon the lands and goods of our subjects in England, who we presume (besides their allegiance to us) will look better to themselves and their estates, than to share them with such desperate hypocrites, who seek to be better, and cannot well be worse. We demand again, what intentions else they can have; for we have already often assured them by our published proclamations, that we are so far from thinking of any innovation or alteration of religion, that we are resolved to maintain the same constantly, and as it is established by law in that our Kingdom; nay, so desirous have we been to give content unto them, as that we have in a manner condescended to all which they petitioned for; nay, our princely clemency in these produced no better effect, than increasing and daring insolences, to our dishonour both at home and abroad: Yet we passed by all till they struck at the very root of kingly government; for they have now assumed to themselves regal power; for whereas the print is the king's in all kingdoms, these seditious men have taken upon them to print what they please, though we forbid it, and to prohibit what they dislike, though we command it; and with the greater affront have forbid and dismissed the printer whom we established: Besides, they have taken upon them to convene our subjects, raise armies, block up and besiege our castles, to lay impositions and taxes upon our people, threatening such as continue in loyalty to us, with force and violence. To this we shall add that they have slighted the directions and power of our council table in that kingdom, and have set up tables of their own, at which, some of their leaders sit under the name of committees from the late pretended General Assembly or their deputies. And thus they meet when and where they please, treat and conclude what they please, and send their edicts through all parts of the kingdom without any consent, nay without all knowledge of us, our commissioner, or council, and directly contrary to many standing laws at this day in force in that kingdom, and yet pretend violation of their laws, as one of the main causes of their brain-sick distempers.

Here therefore, we take God and the world to witness, we hold our self forced and constrained to arm, not only to reclaim them, and to set our kingly authority right again in that our ancient and native Kingdom, but also for the safety of this Kingdom, our loyal subjects in it, with their wives, children, and goods, as well as our own, against the rage and fury of these men and their Covenant. And this we think fit to let you further know, that we hope in time to make the best of them see that we will endure no such Covenant and band in our Kingdom, to which we shall not consent: So the question is not now, whether a service book to be received or not; nor whether episcopal government shall be continued, or presbyterial admitted, but whether we are their king or not....

We further give you to understand, that there is a large Declaration coming forth, containing all the particular passages which have occurred in this business from the very beginning,[1] attested with their own foul acts, to disannul and shame their fair, but false words. But because this cannot so soon be made ready, we hold it most expedient to let this short Declaration forerun it, that our loyal subjects here and elsewhere, may not be infected with their false, wicked, specious, but most seditious informations. For example sake in their last pamphlet (beside divers other false, base, and fawning passages) there are these scandalous and most notorious untruths: As first, they say, that we have committed the arms we now take, and the armies we now raise, into the hands of professed papists, which is not more dishonourable to our self, and the noble persons entrusted by us, than odiously and notoriously false. Again they say, that some of power in the hierarchy of England have been the cause of our taking arms to invade our native Kingdom, and of meddling with their religion, whereas it is most certain, that no one of them have done any thing therein, but by our own princely direction and command. And for arms, it is notoriously known to all our council then present, that their counsels were for peace, and have been the persuaders (as much as in them lay) of the undeserved moderation wherewith we have hitherto proceeded towards so great offenders.

And further they say, that they intend no act of hostility against England, unless they shall be necessitated in their own defence. We would fain know, defence of what? Is it of disobedience? Defence against whom? Is it now against us their true and lawful sovereign? If they will defend against us, it ought to be by law, and not by arms: That defence we shall never deny them: This by arms we shall never permit them. Now our laws which they seem so much to value, are in a manner oppressed by them, in so much that our judges are so awed, as that they dare hardly proceed according to law.

With these, and the like mutinous libels, we desire our good subjects should not be infected, but that all of them might know the present necessity we have to arm our self, which is for no other end, save only for the safety and security of this our

Kingdom, the reestablishment of our authorities in that, and the suppressing of such as have misled and abused our subjects there, and would (if not prevented) do the like here; but is no way to enforce any innovation of religion established in that Kingdom, or any ways to infringe the laws thereof, or any of their liberties whatsoever, which are according to law.

These are therefore to will and command all our loving subjects of this our Kingdom, that they receive no more of their seditious pamphlets sent from Scotland, or any other place, concerning those affairs, which can have no other use or influence than to draw the hearts of our loyal people to the like rebellious courses. And that such of our subjects here, as have already received any of these rebellious pamphlets, do presently deliver them to the next Justice of Peace, that he may send them to one of our secretaries, as both they and the Justices of Peace will answer it at their uttermost perils.

And our further will and pleasure is, that this our Proclamation and Declaration be read in time of divine service in every church within the Kingdom, that all our people to the meanest, may see the notorious carriages of these men, and likewise the justice and mercy of all our proceedings.

Given at our court at Whitehall the seven and twentieth day of February, in the fourteenth year of our reign of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland.[1]

[1] France English monarchs laid claim to the French crown in the fourteenth century, and England held land in France until the loss of Calais in 1558; it was not until the Treaty of Amiens (1802), however, that the English monarchy formally withdrew its long-absurd claim to the French title.

Bathsua Makin

ca. 1600 – ca. 1675

Bathsua Makin was the daughter of the linguist and schoolmaster Henry Reginald. The eminent mathematician John Pell was her brother-in-law.[1] She attended her father's school in the street of St. Mary Axe, not far from London, where she was instructed in classical and modern languages. Makin began her writing career as early as sixteen with the publication of Musa Virginea (1616), a collection of Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Spanish, German, French and Italian verse dedicated to James I. The King may have been unimpressed with this display of female erudition, for Makin is probably the "learned maid" referred to in the anecdote noted in John Collet's commonplace book: "When a learned maid was presented to King James for an English rarity, because she could speak and write pure Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, the King asked, 'But can she spin?'"

Bathsua married Richard Makin in the parish of St. Andrew Undershaft on March 5, 1621. She obtained a position at court as the tutor of Princess Elizabeth (1636–1650), the daughter of Charles I. She instructed Elizabeth in Greek, Latin, Hebrew, French, Italian and mathematics. At this time, she corresponded with the renowned Continental scholar Anna Maria van Schurman. When Parliament took Princess Elizabeth into custody in 1642, Makin may have remained her attendant for several years. During the Interregnum, she suffered financial difficulties. Her petition to the Council of State, for the "payment of the arrears of £40 a year granted her for life, for her attendance on the late King's children," was dismissed in 1655. Makin eventually found employment as a tutor in the household of Lucy Hastings, Dowager Countess of Huntingdon. The account books of the Hastings household indicate that she was there employed until October, 1662. Makin wrote three poems for Lucy Hastings, two of which are elegies for the Countess's children.

It has been thought that Makin wrote An Essay to Revive the Ancient Education of Gentlewomen (1673) to advertise the school she ran at Tottenham High Cross, a few miles from London. In this treatise the author, as Christine de Pizan had done, produces a catalogue of learned women from biblical and classical sources to demonstrate that the education of women is neither a new nor a dangerous social practice. The standard arguments of those who would "breed women low" are then brought forth in order to be controverted and corrected. The pedagogy of the treatise was greatly influenced by the writings of the philosopher and educationalist Johan Amos Komensky (Comenius). The question of attribution cannot be regarded as satisfactorily settled.[2]

An Essay to Revive the Ancient Education of Gentlewomen, in Religion, Manners, Arts & Tongues

TO ALL INGENIOUS AND VIRTUOUS LADIES, MORE ESPECIALLY TO HER HIGHNESS THE LADY MARY, ELDEST DAUGHTER TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK [1]

Custom, when it is inveterate, hath a mighty influence: it hath the force of nature itself. The barbarous custom to breed women low, is grown general amongst us, and hath prevailed so far, that it is verily believed (especially amongst a sort of debauched sots) that women are not endued with such reason, as men; nor capable of improvement by education, as they are. It is looked upon as a monstrous thing, to pretend the contrary.[2] A learned woman is thought to be a comet, that bodes mischief, whenever it appears.[3] To offer to the world the liberal education of women is to deface the image of God in man, it will make women so high, and men so low, like fire in the housetop, it will set the whole world in a flame.

These things and worse than these, are commonly talked of, and verily believed by many, who think themselves wise men: to contradict these is a bold attempt; where the attempter must expect to meet with much opposition. Therefore, ladies, I beg the candid opinion of your sex, whose interest I assert. More especially I implore the favour of your Royal Highness, a person most eminent amongst them, whose patronage alone will be a sufficient protection. What I have written is not out of humour to show how much may be said of a trivial thing to little purpose. I verily think, women were formerly educated in the knowledge of arts and tongues, and by their education, many did rise to a great height in learning. Were women thus educated now, I am confident the advantage would be very great: the women would have honour and pleasure, their relations profit, and the whole nation advantage. I am very sensible it is an ill time to set on foot this design: wherein not only learning but virtue itself is scorned and neglected, as pedantic things, fit only for the vulgar.[4] I know no better way to reform these exorbitancies, than to persuade women to scorn those toys and trifles, they now spend their time about, and to attempt higher things, here offered: This will either reclaim the men; or make them ashamed to claim the sovereignty over such as are more wise and virtuous than themselves.

Were a competent number of schools erected to educate ladies ingenuously,[5] methinks I see how ashamed men would be of their ignorance, and how industrious the next generation would be to wipe off their reproach.

I expect to meet with many scoffs and taunts from inconsiderate and illiterate men, that prize their own lusts and pleasure more than your profit and content. I shall be the less concerned at these, so long as I am in your favour; and this discourse may be a weapon in your hands to defend yourselves, whilst you endeavour to polish your souls, that you may glorify God, and answer the end of your creation, to be meet helps to your husbands.[1] Let not your ladyships be offended, that I do not (as some have wittily done) plead for female preeminence.[2] To ask too much is the way to be denied all. God has made the man the head: if you be educated and instructed, as I propose, I am sure you will acknowledge it, and be satisfied that you are helps, that your husbands do consult and advise with you (which if you be wise they will be glad of) and that your husbands have the casting voice, in whose determinations you will acquiesce.[3] That this may be the effect of this education in all ladies that shall attempt it, is the desire of

Care ought to be taken by us to Educate Women in Learning

That I may be more distinct in what I intend, I shall distinguish of women,

Women are of two sorts,
{ RICH } { Of good natural parts.[5]
{ POOR } { Of low parts.

I do not mean, that it is necessary to the esse, to the subsistence, or to the salvation of women, to be thus educated.[6] Those that are mean in the world, have not an opportunity for this education: Those that are of low parts, though they have opportunity, cannot reach this; Ex quovis ligno non fit Minerva:[7] My meaning is, persons that God has blessed with the things of this world, that have competent natural parts, ought to be educated in knowledge; that is, it is much better they should spend the time of their youth, to be competently instructed in those things usually taught to gentlewoman at schools, and the overplus of their time to be spent in gaining arts, and tongues,[8] and useful knowledge, rather than to trifle away so many precious minutes merely to polish their hands and feet, to curl their locks, to dress and trim their bodies; and in the meantime to neglect their souls, and not at all, or very little to endeavour to know God, Jesus Christ, themselves, and the things of nature, arts and tongues, subservient to these. I do not deny but women ought to be brought up to a comely and decent carriage, to their needle, to neatness, to understand all those things that do particularly belong to their sex. But when these things are competently cared for, and where there are endowments of nature and leisure, then higher things ought to be endeavoured after. Merely to teach gentlewomen to frisk and dance, to paint their faces, to curl their hair, to put on a whisk, to wear gay clothes, is not truly to adorn, but to adulterate their bodies;[9] yea (what is worse) to defile their souls. This (like Circe's cup) turns them to beasts;[10] whilst their belly is their God, they become swine;

whilst lust, they become goats; and whilst pride is their God, they become very devils. Doubtless this under-breeding of women began amongst heathens and barbarous people; it continues with the Indians, where they make their women mere slaves, and wear them out in drudgery. It is practised amongst degenerate and apostate Christians, upon the same score, and now is a part of their religion;[1] it would therefore be a piece of reformation to correct it; and it would notably countermine them who fight against us, as Satan against Adam, by seducing our women, who then easily seduce their husbands.

Had God intended woman only as a finer sort of cattle, he would not have made them reasonable. Brutes, a few degrees higher than drills or monkeys (which the Indians use to do many offices),[2] might have better fitted some men's lust, pride, and pleasure; especially those that desire to keep them ignorant to be tyrannized over.

God intended women as a help-meet to man, in his constant conversation, and in his concerns of his family and estate, when he should most need, in sickness, weakness, absence, death, etc. Whilst we neglect to fit them for these things, we renounce God's blessing, he hath appointed women for, are ungrateful to him, cruel to them, and injurious to ourselves.

If any desire distinctly to know what they should be instructed in? I answer, I cannot tell where to begin to admit women, nor from what part of learning to exclude them, in regard of their capacities. The whole encyclopaedia of learning may be useful some way or other to them. Respect indeed is to be had to the nature and dignity of each art and science, as they are more or less subservient to religion, and may be useful to them in their station. I would not deny them the knowledge of grammar and rhetoric, because they dispose to speak handsomely. Logic must be allowed, because it is the key to all sciences. Physic, especially visibles, as herbs, plants, shrubs, drugs, etc., must be studied, because this will exceedingly please themselves, and fit them to be helpful to others. The tongues ought to be studied, especially the Greek and Hebrew; these will enable to the better understanding of the Scriptures.

The mathematics, more especially geography, will be useful; this puts life into history. Music, painting, poetry, etc., are a great ornament and pleasure. Some things that are more practical are not so material, because public employments in the field and courts, are usually denied to women: yet some have not been inferior to many men even in these things also.

This kind of education will be very useful to women:

1. The profit will be to themselves. In the general they will be able to understand, read, write, and speak their mother tongue, which they cannot well do without this. They will have something to exercise their thoughts about, which are busy and active. Their quality ties them at home;[3] if learning be their companion, delight and pleasure will be their attendants: for there is no pleasure greater, nor more suitable to an ingenious mind, than what is founded in knowledge; it is the first fruits of heaven, and a glimpse of that glory we afterwards expect. There is in all an innate desire of knowing, and the satisfying [of] this is the greatest pleasure. Men are very cruel that give them leave to look at a distance, only to know they do not know; to make any thus to tantalize, is a great torment.

This will be a hedge against heresies. Men are furnished with arts and tongues for this purpose, that they may stop the mouths of their adversaries. And women ought to be learned, that they may stop their ears against seducers. It cannot be imagined so many persons of quality would be so easily carried aside with every wind of doctrine, had they been furnished with these defensive arms;[1] I mean, had they been instructed in the plain rules of artificial reasoning, so as to distinguish a true and forcible argument, from a vain and captious fallacy.[2] Had they been furnished with examples of the most frequent illusions of erroneous seducers. Heresiarchs creep into houses, and lead silly women captive, then they lead their husbands, both their children;[3] as the devil did Eve, she her husband, they their posterity.

[2] drills baboons of a west African species (OED drill *sb*³).

[3] quality rank or position in society (OED quality sb 3a).

It is none of the least considerations, that a woman thus educated, who modestly uses her learning, is, in despite of envy, honoured by most, especially wise and good men; such a one is admired and even adored by the vulgar and illiterate.

. . . .

2. Women thus educated, will be beneficial to their relations. It is a great blessing of God to a family, to provide a good wife for the head, if it be eminent; and a presage of ruin, when he sends a ranting Jezebel to a soft Ahab.[4]

One Athaliah, married to Joram, plucks ruin upon the house of Jehoshaphat.[5] How many families have been ruined by this one thing, the bad education of women? Because the men find no satisfactory converse or entertainment at home,[6] out of mere weariness they seek abroad; hence they neglect their business, spend their estates, destroy their bodies, and oftentimes damn their souls.

The Italians slight their wives, because all necessary knowledge, that may make them serviceable (attainable by institution) is denied them: but they court, adore, and glory in their courtesans, though common whores; because they are polished with more generous breeding.

Many learned men, having married wives of excellent parts, have themselves instructed them in all kinds of learning, the more to fit them for their converse, and to endear them and their society to them, and to make them admired by others. The woman is the glory of the man;[7] we joy in our children when eminent, and in our wives when excellent, either in body or mind.

Before I mention the objections, I shall state the propositions I have endeavoured to prove. That which I intend is this, that persons of competent natural parts, indifferently inclined and disposed to learning, whom God hath blessed with estates, that they are not cumbered in the world, but have liberty and opportunity in their childhood; and afterwards, being competently instructed in all things now useful that concern them as women, may and ought to be improved in more polite learning, in religion, arts, and the knowledge of things, in tongues also as subservient to these, rather than to spend the overplus time of their youth, in making points for bravery, in dressing and trimming themselves like Bartholomew-babies, in painting and dancing, in making flowers of coloured straw, and building houses of stained paper, and such like vanities.[1]

[1] every wind of doctrine Ephesians 4:14.

[2] artificial scholarly (OED artificial a A.II.7); captious fallacy a deceptive argument designed to entrap.

[3] Heresiarchs leaders or founders of a heresy (OED heresiarch); silly unlearned (OED silly a A.3).

[4] Jezebel to a soft Ahab Jezebel, the wife of Israel's "wicked" King Ahab, worshiped Baal, persecuted the Hebrew prophets, and arranged for the murder of Naboth to secure his land, a crime for which she was cursed by Elijah. The curse was realized when she was thrown from a window, and her corpse eaten by dogs (I Kings 16–21; II Kings 9).

[5] Athaliah...Jehoshaphat Athaliah, the wife of Jehoram (not Joram), counseled her son Ahaziah (the grandson of Jehoshaphat, King of Judah) "to do wickedly" during his reign. When her son was killed, she murdered almost "all the seed royal" of Judah and ruled for six years before she was put to death (II Kings 8,11; II Chronicles 22–23).

[6] converse conversation (OED converse $sb^1$1).

[7] The woman...glory of man "For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man" (I Corinthians 11:7).

Objection. Nobody means gentlewomen should be thus educated in matters of mere vanity; but in practising their needle, in knowing and doing those things that concern good housewifery, which is women's particular qualification.

Answer. I know not what may be meant, but I see what is generally done. In most schools for educating this sex, little more is proposed by the undertakers, or expected by the parents. As far as I can observe, the less anything of solidity is taught, the more such places are frequented. I do acknowledge, in the state of the question, that women should be accomplished in all those things that concern them as women. My meaning is, the overplus time may be employed in polishing their minds with the knowledge of such things as may be honourable, pleasant and profitable to them, and their relations afterwards.

Before I proceed further to answer the remaining objections, I desire this may be taken notice of, that whatever is said against this manner of educating women, may commonly be urged against the education of men.

Objection. If we bring up our daughters to learning, no persons will adventure to marry them.

Answer. 1. Many men, silly enough, (God knows) think themselves wise, and will not dare to marry a wise woman, lest they should be overtopped.[2]

2. As some husbands, debauched themselves, desire their wives should be chaste, and their children virtuous: So some men, sensible of their own want (caused by their parents' neglect), will choose a learned woman, in whom they may glory, and by whose prudence their defect may be supplied.[3]

3. Learned men, to be sure, will choose such the rather, because they are suitable. Some men marrying wives of good natural parts, have improved themselves in arts and tongues, the more to fit them for their converse.

4. Many women formerly have been preferred for this very thing.

Athenais, daughter to Leontius the philosopher, left destitute by him, was entertained by his sister Placida for her learning, and was after married to the Emperor Theodosius, charmed by her worth, being fitted by her education for that high place; she is recorded for an excellent Empress. Upon her being baptized, she was called Eudocea.[4]

Constantine married Helena the daughter of Lois, more for her learning, than any other accomplishments.[5]

We may probably imagine Hortensia, Terentia, Tullia, and diverse others, had never been married to such brave men, had not their education preferred them.[6]

If this way of educating gentlewomen should now be set on foot, there will not be so great a number bred; but (as degenerate as times are) there would be found learned men enough, to whom they may be preferred for their very education.

[4] Athenais...Eudocea Theodosius II (b. 401 C.E.) married Eudocia (d. 460) in 421 C.E. He was greatly influenced by his wife until they fell from favour (early 440s).

[5] Constantine married Helena presumably in reference to Helena, the wife or concubine of Constantius Chlorus and mother of Constantine the Great (285–337 C.E.).

[6] Hortensia, Terentia, Tullia Hortensia (first century B.C.E.), the daughter of Roman politician and orator Quintus Hortensius Hortalus, was herself an orator. Terentia (first century B.C.E.), the first wife of Cicero, was frequently addressed in his Letters. When Cicero divorced her, she married Sallust. Tullia (ca. 79–45 B.C.E.), the daughter of Cicero and Terentia, was first married to C. Piso, then to Furius Crassipes, and finally to Dolabella, military commander and politician.

Objection. It is against custom to educate gentlewomen thus.

Answer. Bad customs ought to be broken, or else many good things would never come into use. I have showed this is a heathenish custom, or a worse, continued amongst us upon very bad grounds.

Objection. Solomon's good housewife is commended for rising early, employing her servants, making garments, by which her husband was known in the gate.[1] It seems she was of quality, she had so many servants, and her husband a magistrate; their courts of judicature were at the gate: no mention is made of arts or tongues.

Answer. It seems persons of quality were more industrious in those times than they are now. I do not intend to hinder good housewifery, neither have I called any from their necessary labour to their book. My design is upon such persons whose leisure is a burden.

Further, if Solomon's good housewife was accomplished with arts and tongues, she would have more reverence from her servants, and by her knowledge in economics, know better how to manage so great a family.

Solomon describes an industrious woman. I am suggesting what persons ought to do that are about these things. Those that deny this, deserve no answer, but are to be thought on with scorn, as that duke that thought women wise enough that knew their husband's doublet and breeches asunder.[2]

If there be any persons so vain, and are yet pleased with this apish kind of breeding now in use, that desire their daughters should be outwardly dressed like puppets, rather than inwardly adorned with knowledge, let them enjoy their humour; but never wonder if such marmosets married to buffoons, bring forth and breed up a generation of baboons, that have little more wit than apes and hobby-horses.[3] I cannot say enough against this barbarous rudeness—to suffer one part, I had almost said the better part, of ourselves to degenerate (as far as possible) into brutality.

Objection. Women are of ill natures, and will abuse their education. They will be proud, and not obey their husbands; they will be pragmatic, and boast of their parts and improvements.[4] The ill nature that is in them, will become more wicked, the more wit you furnish them with.

Answer. This is the killing objection, and every thick-skulled fellow that babbles this out, thinks no Billingsgate woman can answer it.[5] I shall take the objection in pieces:

1. They will abuse learning.] So do men; he is egregiously simple, that argues against the use of a necessary or very convenient thing from the abuse of it.[6] By this argument no men should be liberally brought up; strong drinks should never be used any more in the world, and a hundred such like things.

2. They are of ill natures.] This is an impudent calumny;[7] as if the whole sex of women, or the greatest part of them, had that malice infused into their very natures and constitutions, that they are ordinarily made worse by that education that makes men generally better.

[1] Solomon's good housewife For Solomon's description of the virtuous woman whose "price is far above rubies," see Proverbs 31:10–31.

[2] doublet a close-fitting body garment, with or without sleeves (OED doublet 1); breeches a garment covering the loins and thighs, ending only just below the knee (OED breech sb 1c). Compare the Athenian Society's "Some indeed think they [women] have learned enough, if they can distinguish between their husband's breeches and another man's" (Athenian Mercury Vol. 1, No. 18).

Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros.[1]

The heathen found that arts wrought upon men, the rougher sex.[2] Surely it is want of fidelity in the instructor, if it have not the like effect upon softer and finer materials.

3. They will be proud, and not obey their husbands.] To this I answer: what is said of philosophy, is true of knowledge; a little philosophy carries a man from God, but a great deal brings him back again;[3] a little knowledge, like windy bladders, puffs up, but a good measure of true knowledge, like ballast in a ship, settles down, and makes a person move more even in his station; 'tis not knowing too much, but too little that causes the irregularity. This same argument may be turned upon men; whatever they answer for themselves, will defend women.

Those that desire a farther answer, let them peruse Erasmus, his dialogue of the Ignorant Abbot and the Learned Woman.[4] An ignorant magistrate, or minister, may as well plead against improvement of knowledge in all below them, lest they should be wiser than themselves, and so deride them. Do not deny women their due, which is to be as well instructed as they can; but let men do their duty, to be wiser than they are. If this doth not please, let silly men let wise women alone; the rule is, all should be (as near as they can) equally yoked.

Objection. The end of learning is public business, which women are not capable of. They must not speak in the church; and it is more proper for men to act in the commonwealth than they.[5]

Answer. They may not speak in the church, but they may inquire of their husbands at home; it is private instruction I plead for; not public employment. Yet there is no such contradiction in the terms: Miriam and Deborah were extraordinarily called forth by God, as well as Aaron and Barak.[6] Sometimes women may have occasions for public business, as widows, and wives when their husbands are absent; but especially persons born to government. The Salic law hath not prevailed all the world over, and good reason too; for women upon thrones have been as glorious in their governing, as many men, as I have showed before.[7] But lay all this aside; there are other ends of learning, besides pleading in the hall, and appearing in the pulpit. Private persons (as I have before showed) may many ways please themselves, and benefit others. This objection also will turn the point upon all men that are in a private capacity.

Objection. They will not mind their household affairs.

Answer. Men are judged to be more capable of country business by liberal education. Most ingenious contrivances, even in husbandry and trades, have been invented by scholars. You may as well say, a gentleman that hath country affairs to manage, ought not to be a scholar, because he will be poring upon his book, when he should be looking after his plowmen.

[1] Ingenuas...feros "Faithful study of the liberal arts softens character and permits it not to be cruel" (Ovid, Ex Ponto II.ix.47).

[2] wrought upon men performed on men (the desired effect) (OED work v B.I.1).

[3] What is said...back again "It is true that a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion" (Bacon, Of Atheism).

[4] Erasmus...Learned Woman Though the learned woman provides many reasons why women should be educated, the ignorant abbot only gives one response: "That women would never be kept in subjection if they were learned" and therefore would "never be such tame fools and very slaves" (An Essay, 23).

[5] They must not...the church "And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church" (I Corinthians 14:35). See Margaret Fell's defence of women speaking in church: Women's Speaking Justified (1666).

[6] Miriam...Barak Miriam, the prophetess, and Aaron, the high priest of Israel, were called by God to help their brother Moses free the Israelites from Egyptian bondage (Exodus 15:20–21). Deborah, the prophetess and judge, and Barak were likewise called to lead a coalition of Israelite tribal militias to victory over a Canaanite army commanded by Sisera (Judges 4–5). Both Miriam and Deborah composed victory odes.

[7] Salic law the alleged fundamental law of the French monarchy by which females were excluded from succession to the crown; hence, generally a law excluding females from dynastic succession (OED salic a 1).

Objection. They have other things to do.

Answer. Those which have, may mind those things for ought I have said: The question is of persons at leisure, whether these had not better be employed in some good literature, than in pilling straws, or doing nothing, which is the certain seed of doing mischief?[1]

Objection. Women do not desire learning.

Answer. Neither do many boys (as schools are now ordered), yet I suppose you do not intend to lay fallow all children that will not bring forth fruit of themselves, to forbear to instruct those which at present do not thank you for it.

But I have said, there is in all an innate desire of knowing, in women as well as men: if the ways to the Temple of Pallas be so tedious and intricate, that they confound or tire her servants;[2] or, if you dress up learning in such an ugly and monstrous shape, that you affright children; I have nothing to say to such, but that they should reform their schools, or else all will think they have no desire any, either male or female, should be instructed.

Objection. Women are of low parts.

Answer. So are many men; we plead only for those which have competent parts. To be sure, some women are as capable of learning, and have attained to as great height in it as most men; witness those examples before produced.[3]

If this be true, their parts generally are lower than men's, there is the more need they should by all convenient means be improved. Crutches are for infirm persons.

Objection. Women are of softer natures, more delicate and tender constitutions, not so fixed and solid as men.

Answer. If their natures are soft, they are more capable of good impressions; if they are weak, more shame for us to neglect them, and defraud them of the benefit of education, by which they may be strengthened.

Objection. It is against custom to educate gentlewomen thus; those that do attempt it, will make themselves ridiculous.

Answer. This argument might have been used to the Irish, not to use traces at plow and cart, but to draw their horses by their tails, which was a general custom amongst them.[4] Bad customs (when it is evident they are so) ought to be broken, or else good customs can never come into use. That this is a bad custom, is evident, continued upon a bad ground. Let women be fools, and then you may easily make them slaves.

If all I have said may conveniently be done, I expect many will deride this design. I am contented, let them abound in their own sense, and have wives as silly as themselves desire, over whom they may tyrannize.

I hope I shall by this discourse persuade some parents to be more careful for the future of the breeding of their daughters. You cark and care to get great portions for them, which sometimes occasions their ruin.[5] Here is a sure portion, an easy way to make them excellent. How many born to good fortunes, when their wealth hath been wasted, have supported themselves and families too by their wisdom?

[1] pilling straws to pick [pill] straws was an expression for sleepiness, here in the sense of idleness (OED straw *sb*¹ II.9d).

[2] Pallas Pallas Athena.

[3] witness…produced Earlier in An Essay, a history of women eminent in linguistics, oratory, philosophy, mathematics and poetry is set forth.

[4] traces the ropes, by means of which horses draw a carriage, plough, or harrow (OED theat sb).

[5] cark labour anxiously (OED cark v 3); portions marriage portions (OED portion sb I.3).

I hope some of these considerations will at least move some of this abused sex to set a right value upon themselves, according to the dignity of their creation, that they might, with an honest pride and magnanimity, scorn to be bowed down and made to stoop to such follies and vanities, trifles and nothings, so far below them, and unproportionable to their noble souls, nothing inferior to those of men, and equally precious to God in Christ, in whom there is neither male nor female.

Let a generous resolution possess your minds, seeing men in this age have invaded women's vices, in a noble revenge, reassume those virtues, which men sometimes unjustly usurped to themselves, but ought to have left them in common to both sexes.

POSTSCRIPT

If any enquire where this education may be performed, such may be informed, that a school is lately erected for gentlewomen at Tottenham High Cross, within four miles of London, in the road to Ware, where Mrs. Makin is governess, who was sometimes tutoress to the Princess Elizabeth, Daughter to King Charles the First; where, by the blessing of God, gentlewomen may be instructed in the principles of religion; and in all manner of sober and virtuous education.

William Walwyn

1600 – 1681

William Walwyn was a leader of the Leveller movement and the author of some of the civil war period's most remarkable arguments for religious toleration, freedom of conscience, and the ability of individuals to form their own judgements on important issues without deferring to political or religious authorities. The younger son of a Worcester gentleman, Walwyn was apprenticed to the silk trade and by the late 1630s was a moderately prosperous merchant with a love for reading. He published the first of his approximately thirty pamphlets in 1641. Many of these works display Walwyn's general opposition to political and religious authoritarianism. While he remained associated with the Presbyterian church throughout the civil wars, for example, Walwyn challenged not only royal absolutism but also Presbyterian intolerance, particularly in a series of pamphlets written against the heretic-hunting Thomas Edwards (see the selection from Edwards' Gangraena). Less flamboyant than the other Leveller leaders John Lilburne and Richard Overton, Walwyn complemented their work by focussing on the principles of justice, reason, and equity that underlay the Leveller platform. Some hostile contemporaries thought Walwyn's reasoned, persuasive arguments and his intellectual coherence made him the most dangerous Leveller polemicist. Some time in the 1650s, after the defeat of the Leveller movement, Walwyn appears to have become a lay physician, publishing pamphlets that advocated commonsense treatment of the sick and dispensing herbal medicines that, while they might not have cured patients, almost certainly did not harm them in the ways common to the period's more conventional remedies.

The Bloody Project displays Walwyn's central concern for the liberty of the individual conscience. Published in August 1648 at the height of the Second Civil War, Walwyn asks soldiers on both sides if they truly know why they are being asked to kill their fellow Englishmen. He urges his readers to examine the political and religious rhetoric used to justify the war, and points out how neither side has lived up to the promises implied in their rhetoric. The pamphlet concludes by asking what causes are truly worth fighting for, and answers the question with a sketch of key elements in the Leveller platform, including the supremacy of the Commons, religious toleration, and social and legal reform. For more on the Levellers, see the selections from the Putney Debates and Richard Overton.

The Bloody Project

In all undertakings which may occasion war or bloodshed, men have great need to be sure that their cause be right, both in respect of themselves and others: for if they kill men themselves, or cause others to kill, without a just cause, and upon the extremest necessity, they not only disturb the peace of men, and families, and bring misery and poverty upon a nation, but are indeed absolute murderers.

Nor will it in any measure satisfy the conscience, or God's justice, to go on in uncertainties, for in doubtful cases men ought to stand still, and consider, until certainty do appear, especially when killing and slaying of men (the most horrid work to nature and scripture) is in question.

Far be it from any man hastily to engage in any undertaking which may occasion a war, before the cause he is to fight for be rightly and plainly stated, well considered, and thoroughly understood to be just, and of absolute necessity to be maintained; nothing being more abominable in the sight of God or good men, than such persons who run but to shed blood for money, or to support this or the other interest, but neither consider the cause for which they engage, nor ought else, but pay, interest, honour, &c. Such are they who so eagerly endeavour to support the interest of a King, by the destruction of the people's interest; the interest of the Scots against the interest of the English; the interest of the Independents, by the ruin of the Presbyterians: and because it best consists with their present honour, profit, or humours, make it their business to pick quarrels, and increase divisions and jealousies, that so they may fish in the waters which they themselves have troubled.

But let such know, who ever they be, that though they may and do for a while brave it out, and flourish, yet a time is coming, and draweth on apace, when for all the murders they have caused, and mischiefs they have committed, they shall come to judgement, and then their consciences will be as a thousand witnesses against them.

But especially let men pretending conscience take heed how they either engage themselves, or persuade others to engage to fight and kill men, for a cause not rightly stated, or not thoroughly understood to be just, and of necessity to be maintained; for it is one of the most unreasonable, unchristian, and unnatural things that can enter into the mind of man, though it be to be feared that more than a few that have of late, both in the city and country, been (and at present are) active to engage in killing and slaying of men, cannot acquit themselves of this abomination.

I beseech you (you that are so forward and active to engage in the defence of the King's, Presbyterian, or Independent interest, and yet know no just cause for either) consider, was it sufficient that the King at first invited you in general terms to join with him, for the defence of the true Protestant religion, his own just prerogatives, the privileges of Parliament, and the liberty of the subject; but never declared in particular what that Protestant religion was he would have defended, or what prerogative would please him, what privileges he would allow the Parliament, or what freedoms the people?

Or was it sufficient think you now, that the Parliament invited you at first upon general terms to fight for the maintenance of the true Protestant religion, the liberties of the people, and privileges of Parliament; when neither themselves knew, for ought is yet seen, nor you, nor anybody else, what they meant by the true Protestant religion, or what the liberties of the people were, or what those privileges of Parliament were, for which yet nevertheless thousands of men have been slain, and thousands of families destroyed?

It is very like that some of you that joined with the King upon his invitation thought that, though the King had formerly countenanced popery and superstition, [and] had stretched his prerogative to the oppression and destruction of his people, by patents, projects,[1] &c., yet for the future he would have been more zealous for the truth, and more tender of his people, and not have persisted (notwithstanding his new protestations) to maintain his old principles.

And so likewise many of you that joined with the Parliament, who had formerly seen, felt, or considered the persecution of godly conscientious people by the Bishops and their clergy, with the reproaches cast upon them, and their grievous and destructive imprisonment, did believe the Parliament, under the notion of religion, intended to free the nation from all compulsion in matters of religion, and from molestation or persecution for opinions, or non-conformity; and that all laws or statutes tending thereunto should have been repealed: But since you find (by killing and destroying their opposers) you have enabled them to perform all things that might concern your freedom, or be conducible to the peace of the Kingdom. But do you now find that they do mean that, or the contrary? And will your consciences give you leave any longer to fight or engage in the cause of religion, when already you see what fruits you and your friends reap thereby?

And no doubt many of you understood by the liberties of the people, that they intended to free the Commons in Parliament, the people's representative, from a negative voice in King or Lords,[1] and would have declared themselves the highest authority, and so would have proceeded to have removed the grievances of the Commonwealth: And when you had seen patents, projects, and ship money taken away,[2] the High Commission and Star Chamber abolished,[3] did you ever imagine to have seen men and women examined upon interrogatories, and questions against themselves,[4] and imprisoned for refusing to answer? Or to have seen Commoners frequently sentenced and imprisoned by the Lords? Did you ever dream that the oppressions of Committees would have exceeded those of the Council table;[5] or that in the place of patents and projects, you should have seen an excise established, ten-fold surpassing all those and ship money together? You thought rather that tithes would have been esteemed an oppression, and that trade would have been made perfectly free, and that customs if continued would have been abated, and not raised for the support of domineering factions, and enrichment of four or five great men, as they have been of late times, to the sorrow and astonishment of all honest men, and the great prejudice of the trade of the nation.

Doubtless you hoped that both laws and lawyers, and the proceeding in all courts, should have been abbreviated, and corrected, and that you should never more have seen a beggar in England.

You have seen the Commonwealth enslaved for want of Parliaments, and also by their sudden dissolution, and you rejoiced that this Parliament was not to be dissolved by the King; but did you conceive it would have sat seven years to so little purpose, or that it should ever have come to pass, to be esteemed a crime to move for the ending thereof? Was the perpetuating of this Parliament, and the oppressions they have brought upon you and yours, a part of that liberty of the people you fought for? Or was it for such a privilege of Parliament, that they only might have liberty to oppress at their pleasure, without any hope of remedy? If all these put together make not up the cause for which you fought, what was the cause? What have ye obtained to the people but these liberties, for they must not be called oppressions? These are the fruits of all those vast disbursements, and those thousands of lives that have been spent and destroyed in the late War.

And though the army seemed to be sensible of these gross jugglings, and declared and engaged against them, and professed that they took not pains as a mercenary army, hired to fight for the arbitrary ends of a state, but in judgement and conscience, for the preservation of their own and the people's just rights and liberties: Yet when they had prevailed against those their particular opposers, and accomplished the ends by them aimed at, all these things were forgotten, and those persons that appeared for the people's freedoms, by them esteemed and proceeded against as mutineers, or incendiaries.

[1] negative voice power of veto.

[2] ship money a controversial and unpopular tax levied by Charles I from 1635 to 1640.

[3] High Commission and Star Chamber respectively, the most unpopular ecclesiastical and secular courts. Both were associated with the maintenance of royal authority, and both were abolished by the Long Parliament.

[4] referring to the notorious oath ex officio, which required prisoners to answer questions against themselves even in the absence of the traditional two witnesses. The right against self-incrimination was a central plank in the Leveller platform of legal reform: Walwyn himself was jailed in 1649 for refusing on principle to answer questions.

[5] Committees...Council table that is, did you ever dream that committees of the House of Commons would prove as oppressive as the King's Privy Council?

In like manner, the present ruling party of Presbyterians make a great show of their apprehensions of the great slavery and servitude brought upon the people by the exercise of an arbitrary power in the Parliament, and by the jurisdiction of the sword in the hands of the army: They tell us that by this means the trade of the nation is destroyed, and that without the removal of these things, the peace of the nation cannot be secured. And it is exceeding true. But I beseech you consider, whether they do not revive the same play, and drive the same design, which was acted by the Parliament at first, and by the army the last summer.

First, they cry out against the exercise of an arbitrary power in the Parliament, and yet labour to invest it in the King, nay challenge the exercise of it by themselves: for what greater arbitrary power can there be in the world, than that a priest or two, and a few lay elders, under the name of a Presbytery, should have power to bind or loose, bring in, or cast out, save or destroy at their pleasure, and enforce all persons within the limits of their jurisdiction to believe as they believe and submit to whatever they command, or else to be by them delivered over to Satan.

Nay, if you look into those of that party of the magistracy of this city that are the great promoters of the present work: do there any men in the world exercise a more arbitrary power? Do not many of them act only by the rule of will and pleasure, and have they not openly professed themselves to be obliged to observe no other rule than discretion?

And though they decry against the power of the sword in the hands of the Independents, yet do they not with all their might labour to get it into the hands of the Presbyterians? and being there, will they not do that themselves, which they complain of in others? will they not say that there are gainsayers whose mouths must be stopped and with the sword rather than fail, and though Royalists or Independents may not use the sword to enforce their principles, yet Presbyterians may, as if all knowledge of the truth were centred in a Presbytery, consisting of half Scotch, half English, part Puritan, part Cavalier, lukewarm Christianity, neither hot nor cold, zealous for the truth which they know not, only by hearsay, and only because they love not Independency, that being too pure, nor Episcopacy, that being too profane, they will be between both (but not in a golden mean, for that were well), but more zealous than either in outward performances, but for the power of godliness. – I cease to judge, but we say we may know the tree by the fruit, and certain I am that thistles never bore figs.

But if you shall examine what grounds of freedom they propose in all their papers; what equal rules of justice they offer to be insisted on as a sure foundation for a lasting peace? Surely if you look but seriously into the bottom of their design, you will find that the peace they aim at is only their own, not the nation's; and that their own ease, honour and dominion, is the only thing they pursue, and so they could enjoy ease and plenty, and stretch themselves upon beds of down, they would never care what the poor country should suffer.

To be short, all the quarrel we have at this day in the kingdom, is no other than a quarrel of interests and parties, a pulling down of one tyrant to set up another, and instead of liberty, heaping upon ourselves a greater slavery than that we fought against: certainly this is the liberty that is so much strove for, and for which there are such fresh endeavours to engage men; but if you have not killed and destroyed men enough for this, go on and destroy, kill and slay, till your consciences are swollen so full with the blood of the people that they burst again, and upon your deathbeds may you see yourselves the most horrid murderers that ever lived, since the time that Cain killed his brother without a just cause; for where, or what is your cause? Believe it ye have a heavy reckoning to make, and must undergo a sad repentance, or it will go ill with you at the great day, when all the sophistry of your great reformers will serve you to little purpose, every man for himself being to give an account for the things which he hath done in the body, whether they be good or evil. Then it will serve you to little purpose to say, the King, Parliament, Army, Independents, Presbyterians, such an officer, magistrate, or minister deluded me; no more than it did Adam, to say the woman whom thou gavest, &c. It being thus decreed in heaven, the soul which sinneth shall surely die.

And though what is past cannot be recalled, yet it must be repented of, and special care taken for the future, that you sin no more in this kind, and either stand still or go right for the future, to which end, let these following directions be your guide.

1. You are to know, that a people living under a government, as this nation hath done, and doth, cannot lawfully put themselves into arms, or engage in war, to kill and slay men, but upon a lawful call and invitation from the supreme authority, or law-making power.

Now if the supreme authority of this nation were never yet so plainly declared, as that you understand certainly where it is, and who are invested therewith, you have then had no warrant for what you have done, nor have any plea in law for your indemnity, as some of all parties have lately found to their costs.

And that this point of supreme authority was ever certainly stated, is absolutely denied; for according to the common supposition, it is three estates, which till within these few years were ever taken to be 1) Lords Spiritual, 2) Lords Temporal, 3) the Commons in Parliament assembled.

Now if these three were essential and equal, as all former times seem to allow, how could the Lords Temporal and the Commons cast out the Lords Spiritual? For by the same rule, the Lords Spiritual and Lords Temporal might have cast out the Commons, but the casting out the bishops hath both answered the question, and ended the controversy.

Since when the supreme authority is pretended to rest in the King, Lords, and Commons; and if so, when did the King assent to your proceedings in this war, which all the art in the world will not persuade him to be for him, but against him, and to ruin him and his? Or when did the Parliament assent to the proceedings of you that joined with the King in the late war pretendedly raised for the defence of religion, the privileges of Parliament, and liberty of the subject; and if the supreme power reside in all three, King, Lords, and Commons, how can the King justly do anything without the consent of the Lords and Commons, or the Lords and Commons without the King? May not the King and Lords as justly proceed to make laws, war, or peace without the Commons as they without the King? If they are not equal, which of them are supreme, and declared and proved by convincing reason so to be? If any, that you are to observe? If none, what have you done? what can you lawfully do?

That there should be either three or two distinct estates equally supreme is an absurd nullity in government, for admit two of them agree, and not the third, then there can be no proceedings or determination, and if there be but two, as is now pretended, in Lords and Commons, whose ordinances have served (how justly judge you) to make war and confiscate men's estates: admit they agree not, then also nothing can be done, which in government is ridiculous to imagine; besides it is now a known case that their ordinances are not pleadable against the laws, and give no indemnity, which were they the known supreme authority, could not but be effectual. That the King single and alone is the supreme authority himself never pretended to it, claiming only a negative voice in the law-making power, by which rule nothing can be done without him, than which nothing is more unreasonable. The Lords also never pretended to more than an equal share with the Commons, which in effect is a negative voice and as unreasonable as in the King. And when the Commons have been by petitioners styled the supreme authority, they have punished the petitioners, and disclaimed the supreme authority: and as two years since, so very lately they have voted that the Kingdom shall be governed by King, Lords, and Commons; which is a riddle that no man understands; for who knoweth what appertains to the King, what to the Lords, or what to the House of Commons? It is all out as uncertain as at first; and if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for the battle? If by all your endeavours you cannot prevail to have the supreme authority declared and proved, how can you lawfully fight, or upon what grounds with a good conscience can you engage yourselves, or persuade others to engage in killing and slaying of men?

And if you should have the supreme authority rationally proved and declared to be in the Commons distinct from any other, as being the sole representative of the people; you must note that you are a free people, and are not to be pressed or enforced to serve in wars like horses and brute beasts, but are to use the understanding God hath given you, in judging of the cause, for defence whereof they desire you to fight, for it is not sufficient to fight by lawful authority, but you must be sure to fight for what is just: Lawful authority being sometimes mistaken, and many times so perverted and corrupted, as to command the killing and imprisoning men for doing that which is just and commendable, and for opposing what is unjust and destructive. Therefore as you are to forbear till you see the supreme authority distinctly and rationally stated; so also you are not to engage till the cause be expressly declared, lest after your next engagement you are as far to seek of a just cause as now you are; and after you have prevailed, instead of finding yourselves and your associates freemen, you find yourselves more enslaved than you were formerly. For by experience you now find you may be made slaves as effectually by a Parliament, as by any other kind of government; why then persist you to divide and fall into factions? to kill and slay men for you know not what, to advance the honor and interest of you know not whom; the King, Parliament, great men in the city and army can do nothing without you, to disturb the peace of the nation; upon you therefore both soldiers and people, who fight, pay and disburse your estates, is to be charged all the evil that hath been done; if you on all hands had not been and were not so hasty to engage for the advancement of interests to the prejudice of the nation, it is very likely we had not only escaped those late bloody turmoils that have happened among us, but also might prevent greater threatened dangers, which like an inundation begin to break in upon us. And if you now stop not, your consciences will be loaded with all that is to come, which threateneth far worse than what is past. Therefore, if ye are either men or Christians, hold your hands till you know what you fight for, and be sure that you have the truth of freedom in it, or never meddle, but desist, and let who will both fight and pay.

Certainly there is none so vile, considering what hath been said, that will again incur the guilt of murderers and fight before the cause be plainly stated and published, and if that were done as it ought to be, possibly it may be attained without fighting, and might have been all this while, the difference not being so great as was imagined. Besides, where is the man that would fight against the supreme authority, and a just cause? and certainly there is none of you (whether Royalists, Presbyterians, or Independents) so wicked as to desire to kill men without exceeding just grounds and upon the greatest necessity, it being the saddest work in the world.

For the preventing whereof, let us, I beseech you, examine what good things there are wanting, that are essential to the peace, freedom, and happiness of the nation, that may not be obtained without fighting.

1. Is there wanting the certain knowledge where the supreme authority is, and of right ought to be? It is confessed no one thing is more wanting, nor can the nation ever be quiet or happy without it.

But can it be anywhere justly and safely but in the House of Commons, who are chosen and trusted by the people? Certainly did men consider that in opposing thereof, they renounce and destroy their own freedoms, they would not do it for any thing in the world.

If the consideration of the manifold evils brought upon us by this House of Commons deter them, the next thing that is wanting is, That a set time be appointed for the ending of this Parliament, and a certainty for future Parliaments, both for their due elections, meeting, and dissolving: And who will be so unreasonable as to oppose any of these? certainly the number cannot be considerable.

Is it also necessary that Parliaments be abridged the power of impressing men, to serve as brute beasts in the wars, who will be against their being bounded therein? a good cause never wanted men, nor an authority that had money to pay them.

Hath it proved destructive in Parliaments to meddle in religion, and to compel and restrain in matters of God's worship? Are they evidently such things as cannot be submitted to judgment? Doth every man find it so that hath a living conscience? Who then will be against their binding herein, though they be entrusted to establish an uncompulsive public way of worship for the nation?

Is it unreasonable that any person should be exempt from those proceedings of law, unto which the generality of the people are to be subject? Who is there then that will not willingly have all from the highest to the lowest bound alike?

That Parliaments should have no power to punish any person for doing that which is not against a known declared law, or to take away general property, or to force men to answer to questions against themselves, or to order trials or proceed by any other ways than by twelve sworn men, who would not rejoice to have such boundaries?

Then, that the proceedings in law might be rectified, and all laws and the duty of magistrates written and published in English.[1] That the excise might have a speedy end, and no taxes but by way of subsidies. That trade might be free, and a less burdensome way for the maintenance of ministers be established, than that of tithes; and that work and necessaries be provided for all kind of poor people. Certainly for the obtaining of these things a man may justly adventure his life; all these being for a common good, and tend not to the setting up of any one party or faction of men.

These then are the causes to be insisted on, or nothing: And if the supreme authority adhere to this cause, they need neither fear Scotch, French, nor English enemies; but if they decline this cause, they are to be declined; the just freedom and happiness of a nation being above all constitutions, whether of Kings, Parliaments, or any other.

[1] written and published in English As part of their platform for reform of the legal system, the Levellers called for the translation of England's laws from Anglo-Norman ("Law French") into English so they could be understood by everyone, without the need for legal training. The legal profession successfully withstood this particular reform until well after the period covered by this anthology.

For shame therefore (Royalists, Presbyterians, Independents), before you murder another man hold forth your cause plainly and expressly; and if any adversaries appear either within or without the land, reason it out with them if it be possible, deal as becometh Christians, argue, persuade, and use all possible means to prevent another war, and greater bloodshed; your great ones, whether the King, Lords, Parliament men, rich citizens, &c. feel not the miserable effects thereof, and so cannot be sensible; but you and your poor friends that depend on farms, trades, and small pay, have many an aching heart when these live in all pleasure and deliciousness. The accursed thing is accepted by them, wealth and honor, and both come by the bleeding miserable distractions of the Commonwealth, and they fear an end of trouble would put an end to their glory and greatness.

Oh therefore all you soldiers and people that have your consciences alive about you, put to your strength of judgment, and all the might you have to prevent a further effusion of blood; let not the covetous, the proud, the bloodthirsty man bear sway amongst you; fear not their high looks, give no ear to their charms, their promises, or tears; they have no strength without you, forsake them and ye will be strong for good, adhere to them, and they will be strong to evil; for which you must answer, and give an account at the last day.

The King, Parliament, great men in the city and army, have made you but the stairs by which they have mounted to honour, wealth, and power. The only quarrel that hath been, and at present is but this, namely, whose slaves the people shall be. All the power that any hath, was but a trust conveyed from you to them, to be employed by them for your good; they have mis-employed their power, and instead of preserving you, have destroyed you: all power and authority is perverted from the King to the constable, and it is no other but the policy of statesmen to keep you divided by creating jealousies and fears among you, to the end that their tyranny and injustice may pass undiscovered and unpunished; but the people's safety is the supreme law; and if a people must not be left without a means to preserve itself against the King, by the same rule they may preserve themselves against the Parliament and army too, if they pervert the end for which they received their power, to wit the nation's safety; therefore speedily unite yourselves together, and as one man stand up for the defence of your freedom, and for the establishment of such equal rules of government for the future, as shall lay a firm foundation of peace and happiness to all the people without partiality. Let justice be your breastplate, and you shall need to fear no enemies, for you shall strike a terror to your now insulting oppressors, and force all the nation's peace to fly before you. Prosecute and prosper.

POSTSCRIPT

Can there be a more bloody project than to engage men to kill one another, and yet no just cause declared? Therefore I advise all men that would be esteemed religious or rational, really to consider what may be done for the future that is conducible to the peace of the nation. If the peace of the nation cannot be secured without the restoration of the King, let it be done speedily and honorably, and provide against his mis-government for the future; let his power be declared and limited by law.

If the peace of the nation cannot be secured by the continuance of this Parliament, let a period be set for the dissolution thereof, but first make certain provision for the successive calling, electing and sitting of Parliaments for the future; let their privileges be declared and power limited, as to what they are empowered and what not; for doubtless in Parliaments rightly constituted consists the freedom of a nation. And in all things do as you would be done unto, seek peace with all men.

But above all things, abandon your former actings for a King against a Parliament, or an army against both; for the Presbyterians against the Independents, &c., for in so doing you do but put a sword into your enemies' hands to destroy you, for hitherto, which of them soever were in power, they played the tyrants and oppressed, and so it will ever be when parties are supported. Therefore if you engage at all, do it by lawful authority, let your cause be declared, and just also, and let it be for the good of the whole nation, without which you will not only hazard being slaves, but also contract upon yourselves and posterities the guilt of murderers.

John Earle
?1601 – 1665

Educated at Christ Church and Merton College, Oxford, Earle received his MA in 1624 and was successively appointed Proctor of the University (1631), chaplain to the Earl of Pembroke, chaplain and tutor to the future Charles II (1641), and Chancellor of Salisbury Cathedral. Earle was a member of the famous literary and theological circle that surrounded Lucius Cary, second Viscount Falkland, at Great Tew, a group that included among others Jonson, Suckling, Waller, and Clarendon. Like most Royalist divines, Earle was deprived of his offices during the civil wars, and he travelled with the exiled court to France, where he served as Charles II's chaplain and made a Latin translation of Eikon Basilike, ascribed by Royalists to Charles I. At the Restoration he was appointed Dean of Westminster, and ended his career as Bishop of Salisbury, a position from which he opposed the persecution of Nonconformists. His friends in later life included Pepys and Evelyn, and he was admired by people across the political and religious spectrum: Clarendon wrote that Earle "was amongst the few excellent men who never had, nor never could have, an enemy."

The following literary "characters" are from Earle's collection Microcosmography, published in 1628 but written while he was a student at Oxford. The book was very successful, going through numerous editions in his lifetime. Like all character-writers (see the selections by Breton, Felltham, Butler and the Overburian character), Earle followed the model provided by the Greek writer Theophrastus. Earle's characters, however, tend to reflect his moderation of temper, and some respond to the Overburian writers' harsher and more satiric portraits.

To the Reader, Genteel or Gentle

I have for once adventured to play the midwife's part, helping to bring forth these infants into the world which the father would have smothered, who, having left them lapped up in loose sheets, as soon as his fancy was delivered of them, written especially for his private recreation to pass away the time in the country, and by the forcible request of friends drawn from him, yet passing severally from hand to hand in written copies grew at length to be a pretty number in a little volume; and among so many sundry dispersed transcripts some very imperfect and surreptitious had like to have passed the press if the author had not used speedy means to prevention, when, perceiving the hazard he ran to be wronged, was unwillingly willing to let them pass as now they appear to the world. If any faults have escaped the press—as few books can be printed without—impose them not on the author, I intreat thee, but rather impute them to mine and the printer's oversight, who seriously promise on the reimpression hereof by greater care and diligence for this our former default to make thee ample satisfaction. In the meantime I remain

A Child

Is a man in a small letter, yet the best copy of Adam before he tasted of Eve or the apple; and he is happy whose small practice in the world can only write his character. He is nature's fresh picture newly drawn in oil, which time, and much handling, dims and defaces. His soul is yet a white paper unscribbled with observations of the world, wherewith, at length, it becomes a blurred notebook. He is purely happy, because he knows no evil, nor hath made means by sin to be acquainted with misery. He arrives not at the mischief of being wise, nor endures evils to come, by foreseeing them. He kisses and loves all, and, when the smart of the rod is past, smiles on his beater. Nature and his parents alike dandle him and entice him on with a bait of sugar to a draught of wormwood. He plays yet, like a young 'prentice the first day, and is not come to his task of melancholy. All the language he speaks yet is tears, and they serve him well enough to express his necessity. His hardest labor is his tongue, as if he were loath to use so deceitful an organ; and he is best company with it when he can but prattle. We laugh at his foolish sports, but his game is our earnest; and his drums, rattles, and hobby-horses, but the emblems and mocking of man's business. His father hath writ him as his own little story, wherein he reads those days of his life that he cannot remember, and sighs to see what innocence he has out-lived. The older he grows, he is a stair lower than God; and, like his first father, much worse in his breeches.[1] He is the Christian's example, and the old man's relapse; the one imitates his pureness, and the other falls into his simplicity. Could he put off his body with his little coat, he had got eternity without a burden, and exchanged but one heaven for another.

A Surgeon

Is one that has some business about this building or little house of man, whereof nature is as it were the tiler, and he the plasterer. It is ofter out of reparations than an old parsonage,[2] and then he is set on work to patch it again. He deals most with broken commodities, as a broken head or a mangled face, and his gains are very ill got, for he lives by the hurts of the commonwealth.[3] He differs from a physician as a sore does from a disease, or the sick from those that are not whole; the one distempers you within, the other blisters you without.[4] He complains of the decay of valour in these days, and sighs for that slashing age of sword and buckler; and thinks the law against duels was made merely to wound his vocation.[5] He had been long since undone if the charity of the stews had not relieved him,[6] from whom he has his tribute as duly as the pope; or a wind-fall sometimes from a tavern, if a quart pot hit right. The rareness of his custom makes him pitiless when it comes, and he holds a patient longer than our courts a cause. He tells you what danger you had been in if he had stayed but a minute longer, and though it be but a pricked finger, he makes of it much matter. He is a reasonable cleanly man, considering the scabs he has to deal with, and your finest ladies are now and then beholden to him for their best dressings. He curses old gentlewomen and their charity that makes his trade their alms; but his envy is never stirred so much as when gentlemen go over to fight upon Cal-

Paul's Walk[2]

Is the land's epitome, or you may call it the lesser Isle of Great Britain. It is more than this, the whole world's map, which you may here discern in its perfectest motion, justling and turning. It is a heap of stones and men, with a vast confusion of languages; and were the steeple not sanctified, nothing liker Babel. The noise in it is like that of bees, a strange humming or buzz mixed of walking tongues and feet: it is a kind of still roar or loud whisper. It is the great exchange of all discourse, and no business whatsoever but is here stirring and a-foot. It is the synod of all pates politic, jointed and laid together in most serious posture, and they are not half so busy at the Parliament. It is the antic of tails to tails, and backs to backs, and for vizards you need go no further than faces. It is the market of young lecturers, whom you may cheapen here at all rates and sizes. It is the general mint of all famous lies, which are here like the legends of popery, first coined and stamped in the church. All inventions are emptied here, and not few pockets. The best sign of a temple in it is, that it is the thieves' sanctuary, which rob more safely in the crowd than a wilderness, whilst every searcher is a bush to hide them. It is the other expense of the day, after plays, tavern, and a bawdy-house; and men have still some oaths left to swear here. The visitants are all men without exceptions, but the principal inhabitants and possessors are stale knights and captains out of service; men of long rapiers and breeches, which after all turn merchants here and traffic for news. Some make it a preface to their dinner, and travel for a stomach; but thriftier men make it their ordinary, and board here very cheap. Of all such places it is least haunted with hobgoblins, for if a ghost would walk more, he could not.

Felltham was a popular writer in his lifetime, and his Resolves played an important role in the development of the English essay, but relatively little is known of their author. Born into the prosperous Suffolk gentry, Felltham was probably educated by private tutors. From the early 1630s to the end of his life he served as steward to the Earls of Thomond in Northamptonshire. He was, however, well known in London literary circles: in addition to publishing the Resolves, he wrote poems that appear to have circulated widely in manuscript, and he contributed to a collection of lyrics in honour of Ben Jonson and to other printed miscellanies. He added 41 of his poems to the 1661 edition of the Resolves. His other works include A Brief Character of the Low Countries, which circulated in manuscript and in pirated editions until an authorized version appeared in 1652. Felltham's "Epitaph to the Eternal Memory of Charles the First," which includes the line "Here Charles the First, and Christ the second lies," indicates that he was an ardent Royalist, though he seems not to have played any active role in the civil wars.

The first edition of the Resolves, comprising 100 short, untitled prose works, appeared in 1623, before Felltham was twenty years old. He added 100 longer, titled essays in 1628, and this "duple century" reached seven editions by 1647. In 1661, Felltham revised or replaced the original century with 85 lengthier, more personal essays; this folio edition was reissued three more times before the end of the century. In this selection, "A Rule for Reading Authors" is one of the original century; the remainder were added in 1628. The translations are all Felltham's own. He often does not identify the source of his quotations: the essay, he explains, "of all writing is the nearest to a running discourse," a kind of conversation in which notes would be pedantic and ungentlemanly. For other examples of the essay form, see the selections from Francis Bacon; for the literary "character," see the selections from Nicholas Breton, John Earle, Samuel Butler, and the Overburan Character.

OF PURITANS

I find many that are called Puritans; yet few, or none that will own the name.[1] Whereof the reason sure is this; that 'tis for the most part held a name of infamy; and is so new, that it hath scarcely yet obtained a definition: nor is it an appellation derived from one man's name, whose tenets we may find, digested into a volume: whereby we do much err in the application. It imports a kind of excellency above another; which man (being conscious of his own frail bendings) is ashamed to assume to himself. So that I believe there are men which would be Puritans: but indeed not any that are. One will have him one that lives religiously, and will not revel it in a shoreless excess. Another, him that separates from our divine assemblies.[2] Another, him that in some tenets only is peculiar. Another, him that will not swear. Absolutely to define him, is a work, I think, of difficulty; some I know that rejoice in the name; but sure they be such, as least understand it. As he is more generally in these times taken, I suppose we may call him a Church-rebel, or one that would exclude order,[1] that his brain might rule. To decline offences; to be careful and conscionable in our several actions, is a purity that every man ought to labour for, which we may well do, without a sullen segregation from all society. If there be any privileges, they are surely granted to the children of the King;[2] which are those that are the children of Heaven. If mirth and recreations be lawful, sure such a one may lawfully use it. If wine were given to cheer the heart, why should I fear to use it for that end? Surely, the merry soul is freer from intended mischief, than the thoughtful man. A bounded mirth, is a patent adding time and happiness to the crazed life of man. Yet if Laertius reports him rightly, Plato deserves a censure for allowing drunkenness at festivals; because, says he, as then, the Gods themselves reach wines to present men.[3] God delights in nothing more than in a cheerful heart, careful to perform him service. What parent is it, that rejoiceth not to see his child pleasant, in the limits of a filial duty? I know, we read of Christ's weeping, not of his laughter: yet we see, he graceth a feast with his first miracle; and that a feast of joy: And can we think that such a meeting could pass without the noise of laughter? What a lump of quickened care is the melancholic man! Change anger into mirth, and the precept will hold good still: Be merry, but sin not. As there be many, that in their life assume too great a liberty; so I believe there are some, that abridge themselves of what they might lawfully use. Ignorance is an ill steward, to provide for either soul, or body. A man that submits to reverent order, that sometimes unbends himself in a moderate relaxation; and in all, labours to approve himself, in the sereneness of a healthful conscience: such a Puritan I will love immutably. But when a man, in things but ceremonial,[4] shall spurn at the grave authority of the Church, and out of a needless nicety, be a thief to himself of those benefits which God hath allowed him: or out of a blind and uncharitable pride, censure and scorn others as reprobates: or out of obstinacy, fill the world with brawls about undeterminable tenets: I shall think him one of those, whose opinion hath fevered his zeal to madness and distraction. I have more faith in one Solomon, than in a thousand Dutch parlours of such opinionists.[5] Behold then, what I have seen good! That it is comely to eat, and to drink, and to take pleasure in all his labour wherein he travaileth under the sun, the whole number of the days of his life, which God giveth him. For, this is his portion. Nay, "there is no profit to man, but that he eat, and drink, and delight his soul with the profit of his labour."[6] For, he that saw other things but vanity, saw this also, that it was the hand of God. Me thinks the reading of Ecclesiastes, should make a Puritan undress his brain, and lay off all those fanatic toys that jingle about his understanding. For my own part, I think the world hath not better men, than some that suffer under that name: nor withal, more scelestic villainies.[7] For, when they are once elated with that pride, they so contemn others, that they infringe the laws of all humane society.

[1] Puritans Almost always used pejoratively, the term "Puritan" first appeared in the late 1560s to describe the more extreme English Protestants who sought to "purify" the Elizabethan Church of the remnants of Catholicism. As Felltham points out, the term was flexible, a polemical signifier rather than a strict party label.

[2] him that separates Separatists (later called Independents or Congregationalists) believed in the autonomy of each local congregation, thereby challenging the legal, financial, and disciplinary authority of the state church.

[1] order Anglican liturgy and ritual.

[2] King God.

[3] That is, they pass wine to the mortals present. Diogenes Laertius in fact says only that Plato approved of drinking at the "feasts of the god who was the giver of wine" (Lives of Eminent Philosophers, III.39).

[4] in things but ceremonial The status of church ceremonies was hotly debated: many reformers believed them "adiaphora" ("things indifferent" or unnecessary to salvation) and argued that participation in ceremonies not explicitly commanded by the Scriptures should not be compulsory.

[5] Dutch parlours Many English reformers moved to Holland in the early seventeenth century. Felltham contrasts the presumably endless arguments of these "opinionists" with the decisiveness of the famously wise biblical king.

[6] a paraphrase of Ecclesiastes 2:24. The "he" of the next sentence is the speaker in Ecclesiastes, who concluded that "all was vanity" (in 1:2, 2:11).

OF POVERTY

The poverty of the poor man is the least part of his misery. In all the storms of fortune, he is the first that must stand the shock of extremity. Poor men are perpetual sentinels, watching in the depth of night against the incessant assaults of want; while the rich lie stoved in secure reposes:[1] and compassed with a large abundance. If the land be russeted with a bloodless famine,[2] are not the poor the first that sacrifice their lives to hunger? If war thunders in the trembling country's lap, are not the poor those that are exposed to the enemy's sword and outrage? If the plague, like a loaded sponge, flies, sprinkling poison through a populous kingdom, the poor are the fruit that are shaken from the burdened tree: while the rich, furnished with the helps of fortune, have means to wind out themselves, and turn these sad indurances on the poor,[3] that cannot avoid them. Like salt marshes, that lie low, they are sure, whensoever the sea of this world rages, to be first under, and imbarrenn'd with a fretting care.[4] Who like the poor are harrowed with oppression, ever subject to the imperious taxes, and the gripes of mightiness? Continual care checks the spirit: continual labour checks the body: and continual insultation both. He is like one rolled in a vessel full of pikes; which way soever he turns, he something finds that pricks him. Yet besides all these, there is another transcendent misery: and this is, that it maketh men contemptible.

> Nil habet infoelix, &c.[5]
> Unhappy want hath nothing harder in it,
> Than that it makes men scorned.——

As if the poor man were but fortune's dwarf; made lower than the rest of men, to be laughed at. The philosopher (though he were the same mind, and the same man) in his squalid rags, could not find admission, when better robes procured both an open door, and reverence. Though outward things can add nothing to our essential worth: yet, when we are judged on, by the help of others' outward senses, they much conduce to our value or disesteem. A diamond set in brass would be taken for a crystal, though it be not so, whereas a crystal set in gold will by many be thought a diamond. A poor man wise, shall be thought a fool; though he have nothing to condemn him but his being poor. The complaint is as old as Solomon: "The wisdom of the poor is despised; and his words not heard" [Ecclesiastes 9:16]. Poverty is a gulf, wherein all good parts are swallowed. Poor men, though wise, are but like satins without a gloss; which every man will refuse to look upon. Poverty is a reproach, which clouds the lustre of the purest virtue. It turns the wise man fool, to humour him that is a fool. Good parts in poverty show like beauty after sickness; pallid and pulingly deadish. And if all these calamities be but attendants, what may we judge that she is in herself? Undoubtedly, whatsoever we preach of contentedness in want, no precepts can so gain upon Nature, as to make her a non-sensitive. 'Tis impossible to find content in gnawing penury. Lack of things necessary, like a heavy load, and an ill saddle, is perpetually wringing of the back that bears it. Extreme poverty one calls a lantern, that lights us to all miseries. And without doubt, when 'tis urgent and importunate, it is ever chafing, upon the very heart of nature. What pleasure can he have in life, whose whole life is gripped by some or other misfortune? Living no time free, but that, wherein he does not live, his sleep. His mind is ever at jar, either with desire, fear, care, or sorrow: his appetite unappeasedly craving supply of food, for his body; which is either numbed with cold, in idleness; or stewed in sweat, with labour: nor can it be, but it will imbase even the purest metal in man:[1] it will alchemy the gold of virtue, and mix it with more dull alloy. It will make a man submit to those coarse ways, which another estate would scorn: nay, it will not suffer the soul to exercise that generous freedom, which equal nature has given it; but hales it to such low indecencies, as pull disdain upon it. Counsel and discretion, either quite leave a man; or else are so limited, by irresistible necessity, as they lose the brightness that they use to shine withal.

Crede mihi, miseros, prudentia prima reliquit,
Et sensus cum re, consiliumque fugit.[2]

Believe it, wisdom leaves the man distressed:
With wealth, both wit and counsel quits the breast.

Certainly, extreme poverty is worse than abundance. We may be good in plenty, if we will: in biting penury we cannot, though we would. In one, the danger is casual: in the other, 'tis necessitating. The best is that which partakes of both, and consists of neither. He that hath too little, wants feathers to fly withal: He that hath too much, is but cumbered with too large a tail. If a flood of wealth could profit us, it would be good to swim in such a sea: but it can neither lengthen our lives, nor enrich us after the end. I am pleased with that epigram, which is so like Diogenes,[3] that it makes him bite in his grave:

Effigiem, Rex Croese, tuam ditissime regum,
  Vidit apud manes, Diogenes Cynicus:
Constitit; utque procul, solito maiore cachinno
  Concussus, dixit: Quid tibi divitiae
Nunc prosunt, Regum Rex ô ditissime, cùm sis
  Sicut ego solus, me quoque pauperior?
Nam quaecunque habui, mecum fero, cùm nihil ipse
  Ex tantis tecum, Croese, fer as opibus:

When the Tubbed Cynic went to Hell, and there
Found the pale ghost of golden Croesus bare,
He stops, and jeering till he shuggs again,[4]
Says: O thou richest King of Kings, what gain
Have all thy large heaps brought thee, since I spy
Thee here alone, and poorer now than I?
For, all I had, I with me bring: but thou,
Of all thy wealth, hast not one farthing now.

Of what little use does he make the mines of this same opulent man? Surely, estates be then best, when they are likest minds that be worst: I mean, neither hot, nor cold: neither distended with too much, nor narrowly pent with too little: yet nearer to a plenty than want. We may be at ease in a room larger than ourselves: in a room that is less, we cannot. We need not use more than will serve: but we cannot use less. We see all things grow violent, and struggle, when we would imprison them in anything less than themselves. Fire, shut up, is furious. Exhalations inclouded, break out with thunder. Water, compressed, spurteth through the stretched strainer. 'Tis harder to contract many grains into one, than to cause many spring out of one. Where the channel is too little for the flood, who can wonder at the overflowing.

Quisquis inops peccat, minor est reus.

He is less guilty, that offends for want;

was the charity of Petronius Arbiter.[5] There is not in the world such another object of pity, as the pinched state; which no man being secured from, I wonder at the tyrant's braves, and contempt. Questionless, I will rather with charity help him that is miserable, as I may be; than despise him that is poor, as I would not be. They have flinty and steeled hearts, that can add calamities to him, that is already but one entire mass.

Of Woman

Some are so uncharitable, as to think all women bad: and others are so credulous, as they believe they all are good. Sure: though every man speaks as he finds, there is reason to direct our opinion, without experience of the whole sex; which in a strict examination, makes more for their honour, than most men have acknowledged. At first, she was created his equal; only the difference was in the sex: otherwise, they both were Man. If we argue from the text, that male and female made man: so the man being put first, was worthier. I answer, "So the evening and the morning was the first day": yet few will think the night the better.[1] That man is made her governor, and so above her, I believe rather the punishment of her sin, than the prerogative of his worth: Had they both stood, it may be thought, she had never been in that subjection: for then had it been no curse, but a continuance of her former estate: which had nothing but blessedness in it. Peter Martyr indeed is of opinion, that man before the fall, had priority: But Chrysostome, he says does doubt it.[2] All will grant her body more admirable, more beautiful than man's: fuller of curiosities, and noble nature's wonders: both for conception, and fostering the producted birth. And can we think God would put a worser soul into a better body? When man was created, 'tis said, "God made man": but when woman, 'tis said, "God builded her": as if he had then been about a frame of rarer rooms, and more exact composition.[3] And, without doubt, in her body, she is much more wonderful: and by this, we may think her so in her mind. Philosophy tells us, though the soul be not caused by the body, yet in the general it follows the temperament of it: so the comeliest outsides are naturally (for the most part) more virtuous within. If place can be any privilege, we shall find her built in Paradise, when man was made without it. 'Tis certain, they are by constitution colder than the boiling man:[4] so by this, more temperate: 'tis heat that transports man to immoderation and fury: 'tis that, which hurries him to a savage and libidinous violence. Women are naturally the more modest: and modesty is the seat and dwelling place of virtue. Whence proceed the most abhorred villainies, but from a masculine unblushing impudence? What a deal of sweetness do we find in a mild disposition? When a woman grows bold and daring, we dislike her, and say, "she is too like a man": yet in our selves, we magnify what we condemn in her. Is not this injustice? Every man is so much the better, by how much he comes nearer to God. Man in nothing is more like him, than in being merciful. Yet woman is far more merciful than man: It being a sex, wherein pity and compassion have dispersed far brighter rays. God is said to be love; and I am sure, everywhere woman is spoken of, for transcending in that quality. It was never found, but in two men only, that their love exceeded that of the feminine sex: and if you observe them, you shall find they were both of melting dispositions.[5] I know, when they prove bad, they are a sort of the vilest creatures: yet still the same reason gives it: for, Optima corrupta, pessima: the best things corrupted, become the worst. They are things, whose souls are of a more ductible temper,[1] than the harder metal of man: so may be made both better and worse. The representations of Sophocles and Euripides may be both true:[2] and for the tongue-vice, talkativeness, I see not but at meetings men may very well vie words with them. 'Tis true, they are not of so tumultuous a spirit, so not so fit for great actions. Natural heat does more actuate the stirring genius of man. Their easy natures make them somewhat more unresolute; whereby men have argued them of fear and inconstancy. But men have always held the Parliament, and have enacted their own wills, without ever hearing them speak: and then, how easy is it to conclude them guilty? Besides, education makes more difference between men and them, than nature: and all their aspersions are less noble, for that they are only from their enemies, men. Diogenes snarled bitterly when, walking with another, he spied two women talking, and said, "See, the viper and the asp are changing poison." The poet was conceited that said, after they were made ill, that God made them fearful, that man might rule them; otherwise they had been past dealing with. Catullus his conclusion was too general, to collect a deceit in all women, because he was not confident of his own:

My mistress swears, she'd leave all men for me:
Yea, though that Jove himself should suitor be.
She says it: but, what women swear to kind
Loves, may be writ in rapid streams, and wind.

I am resolved to honour virtue, in what sex soever I find it. And I think, in the general, I shall find it more in women, than men; though weaker, and more infirmly guarded. I believe, they are better, and may be wrought to be worse. Neither shall the faults of many, make me uncharitable to all: nor the goodness of some, make me credulous of the rest. Though hitherto, I confess, I have not found more sweet and constant goodness in man, than I have found in woman: and yet of these, I have not found a number.

OF POETS AND POETRY

Surely he was a little wanton with his leisure, that first invented poetry. 'Tis but a play, which makes words dance, in the evenness of a cadency: yet without doubt, being a harmony, it is nearer to the mind than prose: for that itself is a harmony in height. But the words being rather the drossy part, conceit I take to be the principal. And here though it digresseth from truth, it flies above her, making her more rare, by giving curious raiment to her nakedness. The name the Grecians gave the men that wrote thus, showed how much they honoured it: they called them makers.[4] And had some of them had power to put their conceits in art, how near would they have come to deity? And for the virtues of men; they rest not on the bare demeanour, but slide into imagination: so proposing things above us, they kindle the reader to wonder and imitation. And certainly, poets that write thus, Plato never meant to banish.[5] His own practice shows he excluded not all. He was content to hear Antimachus recite his poem, when all the herd had left him: and he himself wrote both tragedies and other pieces. Perhaps he found them a little too busy with his gods: and he being the first that made philosophy divine, and rational, was modest in his own beginnings. Another name they had of honour too, and that was Vates.[1] Nor know I how to distinguish between the prophets and poets of Israel. What is Jeremiah's Lamentation, but a kind of Sapphic elegy?[2] David's Psalms are not only poems; but songs, snatches and raptures of a flaming spirit. And this indeed I observe, to the honour of poets; I never found them covetous, or scrapingly-base. The Jews had not two such Kings in all their catalogue, as Solomon, and his father; poets both.[3] There is a largeness in their souls, beyond the narrowness of other men: and why may we not then think, this may embrace more, both of Heaven, and God? I cannot but conjecture this to be the reason, that they, most of them, are poor: They find their minds so solaced with their own flights, that they neglect the study of growing rich: and this, I confess again, I think, turns them to vice, and unmanly courses. Besides, they are for the most part mighty lovers of their palates; and this is known an impoverisher. Antigonus, in the tented field, found Antagoras cooking of a conger himself.[4] And they all are friends to the grape and liquor: though I think, many, more out of a ductible nature, and their love to pleasant company, than their affection to the juice alone. They are all of free natures; and are the truest definition of that philosopher's man, which gives him, animal risible.[5] Their grossest fault is, that you may conclude them sensual: yet this does not touch them all. Ingenious for the most part they are. I know there be some rhyming fools; but what have they to do with poetry? When Sallust would tell us that Sempronia's wit was not ill, says he,—Potuit versus facere, & jocum movere: She could make a verse, and break a jest.[6] Something there is in it more than ordinary: in that it is all in such measured language, as may be marred by reading. I laugh heartily at Philoxenus his jest, who passing by, and hearing some masons mis-sensing his lines (with their ignorant sawing of them), falls to breaking their bricks amain: They ask the cause, and he replies, They spoil his work, and he theirs. Certainly, a worthy poet is so far from being a fool, that there is some wit required in him that shall be able to read him well: and without the true accent, numbered poetry does lose of the gloss. It was a speech becoming an able poet of our own, when a Lord read his verses crookedly, and he beseeched his Lordship, not to murder him in his own lines. He that speaks false Latin, breaks Priscian's head:[7] but he that repeats a verse ill, puts Homer out of joint. One thing commends it beyond oratory: it ever complieth to the sharpest judgements. He is the best orator that pleaseth all; even the crowd and clowns. But poetry would be poor, that they should all approve of. If the learned and judicious like it, let the throng bray. These, when 'tis best, will like it the least. So, they contemn what they understand not: and the neglected poet falls by want. Calpurnius makes one complain the misfortune.

> Rather the mast, and blood-red cornill choose.[1]
> Go lead thy flocks to milking; sell and cry
> Milk through the city: What can learning buy,
> To keep back hunger? None my verses mind,
> But Echo babbling from these rocks and wind.

Two things are commonly blamed in poetry: nay, you take away that, if them: and these are lies, and flattery. But I have told them in the worst words: For, 'tis only to the shallow insight that they appear thus. Truth may dwell more clearly in an allegory, or a moraled fable, than in a bare narration. And for flattery, no man will take poetry literal: since in commendations, it rather shows what men should be, than what they are. If this were not, it would appear uncomely. But we all know, hyperboles in poetry, do bear a decency, nay, a grace along with them. The greatest danger that I find in it, is, that it wantons the blood, and imagination; as carrying a man in too high a delight. To prevent these, let the wise poet strive to be modest in his lines. First, that he dash not the Gods: next, that he injure not chastity, nor corrupt the ear with lasciviousness. When these are declined, I think a grave poem the deepest kind of writing. It wings the soul up higher, than the slacked pace of prose. Flashes that do follow the cup, I fear me, are too spritely to be solid: they run smartly upon the loose, for a distance or two; but then being foul, they give in, and tire. I confess, I love the sober muse, and fasting: From the other, matter cannot come so clear, but that it will be misted with the fumes of wine. Long poetry some cannot be friends withal: and indeed, it palls upon the reading. The wittiest poets have been all short, and changing soon their subject; as Horace, Martial, Juvenal, Seneca, and the two comedians.[2] Poetry should be rather like a coranto,[3] short, and nimbly-lofty; than a dull lesson, of a day long. Nor can it but be deadish, if distended: For, when 'tis right, it centers conceit, and takes but the spirit of things: and therefore foolish poesy, is of all writing the most ridiculous. When a goose dances, and a fool versifies, there is sport alike. He is twice an ass, that is a rhyming one. He is something the less unwise, that is unwise but in prose. If the subject be history, or contexted fable, then I hold it better put in prose, or blanks:[4] for ordinary discourse never shows so well in metre, as in the strain that it may seem to be spoken in: the commendation is, to do it to the life: Nor is this any other, than poetry in prose. Surely, though the world think not so, he is happy to himself, that can play the poet. He shall vent his passions by his pen, and ease his heart of their weight: and he shall often raise himself a joy in his raptures, which no man can perceive, but he. Sure, Ovid found a pleasure in't, even when he writ his Tristia.[5] It gently delivers the mind of distempers; and works the thoughts to a sweetness, in their searching conceit. I would not love it for a profession: and I would not want it for a recreation. I can make myself harmless, nay, amending mirth with it; while I should perhaps be trying of a worser pastime. And this I believe in it further, unless conversation corrupts his easiness, it lifts a man to nobleness; and is never in any rightly, but it makes him of a royal and capacious soul.

A Rule in Reading Authors

Some men read authors as our gentlemen use flowers, only for delight and smell, to please their fancy, and refine their tongue. Others like the bee, extract only the honey, the wholesome precepts, and this alone they bear away, leaving the rest as little worth, of small value. In reading I will care for both, though for the last, most: the one serves to instruct the mind; the other fits her to tell what she hath learned: pity it is, they should be divided: he that hath worth in him, and cannot express it, is a chest keeping a rich jewel, and the key lost. Concealing goodness, is vice; virtue is better by being communicated. A good style, with wholesome matter, is a fair woman with a virtuous soul, which attracts the eyes of all; the good man thinks chastely, and loves her beauty for her virtue; which he still thinks more fair, for dwelling in so fair an outside. The vicious man hath lustful thoughts; and he would for her beauty fain destroy her virtue: but coming to solicit his purpose, finds such divine lectures from her angel's tongue, and those delivered with so sweet a pleasing modesty, that he thinks virtue is dissecting her soul to him, to ravish man with a beauty which he dreamed not of. So he could now curse himself for desiring that lewdly, which he hath learned since only to admire and reverence: Thus he goes away better, that came with an intent to be worse. Quaint phrases on a good subject, are baits to make an ill man virtuous: how many vile men seeking these, have found themselves converts? I may refine my speech without harm: but I will endeavour more to reform my life. 'Tis a good grace both of oratory, or the pen, to speak or write proper: but that is the best work, where the Graces and the Muses meet.

Thomas Randolph

1605 – 1635

Randolph was born on June 15, 1605, at Newnham-cum-Badby, near Daventry, in Northamptonshire. His parents were William Randolph and Elizabeth, the daughter of Thomas Smith. William Randolph, according to Aubrey, "was very wild in his youth," and as a result was left one groat by his father. This was in effect disinheritance: the word "groat" was used to symbolize a very small sum, as in the title "A Groatsworth of Wit." Randolph's father, left to make his own way in the world, became a land-surveyor and steward to Sir George Goring in Sussex and to Lord Zouch in Northamptonshire. He resided at Little Houghton in Northamptonshire, which probably accounts for Randolph's acquaintance with Anthony Stafford. Randolph, like other poets represented in this anthology, was educated at Westminster School; he is said to have been very precocious at writing verse during his time there. From Westminster he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1624, taking his B.A. in 1628. He was a favourite son of the college—a letter exists which indicates that the Bishop of Bath and Wells, then the Master of Trinity, thought very highly of him; in 1632 he took his M.A. degree and became a college Fellow. He probably made the acquaintance of Ben Jonson in London during a period when the University was closed due to plague; various anecdotes suggest that Jonson adopted him as one of his "sons." In March 1632 his play, The Jealous Lovers, was acted before the King and Queen at Trinity College; another play, Amyntas, was, according to the quarto volume published in 1638, "acted before the King and Queen at White-hall." According to Anthony à Wood it was "indulging himself too much with the liberal conversation of his admirers (a thing incident to poets)" which "brought him, untimely to his end." Wood was notoriously malicious, but evidence from people well-disposed to Randolph suggests that his health, never robust, may have been undermined by excessive drinking. He died at the Staffords' house at Blatherwycke. A volume, Poems, with The Muses Looking-glass and Amyntas, was published three years after his death by his brother Robert; it is regarded as a carefully supervised publication. At his death Randolph's work was praised, perhaps excessively; in our time he has been too much ignored. His poems draw upon extensive knowledge of classical literature, and in that sense may be thought conventional; but there is enough enjoyment in reading him to suggest that he might have matured into a poet of considerable achievement.

The Second Epode of Horace Translated[1]

Happy the man which, far from city care
    (Such as ancient mortals were),
With his own oxen ploughs his father's land,
    Free from usurer's griping hand.
The soldier's trumpets never break his sleep,
    Nor angry seas that raging keep;
He shuns the wrangling hall, nor foot doth set
    On the proud thresholds of the great.
His life is this (O life almost divine!)
    To marry elms unto the vine;
To prune unfruitful branches, and for them
    To graft a bough of happier stem.
Or else within the low-couched valleys views
    His well-clothed flocks of bleating ewes.
Sometimes his honey he in pots doth keep:
    Sometimes he shears his fleecy sheep.
And when his fruits with autumn ripened be
    Gathers his apples from the tree.
And joys to taste the pears himself did plant,

---

[1] Compare Ben Jonson's rendering of the same poem by Horace.

And grapes that nought of purple want.
Under an oak sometimes he lays his head,
Making the tender grass his bed.
Meanwhile the streams along their banks do float,
And birds do chaunt with warbling throat;
And gentle springs a gentle murmur keep,
To lull him to a quiet sleep.
When winter comes, and th' air doth chiller grow,
Threat'ning showers and shivering snow,
Either with hounds he hunts the tusked swine,
That foe unto the corn and vine;
Or lays his nets, or limes the unctuous bush
To catch the blackbird, or the thrush.
Sometimes the hare he courses, and one way
Makes both a pleasure and a prey.
But if with him a modest wife doth meet,
To guide his house and children sweet,
Such as the Sabine or Apulian wife,
Something brown, but chaste of life;
Such as will make a good warm fire to burn
Against her wearied mate's return,
And shutting in her stalls her fruitful neat,[1]
Will milk the kine's distended teat:
Fetching her husband of her self-brewed beer,
And other wholesome country cheer.
Sup him with bread and cheese, pudding or pie,
Such dainties as they do not buy:
Give me but these, and I shall never care
Where all the Lucrine oysters are:
These wholesome country dainties shall to me
Sweet as tench or sturgeon be.
Had I but these, I well could be without
The carp, the salmon, or the trout:
Nor should the Phoenix' self so much delight
My not ambitious appetite,
As should an apple snatched from mine own trees,
Or honey of my labouring bees.
My cattle's udders should afford me food,
My sheep my cloth, my ground my wood.
Sometimes a lamb, snatched from the wolf, shall be
A banquet for my friend and me:
Sometimes a calf, ta'en from her lowing cow,
Or tender issue of the sow.
Our gardens sallets yield, mallows to keep
Loose bodies, lettuce for to sleep.
The cackling hen an egg for breakfast lays,
And duck that in our water plays.
The goose for us her tender plumes hath bred,
To lay us on a softer bed.
Our blankets are not dyed with orphans' tears,
Our pillows are not stuffed with cares.
To walk on our own ground a stomach gets
The best of sauce to tart our meats.
In midst of such a feast 'tis joy to come
And see the well-fed lambs at home.
'Tis pleasure to behold th' inversed plow,
The languid necks of oxen bow.
And view th' industrious servants, that will sweat
Both at labour and at meat.
Lord, grant me but enough; I ask no more
Than will serve mine, and help the poor.

An Elegy upon the Lady Venetia Digby[2]

Death, who'ld not change prerogatives with thee,
That dost such rapes, yet may'st not question'd be?
Here cease thy wanton lust, be satisfied:
Hope not a second, and so fair a bride.
Where was her Mars, whose valiant arms did hold
This Venus once, that thou durst be so bold
By thy too nimble theft? I know 'twas fear,
Lest he should come, that would have rescued her.
Monster confess, didst thou not blushing stand,
And thy pale cheek turn red to touch her hand?
Did she not lightning-like strike sudden heat

---

[1] neat cattle.

[2] Lady Venetia Digby was a famous beauty; see the selection from Aubrey's Brief Lives.

Through thy cold limbs, and thaw thy frost to sweat?
Well, since thou hast her, use her gently, Death,
And in requital of such precious breath,
Watch sentinel to guard her; do not see
The worms thy rivals, for the gods will be.
Remember Paris, for whose pettier sin
The Trojan gates let the stout Grecians in.
So, when time ceases (whose unthrifty hand
Has now almost consumed his stock of sand),
Myriads of angels shall in armies come,
And fetch (proud ravisher) their Helen home.
And to revenge this rape, thy other store
Thou shalt resign too, and shalt steal no more.
Till then, fair ladies (for you now are fair,
But till her death I feared your just despair),
Fetch all the spices that Arabia yields,
Distil the choicest flowers of the fields:
And when in one their best perfections meet,
Embalm her corse, that she may make them sweet,
Whilst for an epitaph upon her stone
I cannot write, but I must weep her one.

Epitaph

Beauty itself lies here, in whom alone
Each part enjoyed the same perfection.
In some the eyes we praise, in some the hair:
In her the lips, in her the cheeks are fair:
That nymph's fine feet, her hands we beauteous
call:
But in this form we praise no part, but all.
The ages past have many beauties shown,
And I more plenty in our time have known.
But in the age to come I look for none;
Nature despairs, because her pattern's gone.

Upon his Picture

When age hath made me what I am not now:
And every wrinkle tells me where the plow
Of time hath furrowed; when an ice shall flow
Through every vein, and all my head be snow:
When death displays his coldness in my cheek,
And I myself in my own picture seek,
Not finding what I am, but what I was;
In doubt which to believe, this or my glass;
Yet though I alter, this remains the same
As it was drawn: retains the primitive frame
And first complexion; here will still be seen
Blood on the cheek, and down upon the chin.
Here the smooth brow will stay, the lively eye,
The ruddy lip, and hair of youthful dye.
Behold what frailty we in man may see,
Whose shadow is less given to change than he.

An Ode to Master Anthony Stafford, to hasten him into the Country[1]

Come, spur away,
I have no patience for a longer stay.
But must go down,
And leave the chargeable noise of this great town.
I will the country see,
Where old simplicity,
Though hid in grey,
Doth look more gay
Than foppery in plush and scarlet clad.
Farewell, you city wits, that are Almost at civil war;
'Tis time that I grow wise, when all the world
grows mad.

---

[1] Anthony Stafford was the youngest son of John Stafford of Blatherwycke in Northamptonshire.

More of my days
I will not spend to gain an idiot's praise;
Or to make sport
For some slight puisne of the Inns-of-Court.
Then, worthy Stafford, say,
How shall we spend the day?
With what delights
Shorten the nights?
When from this tumult we are got secure,
Where mirth with all her freedom goes,
Yet shall not finger lose;
Where every word is thought, and every thought is pure.

There from the tree
We'll cherries pluck, and pick the strawberry.
And every day
Go see the wholesome country girls make hay,
Whose brown hath lovelier grace,
Than any painted face,
That I do know
Hyde Park can show.
Where I had rather gain a kiss than meet
(Though some of them in greater state
Might court my life with plate)
The beauties of the Cheap, and wives of Lombard
Street.

But think upon
Some other pleasures: these to me are none,
Why do I prate
Of women, that are things against my fate?
I never mean to wed
That torture to my bed.
My Muse is she
My love shall be.
Let clowns get wealth and heirs; when I am gone,
And the great bugbear, grisly death,
Shall take this idle breath,
If I a poem leave, that poem is my son.
Of this no more;
We'll rather taste the bright Pomona's store.
No fruit shall 'scape
Our palates, from the damson to the grape.
Then (full) we'll seek a shade,
And hear what music's made;
How Philomel
Her tale doth tell,
And how the other birds do fill the choir:
The thrush and blackbird lend their throats
Warbling melodious notes;
We will all sports enjoy which others but desire.

Ours is the sky,
Whereat what fowl we please our hawk shall fly;
Nor will we spare
To hunt the crafty fox, or timorous hare;
But let our hounds run loose
In any ground they'll choose,
The buck shall fall,
The stag, and all:
Our pleasures must from their own warrants be.
For to my Muse, if not to me,
I'm sure all game is free;
Heaven, earth, all are but parts of her great royalty.

And when we mean
To taste of Bacchus' blessings now and then,
And drink by stealth
A cup or two to noble Barkley's health,[1]
I'll take my pipe and try
The Phrygian melody; [2]
Which he that hears,
Lets through his ears
A madness to distemper all the brain.
Then I another pipe will take

[1] Barkley George Berkeley. See the notes to Suckling's A Sessions of the Poets.

[2] The Phrygian melody warlike music (see OED Phrygian a).

And Doric music make,
To civilize with graver notes our wits again.[1]

An Answer to Master Ben. Jonson's Ode to persuade him not to leave the Stage[2]

Ben do not leave the stage,
'Cause 'tis a loathsome age;
For Pride and Impudence will grow too bold
When they shall hear it told
They frighted thee. Stand high, as is thy cause;
Their hiss is thy applause.
More just were thy disdain,
Had they approved thy vein.
So thou for them and they for thee were born,
They to incense, and thou as much to scorn.

Wilt thou engross thy store
Of wheat, and pour no more
Because their bacon-brains have such a taste
As more delight in mast?[3]
No; set 'em forth a board of dainties full,
As thy best Muse can cull;
While they the while do pine
And thirst 'midst all their wine.
What greater plague can hell itself devise,
Than to be willing thus to tantalise?

Thou canst not find them stuff
That will be bad enough
To please their palates; let 'em thine refuse
For some Pie-Corner muse.[4]
She is too fair an hostess, 'twere a sin
For them to like thine Inn.
'Twas made to entertain
Guests of a nobler strain,
Yet if they will have any of thy store,
Give 'em some scraps, and send them from thy door.

And let those things in plush,
Till they be taught to blush,
Like what they will, and more contented be
With what Broome swept from thee.[5]
I know thy worth, and that thy lofty strains
Write not to clothes but brains.
But thy great spleen doth rise,
'Cause moles will have no eyes;
This only in my Ben I faulty find;
He's angry, they'll not see him that are blind.

Why should the scene be mute,
'Cause thou canst touch a lute,
And string thy Horace? let each Muse of nine
Claim thee, and say "Thou art mine."
'Twere fond to let all other flames expire
To sit by Pindar's fire:
For by so strange neglect,
I should myself suspect
The palsy were as well, thy brains disease;
If they could shake thy Muse which way they please.

And though thou well canst sing
The glories of thy king,
And on the wings of verse his chariot bear
To heaven, and fix it there;
Yet let thy Muse as well some raptures raise
To please him as to praise,
I would not have thee choose

Only a treble Muse;
But have this envious, ignorant Age to know:
Thou that canst sing so high, canst reach as low.

On the Death of a Nightingale

Go, solitary wood, and henceforth be
Acquainted with no other harmony,
Than the pies' chattering, or the shrieking note
Of boding owls and fatal raven's throat.
Thy sweetest chanter's dead, that warbled forth
Lays, that might tempests calm, and still the north,
And call down angels from their glorious sphere
To hear her songs, and learn new anthems there.
That soul is fled, and to Elysium gone;
Thou a poor desert left. Go then and run,
Beg there to stand a grove, and if she please
To sing again beneath thy shadowy trees;
The souls of happy lovers crowned with blisses
Shall flock about thee, and keep time with kisses.

A Pastoral Courtship

Behold these woods, and mark, my sweet,
How all the boughs together meet!
The cedar his fair arms displays,
And mixes branches with the bays!
The lofty pine deigns to descend,
And sturdy oaks do gently bend.
One with another subtly weaves
Into one loom their various leaves,
As all ambitious were to be
Mine and my Phyllis' canopy.
Let's enter, and discourse our loves;
These are, my dear, no tell-tale groves!
There dwell no pies nor parrots there,
To prate again the words they hear,
Nor babbling Echo, that will tell
The neighbouring hills one syllable.
Being enter'd, let's together lie,
Twin'd like the Zodiac's Gemini!
How soon the flowers do sweeter smell,
And all with emulation swell
To be thy pillow! These for thee
Were meant a bed, and thou for me,
And I may with as just esteem
Press thee, as thou mayst lie on them.
And why so coy? What dost thou fear?
There lurks no speckled serpent here.
No venomous snake makes this his road,
No canker, nor the loathsome toad.
And yon poor spider on the tree
Thy spinster will, no poisoner be,
There is no frog to leap, and fright
Thee from my arms, and break delight;
Nor snail that o'er thy coat shall trace,
And leave behind a slimy lace.
This is the hallowed shrine of love;
No wasp nor hornet haunts this grove,
Nor pismire to make pimples rise, [1]
Upon thy smooth and ivory thighs.
No danger in these shades doth lie,
Nothing that wears a sting, but I;
And in it doth no venom dwell,
Although perchance it make thee swell.
Being set, let's sport awhile, my fair,
I will tie love-knots in thy hair.
See, Zephyrus through the leaves doth stray,
And has free liberty to play,
And braids thy locks; and shall I find
Less favour than a saucy wind?
Now let me sit, and fix mine eyes,
On thee, that art my Paradise.
Thou art my all; my spring remains
In the fair violets of thy veins;
And that you are my summer's day,
Ripe cherries in thy lips display.

---

[1] pismire ant.

And when for autumn I would seek,
'Tis in the apples of thy cheek.
But that which only moves my smart,
Is to see winter in thy heart.
Strange, when at once in one appear
All the four seasons of the year!
I'll clasp that neck, where should be set
A rich and orient carcanet.[1]
But swains are poor; admit of, then,
More natural chains—the arms of men.
Come, let me touch those breasts, that swell
Like two fair mountains, and may well
Be styled the Alps, but that I swear
The snow has less of whiteness there.
But stay (my love), a fault I spy:
Why are those two fair mountains dry?
Which if they run, no Muse would please
To taste of any spring but these.
And Ganymede employed should be
To fetch his Jove nectar from thee.
Thou shalt be nurse, fair Venus swears
To the next Cupid that she bears.
Were it not then discreetly done
To ope one spring to let two run?
Fie, fie! this belly, beauty's mint,
Blushes to see no coin stamp'd in't.
Employ it then; for, though it be
Our wealth, it is your royalty;
And beauty will have current grace
That bears the image of your face.
How to the touch the ivory thighs
Veil gently, and again do rise,
As pliable to impression,
As virgin wax, or Parian stone
Dissolv'd to softness, plump and full,
More white and soft than Cotswold wool,
Or cotton from the Indian tree,
Or pretty silkworm's huswifery.
These on two marble pillars raised,
Make me in doubt which should be praised,
They or their columns, most: but when
I view those feet, which I have seen
So nimbly trip it o'er the lawns,
That all the satyrs and the fauns
Have stood amazed, when they would pass
Over the leys, and not a grass
Would feel the weight; nor rush, nor bent
Drooping betray which way you went.
O, then I felt my hot desires
Burn more, and flame with double fires.
Come, let those thighs, those legs, those feet
With mine in thousand windings meet,
And woven in more subtle twines
Than woodbine, ivy, or the vines.
For when Love sees us circling thus,
He'll like no arbour more than us.
Now let us kiss. Would you be gone?
Manners at least allows me one.
Blush you at this? pretty one, stay,
And I will take that kiss away.
Thus with a second, and that too
A third wipes off; so will we go
To numbers that the stars outrun,
And all the atoms in the sun.
For though we kiss till Phœbus' ray
Sink in the sea, and kissing stay,
Till his bright beams return again,
There can of all but one remain:
And if for one good manners call,
In one, good manners, grant me all.
Are kisses all? they but forerun
Another duty to be done.
What would you of that minstrel say
That tunes his pipes and will not play?
Say what are blossoms in their prime,
That ripen not in harvest-time?
Or what are buds, that ne'er disclose
The longed-for sweetness of the rose?
So kisses to a lover's guest
Are invitations, not the feast.

---

[1] carcanet jewelled necklace or collar.

See everything that we espy
Is fruitful, saving you and I:
View all the fields, survey the bowers,
The buds, the blossoms, and the flowers,
And say if they so rich could be
In barren, base virginity.
Earth's not so coy as you are now,
But willingly admits the plow.
For how had man or beast been fed,
If she had kept her maidenhead?
Cœlia, once coy as are the rest,
Hugs now a babe on either breast,
And Chloris, since a man she took,
Has less of greenness in her look.
Our ewes have eaned, and every dam [1]
Gives suck unto her tender lamb.
As by these groves we walked along,
Some birds were feeding of their young.
Some on their eggs did brooding sit,
Sad that they had not hatched them yet.
Those that were slower than the rest
Were busy building of the nest.
You only will not pay the fine
You vowed and owe to Valentine.
As you were angling in the brook
With silken line and silver hook,
Through crystal streams you might descry
How vast and numberless a fry
The fish had spawned, that all along
The banks were crowded with the throng.
And shall fair Venus more command
By water than she does by land?
The Phœnix chaste, yet when she dies,
Herself with her own ashes lies.
But let thy love more wisely thrive,
And do the act while th' art alive.
'Tis time we left our childish love,
That trades for toys, and now approve
Our abler skill; they are not wise
Look babies only in the eyes.
That smoth'red smile show'd what you meant,
And modest silence gives consent.
That which we now prepare, will be
Best done in silent secrecy.
Come, do not weep, what is't you fear?
Lest some should know what we do here.
See, not a flower you pressed is dead,
But re-erects his bended head;
That whoso'er shall pass this way
Knows not by these where Phyllis lay.
And in your forehead there is none
Can read the act that we have done.

Phyllis

Poor credulous and simple maid,
By what strange wiles art thou betrayed!
A treasure thou hast lost to-day
For which thou canst no ransom pay.
How black am I transformed with sin!
How strange a guilt gnaws me within!
Grief will convert this red to pale;
When every wake and Whitsun-ale
Shall talk my shame! break, break sad heart!
There is no medicine for my smart,
No herb nor balm can cure my sorrow,
Unless you meet again to-morrow.

William Habington

1605 – 1654

William Habington was born in Worcestershire. His family was Catholic, and he was educated in France in the expectation that he would become a priest. In 1626 he returned to England. He married Lucy Herbert, the "Castara" after whom a volume of his poems (1634) was named, and lived quietly, accepting the disabilities placed upon him by reason of his Catholicism. His poems celebrate a chaste (which is not to say a celibate) love, and so are distinguished both from strictly "Platonic" love poems and those addressed to "profane mistresses." Castara was reissued in an enlarged edition in 1635 and again in 1640, with a section of religious verse. The love poems of Henry Vaughan's first volume, the Poems of 1646, show some indebtedness to Castara. In addition to his poems, Habington published a play, The Queen of Aragon (1640) and some historical writing.

Nox nocti indicat Scientiam [1]

When I survey the bright
Celestial sphere:
So rich with jewels hung, that night
Doth like an Æthiop bride appear. [2]

My soul her wings doth spread
And heaven-ward flies,
Th' Almighty's mysteries to read
In the large volumes of the skies.

For the bright firmament
Shoots forth no flame
So silent, but is eloquent
In speaking the Creator's name.

No unregarded star
Contracts its light
Into so small a character,
Remov'd far from our human sight:

But if we steadfast look,
We shall discern
In it as in some holy book,
How man may heavenly knowledge learn.

It tells the Conqueror,
That far-stretched power
Which his proud dangers traffic for,
Is but the triumph of an hour.

That from the farthest North,
Some Nation may
Yet undiscovered issue forth,
And o'er his new got conquest sway.

Some Nation yet shut in
With hills of ice
May be let out to scourge his sin
'Till they shall equal him in vice.

And then they likewise shall
Their ruin have,
For as your selves your empires fall,
And every kingdom hath a grave.

Thus those celestial fires,
Though seeming mute

The fallacy of our desires
And all the pride of life confute.

For they have watched since first
The World had birth:
And found sin in itself accursed,
And nothing permanent on earth.

Sir Thomas Browne

1605 – 1682

Born in London, the son of a prosperous cloth merchant, Browne was educated at Winchester and Broadgates Hall (Pembroke College), Oxford, then after a period of travel proceeded to study at the three great medical schools of his age, the universities of Montpellier, Padua, and Leiden. In 1637 he settled as a practising physician in Norwich, where he remained until his death. Browne married in 1641 (despite a passage in Religio Medici expressing reservations about matrimony); only four of his twelve children survived into adulthood. He was a devoted Royalist throughout the civil wars and Commonwealth, though he was not active militarily and did not contribute any explicitly polemical works to the debates of the period. In addition to pursuing his profession as a provincial doctor, Browne retained a life-long interest in antiquities and natural history: among others, he corresponded with John Evelyn and Anthony à Wood, and his house was described as resembling one large cabinet of curiosities. In 1671 he was knighted by Charles II.

Browne probably composed Religio Medici in about 1635, when he was thirty years old. Two unauthorized editions appeared in 1642, leading Browne to publish an authorized version in 1643. The book was an immediate success, establishing Browne's reputation for wit (in the seventeenth-century sense of the word) in England and, with the appearance of a Latin translation in 1644, on the continent; other translations into Dutch, French, and German followed. In 1658, Brown published two of the most remarkable prose works of the period, Hydriotaphia (excerpted here) and The Garden of Cyrus. His other major work was Pseudodoxia Epidemica: or Enquiries into very many Received Tenets and Commonly Presumed Truths (1646, revised and augmented editions in 1650, 1658, 1672), popularly known as Vulgar Errors. An encyclopedic study of contemporary beliefs and the sources of error in a wide variety of fields, Pseudodoxia established Browne's reputation as a man of learning throughout Europe.

Religio Medici

(excerpts)

To the Reader

Certainly that man were greedy of life, who should desire to live when all the world were at an end; and he must needs be very impatient who would repine at death in the society of all things that suffer under it. Had not almost every man suffered by the press; or were not the tyranny thereof become universal; I had not wanted reason for complaint: but in times wherein I have lived to behold the highest perversion of that excellent invention; the name of his Majesty defamed, the honour of Parliament depraved, the writings of both depravedly, anticipatively, counterfeitly imprinted; complaints may seem ridiculous in private persons, and men of my condition may be as incapable of affronts,[1] as hopeless of their reparations. And truly had not the duty I owe unto the importunity of friends, and the allegiance I must ever acknowledge unto truth prevailed with me; the inactivity of my disposition might have made these sufferings continual, and time that brings other things to light, should have satisfied me in the remedy of its oblivion. But because things evidently false are not only printed, but many things of truth most falsely set forth; in this latter I could not but think my self engaged: for though we have no power to redress the former, yet in the other the reparation being within ourselves, I have at present represented unto the world a full and intended copy of that piece which was most imperfectly and surreptitiously published before.

[1] That is, when the King is being insulted, private individuals might be thought too unimportant to be affronted by the freedom of the press.

This I confess about seven years past, with some others of affinity thereto, for my private exercise and satisfaction I had at leisurable hours composed; which being communicated unto one, it became common unto many, and was by transcription successively corrupted until it arrived in a most depraved copy at the press. He that shall peruse that work and shall take notice of sundry particularities and personal expressions therein, will easily discern the intention was not public: and being a private exercise directed to myself, what is delivered therein was rather a memorial unto me than an example or rule unto any other: and therefore if there be any singularity therein correspondent unto the private conceptions of any man, it doth not advantage them; or if dissentaneous thereunto, it no way overthrows them. It was penned in such a place and with such disadvantage, that (I protest) from the first setting of pen unto paper, I had not the assistance of any good book, whereby to promote my invention or relieve my memory; and therefore there might be many real lapses therein, which others might take notice of, and more that I suspected my self.* It was set down many years past, and was the sense of my conceptions at that time, not an immutable law unto my advancing judgement at all times, and therefore there might be many things therein plausible unto my past apprehension, which are not agreeable unto my present self. There are many things delivered rhetorically, many expressions therein merely tropical,[1] and as they best illustrate my intention; and therefore also there are many things to be taken in a soft and flexible sense, and not to be called unto the rigid test of reason. Lastly all that is contained therein is in submission unto maturer discernments, and as I have declared shall no further father them than the best and learned judgements shall authorize them; under favour of which considerations I have made its secrecy public and committed the truth thereof to every ingenuous reader.

THE FIRST PART

SECT. 1 For my religion, though there be several circumstances that might persuade the world I have none at all, as the general scandal of my profession,[2] the natural course of my studies, the indifferency of my behaviour, and discourse in matters of religion, neither violently defending one, nor with that common ardour and contention opposing another; yet in despite hereof I dare, without usurpation, assume the honorable style of a Christian: not that I merely owe this title to the font,[3] my education, or clime wherein I was born, as being bred up either to confirm those principles my parents instilled into my unwary understanding; or by a general consent proceed in the religion of my country: But having, in my riper years, and confirmed judgment, seen and examined all, I find myself obliged by the principles of grace, and the law of mine own reason, to embrace no other name but this; neither doth herein my zeal so far make me forget the general charity I owe unto humanity, as rather to hate than pity Turks, infidels, and (what is worse) Jews, rather contenting myself to enjoy that happy style, than maligning those who refuse so glorious a title.

SECT. 2 But because the name of a Christian is become too general to express our faith, there being a geography of religions as well as lands, and every clime distinguished not only by their laws and limits, but circumscribed by their doctrines and rules of faith; to be particular, I am of that reformed new-cast religion, wherein I dislike nothing but the name,[1] of the same belief our Saviour taught, the Apostles disseminated, the Fathers authorised, and the martyrs confirmed; but by the sinister ends of princes, the ambition and avarice of prelates, and the fatal corruption of times, so decayed, impaired, and fallen from its native beauty, that it required the careful and charitable hand of these times to restore it to its primitive integrity: Now the accidental occasion whereon, the slender means whereby, the low and abject condition of the person by whom so good a work was set on foot,[2] which in our adversaries begets contempt and scorn, fills me with wonder, and is the very same objection the insolent pagans first cast at Christ and his disciples.

[1] tropical figurative (of or pertaining to tropes).

[2] the general scandal of my profession Physicians were traditionally reputed to be irreligious.

[3] to the font to baptism.

SECT. 3 Yet have I not so shaken hands with those desperate resolutions, who had rather venture at large their decayed bottom, than bring her in to be new trimmed in the dock; who had rather promiscuously retain all, than abridge any, and obstinately be what they are, than what they have been, as to stand in diameter and swords point with them: we have reformed from them, not against them; for omitting those improperations and terms of scurrility betwixt us,[3] which only difference our affections, and not our cause, there is between us one common name and appellation, one faith, and necessary body of principles common to us both; and therefore I am not scrupulous to converse and live with them, to enter their churches in defect of ours, and either pray with them, or for them: I could never perceive any rational consequence from those many texts which prohibit the children of Israel to pollute themselves with the temples of the heathens; we being all Christians, and not divided by such detested impieties as might profane our prayers, or the place wherein we make them; or that a resolved conscience may not adore her Creator any where, especially in places devoted to his service; where if their devotions offend him, mine may please him, if theirs profane it, mine may hallow it; holy water and crucifix (dangerous to the common people) deceive not my judgment, nor abuse my devotion at all: I am, I confess, naturally inclined to that, which misguided zeal terms superstition; my common conversation I do acknowledge austere, my behaviour full of rigour, sometimes not without morosity; yet at my devotion I love to use the civility of my knee, my hat, and hand, with all those outward and sensible motions, which may express, or promote my invisible devotion. I should violate my own arm rather than a church, nor willingly deface the memory of saint or martyr. At the sight of a cross or crucifix I can dispense with my hat, but scarce with the thought or memory of my Saviour; I cannot laugh at but rather pity the fruitless journeys of pilgrims, or contemn the miserable condition of friars; for though misplaced in circumstance, there is something in it of devotion: I could never hear the Ave Marie bell without an elevation,[4] or think it a sufficient warrant, because they erred in one circumstance, for me to err in all, that is in silence and dumb contempt; whilst therefore they directed their devotions to her, I offered mine to God, and rectified the errors of their prayers by rightly ordering mine own; at a solemn procession I have wept abundantly, while my consorts, blind with opposition and prejudice, have fallen into an access of scorn and laughter: There are questionless both in Greek, Roman, and African churches, solemnities, and ceremonies, whereof the wiser zeals do make a Christian use, and stand condemned by us; not as evil in themselves, but as allurements and baits of superstition to those vulgar heads that look asquint on the face of truth, and those unstable judgments that cannot consist in the narrow point and centre of virtue without a reel or stagger to the circumference.

[1] the name Protestant.

[2] the person Martin Luther, whose father was a miner.

[3] improperations taunts, reproaches (OED); Browne is referring to disputes between Protestants and Catholics, the "them" of the sentence.

[4] Ave Marie bell a Church bell that tolls every day at 6 and 12 of the clock, at the hearing whereof every one in that place soever either of house or street betakes him to his prayer, which is commonly directed to the Virgin [Browne's note].

SECT. 4 As there were many reformers, so likewise many reformations; every country proceeding in a particular way and method, according as their national interest together with their constitution and clime inclined them, some angrily and with extremity, others calmly, and with mediocrity,[1] not rending, but easily dividing the community, and leaving an honest possibility of a reconciliation, which though peaceable spirits do desire, and may conceive that revolution of time, and the mercies of God may effect; yet that judgment that shall consider the present antipathies between the two extremes, their contrarieties in condition, affection and opinion, may with the same hopes expect an union in the poles of Heaven.

SECT. 5 But to difference myself nearer, and draw into a lesser circle: There is no church whose every part so squares unto my conscience, whose articles, constitutions, and customs seem so consonant unto reason, and as it were framed to my particular devotion, as this whereof I hold my belief, the Church of England, to whose faith I am a sworn subject, and therefore in a double obligation, subscribe unto her articles, and endeavour to observe her constitutions: whatsoever is beyond, as points indifferent, I observe according to the rules of my private reason, or the humor and fashion of my devotion, neither believing this, because Luther affirmed it, or disproving that, because Calvin hath disavouched it. I condemn not all things in the Council of Trent, nor approve all in the Synod of Dort.[2] In brief, where the Scripture is silent, the church is my text; where that speaks, 'tis but my comment: where there is a joint silence of both, I borrow not the rules of my religion from Rome or Geneva, but the dictates of my own reason. It is an unjust scandal of our adversaries, and a gross error in ourselves, to compute the nativity of our religion from Henry the Eight, who though he rejected the Pope, refused not the faith of Rome, and effected no more than what his own predecessors desired and assayed in ages past, and was conceived the State of Venice would have attempted in our days.[3] It is as uncharitable a point in us to fall upon those popular scurrilities and opprobrious scoffs of the Bishop of Rome, whom as a temporal Prince, we owe the duty of good language: I confess there is cause of passion between us; by his sentence I stand excommunicated, heretic is the best language he affords me; yet can no ear witness I ever returned to him the name of Antichrist, man of sin, or whore of Babylon; it is the method of charity to suffer without reaction: those usual satires, and invectives of the pulpit may perchance produce a good effect on the vulgar, whose ears are opener to rhetoric than logic, yet do they in no wise confirm the faith of wiser believers, who know that a good cause needs not to be patroned by a passion, but can sustain itself upon a temperate dispute.

SECT. 6 I could never divide myself from any man upon the difference of an opinion, or be angry with his judgment for not agreeing with me in that, from which perhaps within a few days I should dissent myself: I have no genius to disputes in religion, and have often thought it wisdom to decline them, especially upon a disadvantage, or when the cause of truth might suffer in the weakness of my patronage: where we desire to be informed, 'tis good to contest with men above ourselves; but to confirm and establish our opinions, 'tis best to argue with judgments below our own, that the frequent spoils and victories over their reasons may settle in ourselves an esteem, and confirmed opinion of our own. Every man is not a proper champion for truth, nor fit to take up the gauntlet in the cause of verity: Many from the ignorance of these maxims, and an inconsiderate zeal unto truth, have too rashly charged the troops of error, and remain as trophies unto the enemies of truth: A man may be in as just possession of truth as of a city, and yet be forced to surrender; 'tis therefore far better to enjoy her with peace, than to hazard her on a battle. If therefore there rise any doubts in my way, I do forget them, or at least defer them, till my better settled judgment, and more manly reason be able to resolve them; for I perceive every man's own reason is his best Oedipus,[1] and will upon a reasonable truce, find a way to loose those bonds wherewith the subtleties of error have enchained our more flexible and tender judgments. In philosophy where truth seems double-faced, there is no man more paradoxical than myself; but in divinity I love to keep the road, and though not in an implicit, yet an humble faith, follow the great wheel of the church, by which I move, not reserving any proper poles or motion from the epicycle of my own brain; by this means I leave no gap for heresies, schisms, or errors, of which at present, I hope I shall not injure truth, to say, I have no taint or tincture; I must confess my greener studies have been polluted with two or three, not any begotten in the latter centuries, but old and obsolete, such as could never have been revived, but by such extravagant and irregular heads as mine; for indeed heresies perish not with their authors, but like the river Arethusa, though they lose their currents in one place, they rise up again in another:[2] one general council is not able to extirpate one single heresy, it may be cancelled for the present, but revolution of time and the like aspects from Heaven, will restore it, when it will flourish till it be condemned again; for as though there were a metempsychosis, and the soul of one man passed into another, opinions do find after certain revolutions, men and minds like those that first begat them. To see ourselves again we need not look for Plato's year;[3] every man is not only himself; there have been many Diogenes, and as many Timons,[4] though but few of that name; men are lived over again, the world is now as it was in ages past, there was none then, but there hath been someone since that parallels him, and is as it were his revived self.

[1] mediocrity moderation, temperance (OED mediocrity 2).

[2] The Council of Trent (1545–1563) defined the doctrines of the Catholic Counter-Reformation; the Synod of Dort (1618–1619) defined Calvinist doctrines (the "Rome or Geneva" respectively of the following sentence).

[3] In 1606 Pope Paul V excommunicated the entire Venetian Republic for repudiating papal authority.

SECT. 7 Now the first of mine was that of the Arabians, that the souls of men perished with their bodies, but should yet be raised again at the last day; not that I did absolutely conceive a mortality of the soul, but if that were, which faith, not philosophy hath yet thoroughly disproved, and that both entered the grave together, yet I held the same conceit thereof that we all do of the body, that it should rise again.[5] Surely it is but the merits of our unworthy natures, if we sleep in darkness, until the last alarum: A serious reflex upon my own unworthiness did make me backward from challenging this prerogative of my soul; so I might enjoy my

---

[1] his best Oedipus his best solver of problems; Oedipus saved Thebes by solving the Sphinx's riddle.

[2] Arethusa a mythical river from Ovid's Metamorphoses that crossed under the Adriatic and reappeared on the other side.

[3] Plato's year a revolution of certain thousand years when all things should return unto their former estate and he [Plato] be teaching again in his school as when he delivered this opinion [Browne's note].

[4] Diogenes and Timon were, respectively, the archetypal cynic and misanthropist.

[5] it should rise again Mortalism or soul-sleeping became a controversial heresy only a few years after Browne wrote Religio Medici; it is one of the beliefs attacked by Thomas Edwards in Gangraena. The doctrine was defended in pamphlets by the Leveller Richard Overton, and apparently sanctioned by Milton in Paradise Lost (10.792).

Saviour at the last, I could with patience be nothing almost unto eternity. The second was that of Origen, that God would not persist in his vengeance forever, but after a definite time of his wrath he would release the damned souls from torture;[1] which error I fell into upon a serious contemplation of the great attribute of God his mercy, and did a little cherish it in myself, because I found therein no malice, and a ready weight to sway me from the other extreme of despair, whereunto melancholy and contemplative natures are too easily disposed. A third there is which I did never positively maintain or practice, but have often wished it had been consonant to truth, and not offensive to my religion, and that is the prayer for the dead; whereunto I was inclined from some charitable inducements, whereby I could scarce contain my prayers for a friend at the ringing of a bell, or behold his corpse without an orison for his soul:[2] 'Twas a good way me thought to be remembered by posterity, and far more noble than an history. These opinions I never maintained with pertinacity, or endeavoured to inveigle any man's belief unto mine, nor so much as ever revealed or disputed them with my dearest friends; by which means I neither propagated them in others, nor confirmed them in myself, but suffering them to flame upon their own substance, without addition of new fuel, they went out insensibly of themselves; therefore these opinions, though condemned by lawful councils, were not heresies in me, but bare errors, and single lapses of my understanding, without a joint depravity of my will: Those have not only depraved understandings but diseased affections, which cannot enjoy a singularity without a heresy, or be the author of an opinion, without they be of a sect also; this was the villainy of the first schism of Lucifer, who was not content to err alone, but drew into his faction many legions of spirits; and upon this experience he tempted only Eve, as well understanding the communicable nature of sin, and that to deceive but one, was tacitly and upon consequence to delude them both.

SECT. 8 That heresies should arise we have the prophecy of Christ,[3] but that old ones should be abolished we hold no prediction. That there must be heresies, is true, not only in our church, but also in any other: even in doctrines heretical there will be super-heresies, and Arians not only divided from their church, but also among themselves:[4] for heads that are disposed unto schism and complexionally propense to innovation, are naturally indisposed for a community, nor will ever be confined unto the order or economy of one body; and therefore when they separate from others they knit but loosely among themselves; nor contented with a general breach or dichotomy with their church, do subdivide and mince themselves almost into atoms. 'Tis true, that men of singular parts and humors have not been free from singular opinions and conceits in all ages; retaining something not only beside the opinion of his own church or any other, but also any particular author: which notwithstanding a sober judgment may do without offence or heresy; for there is yet after all the decrees of councils and the niceties of the schools, many things untouched, unimagined, wherein the liberty of an honest reason may play and expatiate with security and far without the circle of an heresy.

SECT. 9 As for those wingy mysteries in divinity, and airy subtleties in religion, which have unhinged the brains of better heads, they never stretched the pia mater of mine; methinks there be not impossibilities enough in religion for an active faith; the deepest mysteries ours contains, have not only been illustrated, but maintained by syllogism, and the rule of reason: I love to lose myself in a mystery, to pursue my reason to an O altitudo.[1] 'Tis my solitary recreation to pose my apprehension with those involved enigmas and riddles of the Trinity, with incarnation and resurrection. I can answer all the objections of Satan, and my rebellious reason, with that odd resolution I learned of Tertullian, Certum est quia impossibile est.[2] I desire to exercise my faith in the difficultest points, for to credit ordinary and visible objects is not faith, but persuasion. Some believe the better for seeing Christ his sepulchre, and when they have seen the Red Sea, doubt not of the miracle. Now contrarily I bless myself, and am thankful that I lived not in the days of miracles, that I never saw Christ nor his disciples; I would not have been one of those Israelites that passed the Red Sea, nor one of Christ's patients, on whom he wrought his wonders; then had my faith been thrust upon me, nor should I enjoy that greater blessing pronounced to all that believe and saw not. 'Tis an easy and necessary belief to credit what our eye and sense hath examined: I believe he was dead, and buried, and rose again; and desire to see him in his glory, rather than to contemplate him in his cenotaph, or sepulchre. Nor is this much to believe, as we have reason, we owe this faith unto history: they only had the advantage of a bold and noble faith, who lived before his coming, who upon obscure prophesies and mystical types could raise a belief, and expect apparent impossibilities.

SECT. 10 'Tis true, there is an edge in all firm belief, and with an easy metaphor we may say the sword of faith; but in these obscurities I rather use it, in the adjunct the Apostle gives it, a buckler;[3] under which I perceive a wary combatant may lie invulnerable. Since I was of understanding to know we knew nothing, my reason hath been more pliable to the will of faith; I am now content to understand a mystery without a rigid definition in an easy and platonic description.[4] That allegorical description of Hermes, pleaseth me beyond all the metaphysical definitions of divines;[5] where I cannot satisfy my reason, I love to humour my fancy; I had as leave you tell me that anima est angelus hominis, est Corpus Dei, as Entelechia; Lux est umbra Dei, as actus perspicui:[6] where there is an obscurity too deep for our reason, 'tis good to set down with a description, periphrasis, or adumbration; for by acquainting our reason how unable it is to display the visible and obvious effect of nature, it becomes more humble and submissive unto the subtleties of faith: and thus I teach my haggard and unreclaimed reason to stoop unto the lure of faith. I believe there was already a tree whose fruit our unhappy parents tasted, though in the same chapter, when God forbids it, 'tis positively said, the plants of the field were not yet grown; for God had not caused it to rain upon the earth.[7] I believe that the serpent (if we shall literally understand it) from his proper form and figure, made his motion on his belly before the curse. I find the trial of the Pucellage and virginity of women, which God ordained the Jews,[8] is very fallible. Experience, and history informs me, that not only many particular women, but likewise whole nations have escaped the curse of childbirth, which God seems to pronounce upon the whole sex;[1] yet do I believe that all this is true, which indeed my reason would persuade me to be false; and this I think is no vulgar part of faith to believe a thing not only above, but contrary to reason, and against the arguments of our proper senses.

[6] That is, he prefers the idea that "the soul is the angel of man, is the body of God" to thinking about the concept "essence"; or that "Light is the shadow of God" to the concept "actual transparency." Each pair contrasts metaphorical definitions from Renaissance philosophy (Paracelsus and Marsilio Ficino respectively) with the traditional Aristotelian terms; Browne's point is that he prefers the imaginative, metaphorical approach when the issues involved are beyond reason.

SECT. 11 In my solitary and retired imagination (Neque enim cum porticus aut me lectulus accepit, desum mihi),[2] I remember I am not alone, and therefore forget not to contemplate him and his attributes who is ever with me, especially those two mighty ones, his wisdom and eternity; with the one I recreate, with the other I confound my understanding: for who can speak of eternity without a solecism, or think thereof without an ecstasy? Time we may comprehend, 'tis but five days elder than ourselves, and hath the same horoscope with the world; but to retire so far back as to apprehend a beginning, to give such an infinite start forward, as to conceive an end in an essence that we affirm hath neither the one nor the other; it puts my reason to Saint Paul's sanctuary;[3] my philosophy dares not say the angels can do it; God hath not made a creature that can comprehend him, 'tis the privilege of his own nature; "I am that I am," was his own definition unto Moses [Exodus 3:14]; and 'twas a short one, to confound mortality, that durst question God, or ask him what he was; indeed he only is, all others have and shall be, but in eternity there is no distinction of tenses; and therefore that terrible term "predestination," which hath troubled so many weak heads to conceive, and the wisest to explain, is in respect to God no prescious determination of our estates to come,[4] but a definitive blast of his will already fulfilled, and at the instant that he first decreed it; for to his eternity which is indivisible, and altogether, the last triumph is already sounded, the reprobates in the flame, and the blessed in Abraham's bosom. Saint Peter speaks modestly, when he saith, a thousand years to God are but as one day [II Peter 3:8]: for to speak like a philosopher, those continued instances of time which flow into thousand years, make not to him one moment; what to us is to come, to his eternity is present, his whole duration being but one permanent point without succession, parts, flux, or division.

SECT. 12 There is no attribute that adds more difficulty to the mystery of the Trinity, where though in a relative way of father and son, we must deny a priority. I wonder how Aristotle could conceive the world eternal, or how he could make good two eternities:[5] his similitude of a triangle, comprehended in a square,[6] doth somewhat illustrate the trinity of our souls, and that the triple unity of God; for there is in us not three, but a trinity of souls, because there is in us, if not three distinct souls, yet differing faculties, that can, and do subsist apart in different subjects, and yet in us are so united as to make but one soul and substance; if one soul were so perfect as to inform three distinct bodies, that were a petty trinity: conceive the distinct number of three, not divided nor separated by the intellect, but actually comprehended in its unity, and that is a perfect trinity. I have often admired the mystical way of Pythagoras, and the secret magic of numbers;[7] Beware of philosophy [Colossians 2:8], is a precept not to be received in too large a sense; for in this mass of nature there is a set of things that carry in their front, though not in capital letters, yet in stenography, and short characters, something of divinity, which to wiser reasons serve as luminaries in the abyss of knowledge, and to judicious beliefs, as scales and roundels to mount the pinnacles and highest pieces of divinity.[1] The severe schools shall never laugh me out of the philosophy of Hermes, that this visible world is but a picture of the invisible, wherein as in a portrait, things are not truly, but in equivocal shapes; and as they counterfeit some more real substance in that invisible fabric.

SECT. 13 That other attribute wherewith I recreate my devotion, is his wisdom, in which I am happy; and for the contemplation of this only, do not repent me that I was bred in the way of study: The advantage I have of the vulgar, with the content and happiness I conceive therein, is an ample recompense for all my endeavours, in what part of knowledge soever. Wisdom is his most beauteous attribute, no man can attain unto it, yet Solomon pleased God when he desired it. He is wise because he knows all things, and he knoweth all things because he made them all, but his greatest knowledge is in comprehending that he made not, that is himself. And this is also the greatest knowledge in man. For this do I honour my own profession and embrace the council even of the Devil himself: had he read such a lecture in Paradise as he did at Delphos,[2] we had better known ourselves, nor had we stood in fear to know him. I know he is wise in all, wonderful in what we conceive, but far more in what we comprehend not, for we behold him but asquint upon reflex or shadow; our understanding is dimmer than Moses' eye,[3] we are ignorant of the backparts, or lower side of his divinity; therefore to pry into the maze of his counsels, is not only folly in man, but presumption even in Angels; like us, they are his servants, not his senators; he holds no council, but that mystical one of the Trinity, wherein though there be three persons, there is but one mind that decrees, without contradiction; nor needs he any, his actions are not begot with deliberation, his wisdom naturally knows what's best; his intellect stands ready fraught with the superlative and purest ideas of goodness; consultation and election, which are two motions in us, make but one in him; his actions springing from his power, at the first touch of his will. These are contemplations metaphysical, my humble speculations have another method, and are content to trace and discover those expressions he hath left in his creatures, and the obvious effects of nature; there is no danger to profound these mysteries, no Sanctum sanctorum in philosophy:[4] The world was made to be inhabited by beasts, but studied and contemplated by man: 'tis the debt of our reason we owe unto God, and the homage we pay for not being beasts; without this the world is still as though it had not been, or as it was before the sixth day when as yet there was not a creature that could conceive, or say there was a world. The wisdom of God receives small honour from those vulgar heads, that rudely stare about, and with a gross rusticity admire his works; those highly magnify him whose judicious enquiry into his acts, and deliberate research into his creatures, return the duty of a devout and learned admiration.

SECT. 15 Natura nihil agit frustra [Nature does nothing in vain] is the only indisputed axiom in philosophy. There are no grotesques in nature; not anything framed to fill up empty cantons, and unnecessary spaces.[5] In the most imperfect creatures, and such as were not preserved in the ark, but, having their seeds and principles in the womb of nature, are everywhere where the power of the sun is, in these is the wisdom of his hand discovered. Out of this rank Solomon chose the object of his admiration.[1] Indeed, what reason may not go to school to the wisdom of bees, ants, and spiders? what wise hand teacheth them to do what reason cannot teach us? Ruder heads stand amazed at these prodigious pieces of nature, whales, elephants, dromedaries and camels; these, I confess, are the colossus and majestic pieces of her hand: but in these narrow engines there is more curious mathematics; and the civility of these little citizens more neatly sets forth the wisdom of their Maker. Who admires not Regiomontanus his fly beyond the eagle,[2] or wonders not more at the operation of two souls in those little bodies, than but one in the trunk of a cedar? I could never content my contemplation with those general pieces of wonder, the flux and reflux of the sea, the increase of the Nile, the conversion of the needle to the north; and have studied to match and parallel those in the more obvious and neglected pieces of nature, which without further travel I can do in the cosmography of myself. We carry with us the wonders we seek without us: there is all Africa and her prodigies in us; we are that bold and adventurous piece of nature, which he that studies wisely learns in a compendium what others labor at in a divided piece and endless volume.

SECT. 16 Thus there are two books from whence I collect my divinity; besides that written one of God, another of his servant nature, that universal and public manuscript, that lies expansed unto the eyes of all; those that never saw him in the one, have discovered him in the other: This was the scripture and theology of the heathens; the natural motion of the sun made them more admire him, than its supernatural station did the children of Israel;[3] the ordinary effect of nature wrought more admiration in them, than in the other all his miracles; surely the heathens knew better how to join and read these mystical letters, than we Christians, who cast a more careless eye on these common hieroglyphics, and disdain to suck divinity from the flowers of nature. Nor do I so forget God, as to adore the name of nature; which I define not with the schools, the principle of motion and rest, but, that straight and regular line, that settled and constant course the wisdom of God hath ordained the actions of his creatures, according to their several kinds. To make a revolution every day is the nature of the sun, because that necessary course which God hath ordained it, from which it cannot swerve, but by a faculty from that voice which first did give it motion. Now this course of nature God seldom alters or perverts, but like an excellent artist hath so contrived his work, that with the self same instrument, without a new creation he may effect his obscurest designs. Thus he sweeteneth the water with a wood, preserveth the creatures in the Ark, which the blast of his mouth might have as easily created: for God is like a skilful geometrician, who when more easily, and with one stroke of his compass, he might describe, or divide a right line, had yet rather do this in a circle or longer way, according to the constituted and forelaid principles of his art: yet this rule of his he doth sometimes pervert, to acquaint the world with his prerogative, lest the arrogancy of our reason should question his power, and conclude he could not; and thus I call the effects of nature the works of God, whose hand and instrument she only is; and therefore to ascribe his actions unto her, is to devolve the honor of the principal agent, upon the instrument; which if with reason we may do, then let our hammers rise up and boast they have built our houses, and our pens receive the honour of our writings. I hold there is a general beauty in the works of God, and therefore no deformity in any kind or species of creature whatsoever: I cannot tell by what logic we call a toad, a bear, or an elephant, ugly, they being created in those outward shapes and figures which best express the actions of their inward forms. And having past that general visitation of God, who saw that all that he had made was good, that is, conformable to his will, which abhors deformity, and is the rule of order and beauty; there is no deformity but in monstrosity, wherein notwithstanding there is a kind of beauty, Nature so ingeniously contriving the irregular parts, as they become sometimes more remarkable than the principal fabric. To speak yet more narrowly, there was never anything ugly, or misshapen, but the chaos; wherein notwithstanding to speak strictly, there was no deformity, because no form, nor was it yet impregnate by the voice of God: Now nature is not at variance with art, nor art with nature; they being both the servants of his providence: Art is the perfection of nature: Were the world now as it was the sixth day, there were yet a chaos: Nature hath made one world, and Art another. In brief, all things are artificial, for nature is the art of God.

SECT. 17 This is the ordinary and open way of his providence, which art and industry have in a good part discovered, whose effects we may foretell without an oracle; to foreshow these is not prophesy, but prognostication. There is another way full of meanders and labyrinths, whereof the Devil and spirits have no exact ephemerides;[1] and that is a more particular and obscure method of his providence, directing the operations of individuals and single essences: this we call Fortune, that serpentine and crooked line, whereby he draws those actions his wisdom intends in a more unknown and secret way. This cryptic and involved method of his providence have I ever admired, nor can I relate the history of my life, the occurrences of my days, the escapes of dangers, and hits of chance, with a bezo las manos [kiss of the hands] to Fortune, or a bare gramercy to my good stars. Abraham might have thought the ram in the thicket came thither by accident; humane reason would have said that mere chance conveyed Moses in the ark to the sight of Pharaoh's daughter [Exodus 2:3–10]; what a labyrinth is there in the story of Joseph [Genesis 37–48], able to convert a Stoic? Surely there are in every man's life certain rubs, doublings, and wrenches which pass awhile under the effects of chance, but at the last, well examined, prove the mere hand of God. 'Twas not dumb chance that, to discover the fougade or powder-plot, contrived a miscarriage in the letter.[2] I like the victory of '88 the better for that one occurrence which our enemies imputed to our dishonour, and the partiality of Fortune, to wit, the tempests and contrariety of winds.[3] King Philip did not detract from the nation when he said he sent his Armada to fight with men, and not to combat with the winds. Where there is a manifest disproportion between the powers and forces of two several agents, upon a maxim of reason we may promise the victory to the superior; but when unexpected accidents slip in, and unthought of occurrences intervene, these must proceed from a power that owes no obedience to those axioms: where, as in the writing upon the wall, we behold the hand, but see not the spring that moves it.

[3] The English victory over the Spanish Armada in 1588 owed a great deal to favourable winds.

The success of that petty province of Holland (of which the Grand Seigneur proudly said, That if they should trouble him as they did the Spaniard, he would send his men with shovels and pick-axes, and throw it into the sea) I cannot altogether ascribe to the ingenuity and industry of the people, but to the mercy of God, that hath disposed them to such a thriving genius; and to the will of providence, that dispenseth her favour to each country in their preordinate season. All cannot be happy at once, for because the glory of one State depends upon the ruin of another, there is a revolution and vicissitude of their greatness, which must obey the swing of that wheel, not moved by intelligences, but by the hand of God, whereby all estates arise to their zenith and vertical points, according to their predestinated periods. For the lives not only of men, but of commonweales, and the whole world, run not upon an helix that still enlargeth, but on a circle where arriving to their meridian, they decline in obscurity, and fall under the horizon again.

SECT. 18 These must not therefore be named the effects of fortune, but in a relative way, and as we term the works of nature. It was the ignorance of man's reason that begat this very name, and by a careless term miscalled the providence of God; for there is no liberty for causes to operate in a loose and straggling way, nor any effect whatsoever, but hath its warrant from some universal or superior cause. 'Tis not a ridiculous devotion, to say a prayer before a game at tables; for even in sortileges and matters of greatest uncertainty, there is a settled and preordered course of effects; 'tis we that are blind, not Fortune: because our eye is too dim to discover the mystery of her effects, we foolishly paint her blind, and hoodwink the providence of the Almighty. I cannot justify that contemptible proverb, That fools only are fortunate, or that insolent paradox, That a wise man is out of the reach of Fortune; much less those opprobrious epithets of poets, whore, baud, and strumpet: 'Tis I confess the common fate of men of singular gifts of mind to be destitute of those of fortune; which doth not any way deject the spirit of wiser judgements, who thoroughly understand the justice of this proceeding; and being enriched with higher donatives, cast a more careless eye on these vulgar parts of felicity. 'Tis a most unjust ambition, to desire to engross the mercies of the Almighty, nor to be content with the goods of mind, without a possession of those of body or fortune: and 'tis an error worse than heresy, to adore these complemental and circumstantial pieces of felicity, and undervalue those perfections and essential points of happiness, wherein we resemble our Maker. To wiser desires 'tis satisfaction enough to deserve, though not to enjoy the favours of Fortune; let providence provide for fools: 'tis not partiality, but equity in God, who deals with us but as our natural parents; those that are able of body and mind, he leaves to their deserts; to those of weaker merits he imparts a larger portion, and pieces out the defect of one by the excess of the other.

Thus have we no just quarrel with Nature, for leaving us naked, or to envy the horns, hoofs, skins, and furs of other creatures, being provided with reason, that can supply them all. We need not labour with so many arguments to confute judicial astrology; for if there be a truth therein, it doth not injure Divinity; if to be born under Mercury disposeth us to be witty, under Jupiter to be wealthy, I do not owe a knee unto these, but unto that merciful hand that hath ordered my indifferent and uncertain nativity unto such benevolous aspects. Those that held that all things were governed by Fortune had not erred, had they not persisted there: the Romans, that erected a temple to Fortune, acknowledged therein, though in a blinder way, somewhat of Divinity; for in a wise supputation all things begin and end in the Almighty. There is a nearer way to heaven than Homer's chain; an easy logic may conjoin heaven and earth in one argument, and with less than a sorites resolve all things into God.[1] For though we christen effects by their most sensible and nearest causes, yet is God the true and infallible cause of all, whose concourse though it be general, yet doth it subdivide itself into the particular actions of every thing, and is that spirit, by which each singular essence not only subsists, but performs its operations.

Sect. 19. The bad construction and perverse comment on these pair of second causes, or visible hands of God, have perverted the devotion of many into atheism; who forgetting the honest advisoes of Faith, have listened unto the conspiracy of Passion and Reason. I have therefore always endeavoured to compose those feuds and angry dissentions between affection, faith, and reason: For there is in our soul a kind of triumvirate, or triple government of three competitors, which distract the peace of this our commonwealth, not less than did that other the state of Rome.

As Reason is a rebel unto Faith, so Passion unto Reason. As the propositions of Faith seem absurd unto Reason, so the theorems of Reason unto Passion, and both unto Faith; yet a moderate and peaceable discretion may so state and order the matter, that they may be all kings, and yet make but one monarchy, every one exercising his sovereignty and prerogative in a due time and place, according to the restraint and limit of circumstance. There are, as in philosophy, so in Divinity, sturdy doubts and boisterous objections, wherewith the unhappiness of our knowledge too nearly acquainteth us. More of these no man hath known than my self, which I confess I conquered, not in a martial posture, but on my knees. For our endeavours are not only to combat with doubts, but always to dispute with the Devil; the villainy of that spirit takes a hint of infidelity from our studies, and by demonstrating a naturality in one way, makes us mistrust a miracle in another.

Thus having perused the Archidoxis and read the secret sympathies of things, he would dissuade my belief from the miracle of the brazen serpent, make me conceit that image worked by sympathy, and was but an Egyptian trick to cure their diseases without a miracle.[2] Again, having seen some experiments of bitumen, and having read far more of naptha, he whispered to my curiosity the fire of the altar might be natural, and bid me mistrust a miracle in Elias, when be entrenched the altar round with water;[3] for that inflammable substance yields not easily unto water, but flames in the arms of its antagonist: and thus would he inveigle my belief to think the combustion of Sodom might be natural, and that there was an asphaltic and bituminous nature in that lake before the fire of Gomorrah. I know that manna is now plentifully gathered in Calabria, and Josephus tells me in his days 'twas as plentiful in Arabia; the Devil therefore made the quaere, Where was then the miracle in the days of Moses? The Israelites saw but that in his time, the natives of those countries behold in ours. Thus the Devil played at chess with me, and yielding a pawn, thought to gain a Queen of me, taking advantage of my honest endeavours; and whilst I laboured to raise the structure of my reason, he strived to undermine the edifice of my faith.

SECT. 27 That miracles are ceased I can neither prove nor absolutely deny, much less define the time and period of their cessation; that they survived Christ is manifest upon record of Scripture; that they out-lived the Apostles also, and were revived at the conversion of nations many years after, we cannot deny, if we shall not question those writers whose testimonies we do not controvert in points that make for our own opinions; therefore that may have some truth in it that is reported by the Jesuits of their miracles in the Indies. I could wish it were true, or had any other testimony than their own pens: they may easily believe those miracles abroad, who daily conceive a greater at home, the transmutation of those visible elements into the body and blood of our Saviour: for the conversion of water into wine, which he wrought in Cana, or what the Devil would have had him done in the wilderness, of stones into bread, compared to this will scarce deserve the name of a miracle.[1] Though indeed, to speak properly, there is not one miracle greater than another, they being the extraordinary effects of the hand of God, to which all things are of an equal facility; and to create the world as easy as one single creature. For this is also a miracle, not only to produce effects against or above nature, but before nature; and to create nature as great a miracle, as to contradict or transcend her. We do too narrowly define the power of God, restraining it to our capacities. I hold that God can do all things; how he should work contradictions, I do not understand, yet dare not therefore deny. I cannot see why the Angel of God should question Esdras to recall the time past,[2] if it were beyond his own power; or that God should pose mortality in that, which he was not able to perform himself. I will not say God cannot, but he will not perform many things, which we plainly affirm he cannot: this I am sure is the mannerliest proposition, wherein notwithstanding I hold no paradox. For strictly his power is the same with his will, and they both with all the rest do make but one God.

SECT. 28 Therefore that miracles have been I do believe, that they may yet be wrought by the living I do not deny: but have no confidence in those which are fathered on the dead; and this hath ever made me suspect the efficacy of relics, to examine the bones, question the habits and appurtenances of Saints, and even of Christ himself. I cannot conceive why the cross that Helena found and whereon Christ himself died should have power to restore others unto life;[3] I excuse not Constantine from a fall off his horse, or a mischief from his enemies, upon the wearing those nails on his bridle which our Saviour bore upon the cross in his hands. I compute among your piae fraudes [pious frauds], nor many degrees before consecrated swords and roses, that which Baldwin King of Jerusalem returned the Genovese for their cost and pains in his war, to wit the ashes of John the Baptist. Those that hold the sanctity of their souls doth leave behind a tincture and sacred faculty on their bodies, speak naturally of miracles, and do not salve the doubt. Now one reason I tender so little devotion unto relics, is, I think, the slender and doubtful respect I have always held unto antiquities: for that indeed which I admire is far before antiquity, that is, eternity, and that is God himself; who though he be styled the Ancient of Days [Daniel 7:9], cannot receive the adjunct of antiquity, who was before the world, and shall be after it, yet is not older then it; for in his years there is no climacteric; his duration is eternity, and far more venerable then antiquity.

SECT. 29 But above all things, I wonder how the curiosity of wiser heads could pass that great and indisputable miracle, the cessation of oracles: and in what swoon their reasons lay, to content themselves and sit down with such far-fetched and ridiculous reasons as Plutarch allegeth for it. The Jews that can believe that supernatural solstice of the sun in the days of Joshua have yet the impudence to deny the eclipse, which even pagans confessed at his death:[1] but for this, it is evident beyond contradiction the Devil himself confessed it.[2] Certainly it is not a warrantable curiosity to examine the verity of Scripture by the concordance of human history, or seek to confirm the chronicle of Hester or Daniel by the authority of Megasthenes or Herodotus. I confess I have had an unhappy curiosity this way, till I laughed myself out of it with a piece of Justine, where he delivers that the children of Israel for being scabbed were banished out of Egypt. And truly since I have understood the occurrences of the world, and know in what counterfeit shapes and deceitful vizards times present represent on the stage things past; I do believe them little more than things to come. Some have been of my opinion, and endeavoured to write the history of their own lives; wherein Moses hath outgone them all, and left not only the story of his life, but as some will have it of his death also.

SECT. 30 It is a riddle to me how this story of oracles hath not wormed out of the world that doubtful conceit of spirits and witches; how so many learned heads should so far forget their metaphysics, and destroy the ladder and scale of creatures, as to question the existence of spirits: for my part, I have ever believed, and do now know, that there are witches; they that doubt of these do not only deny them, but spirits; and are obliquely and upon consequence a sort, not of infidels, but atheists. Those that to confute their incredulity desire to see apparitions shall questionless never behold any, nor have the power to be so much as witches; the Devil hath them already in a heresy as capital as witchcraft, and to appear to them, were but to convert them. Of all the delusions wherewith he deceives mortality, there is not any that puzzleth me more than the legerdemain of changelings. I do not credit those transformations of reasonable creatures into beasts, or that the Devil hath a power to transpeciate a man into a horse, who tempted Christ (as a trial of his divinity) to convert but stones into bread. I could believe that spirits use with man the act of carnality, and that in both sexes; I conceive they may assume, steal, or contrive a body, wherein there may be action enough to content decrepit lust, or passion to satisfy more active veneries; yet in both, without a possibility of generation: and therefore that opinion, that Antichrist should be born of the tribe of Dan by conjunction with the Devil, is ridiculous, and a conceit fitter for a Rabbi than a Christian. I hold that the Devil doth really possess some men, the spirit of melancholy others, the spirit of delusion others; that as the Devil is concealed and denied by some, so God and good angels are pretended by others, whereof the late detection of the Maid of Germany hath left a pregnant example.[3]

SECT. 31 Again, I believe that all that use sorceries, incantations, and spells are not witches, or, as we term them, magicians. I conceive there is a traditional magic, not learned immediately from the Devil, but at second hand from his scholars, who having once the secret betrayed, are able and do empirically practice without his advice, they both proceeding upon the principles of nature: where actives, aptly conjoined to disposed passives, will under any master produce their effects. Thus I think at first a great part of philosophy was witchcraft, which being afterward derived from one to another, proved but philosophy, and was indeed no more than the honest effects of nature. What invented by us is philosophy, learned from him is magic. We do surely owe the honour of many secrets to the discovery of good and bad angels. I could never pass that sentence of Paracelsus without an asterisk or annotation: Ascendens constellatum multa revelat, quaerentibus magnalia naturae, i.e. opera Dei.[1] I do think that many mysteries ascribed to our own inventions have been the courteous revelations of spirits; for those noble essences in heaven bear a friendly regard unto their fellow natures on earth; and therefore [I] believe that those many prodigies and ominous prognostics, which fore-run the ruins of states, princes, and private persons, are the charitable premonitions of good angels, which more careless enquiries term but the effects of chance and nature....

SECT. 33 Therefore for spirits I am so far from denying their existence, that I could easily believe, that not only whole countries, but particular persons have their tutelary, and guardian angels: it is not a new opinion of the Church of Rome, but an old one of Pythagoras and Plato; there is no heresy in it, and if not manifestly defined in Scripture, yet is it an opinion of a good and wholesome use in the course and actions of a man's life, and would serve as an hypothesis to salve many doubts, whereof common philosophy affordeth no solution. Now if you demand my opinion and metaphysics of their natures, I confess them very shallow, most of them in a negative way, like that of God; or in a comparative, between ourselves and fellow creatures; for there is in this universe a stair, or manifest scale of creatures, rising not disorderly, or in confusion, but with a comely method and proportion. Between creatures of mere existence and things of life, there is a large disproportion of nature; between plants and animals or creatures of sense, a wider difference; between them and man, a far greater: and if the proportion hold on, between man and angels there should be yet a greater. We do not comprehend their natures, who retain the first definition of Porphyry and distinguish them from ourselves by immortality; for before his fall, man also was immortal; yet must we needs affirm that he had a different essence from the angels: having therefore no certain knowledge of their natures, 'tis no bad method of the schools, whatsoever perfection we find obscurely in ourselves, in a more complete and absolute way to ascribe unto them....

SECT. 34 These are certainly the magisterial and masterpieces of the Creator, the flower (or as we may say) the best part of nothing; actually existing, what we are but in hopes, and probability; we are only that amphibious piece between a corporal and spiritual essence, that middle form that links those two together, and makes good the method of God and nature, that jumps not from extremes, but unites the incompatible distances by some middle and participating natures. That we are the breath and similitude of God, it is indisputable, and upon record of holy Scripture, but to call ourselves a microcosm, or little world, I thought it only a pleasant trope of rhetoric, till my near judgement and second thoughts told me there was a real truth therein: for first we are a rude mass, and in the rank of creatures which only are, and have a dull kind of being not yet privileged with life, or preferred to sense or reason; next we live the life of plants, the life of animals, the life of men, and at last the life of spirits, running on in one mysterious nature those five kinds of existences, which comprehend the creatures not only of the world, but of the universe. Thus is man that great and true amphibium, whose nature is disposed to live not only like other creatures in diverse elements, but in divided and distinguished worlds; for though there be but one world to sense, there are two to reason; the one visible, the other invisible, whereof Moses seems to have left no description, and of the other so obscurely, that some parts thereof are yet in controversy; and truly for the first chapters of Genesis, I must confess a great deal of obscurity; though divines have to the power of human reason endeavoured to make all go in a literal meaning, yet those allegorical interpretations are also probable, and perhaps the mystical method of Moses bred up in the hieroglyphical schools of the Egyptians....

[1] Thereby is meant our good Angel appointed us from our nativity [Browne's note].

SECT. 36 The whole creation is a mystery, and particularly that of man; at the blast of his mouth were the rest of the creatures made, and at his bare word they started out of nothing: but in the frame of man (as the text describes it) he played the sensible operator, and seemed not so much to create, as make him; when he had separated the materials of other creatures, there consequently resulted a form and soul, but having raised the walls of man, he was driven to a second and harder creation of a substance like himself, an incorruptible and immortal soul.... In our study of anatomy there is a mass of mysterious philosophy, and such as reduced the very heathens to divinity; yet amongst all those rare discoveries and curious pieces I find in the fabric of man, I do not so much content myself as in that I find not, that is, no organ or proper instrument for the rational soul; for in the brain, which we term the seat of reason, there is not anything of moment more than I can discover in the crany of a beast: and this is a sensible and no inconsiderable argument of the inorganity of the soul, at least in that sense we usually so receive it. Thus we are men, and we know not how; there is something in us, that can be without us, and will be after us; though it is strange that it hath no history, what it was before us, nor cannot tell how it entered in us.

SECT. 37 Now for these walls of flesh, wherein the soul doth seem to be immured before the Resurrection, it is nothing but an elemental composition, and a fabric that must fall to ashes. "All flesh is grass," is not only metaphorically, but literally true, for all those creatures we behold are but the herbs of the field, digested into flesh in them, or more remotely carnified in ourselves. Nay further, we are what we all abhor, anthropophagi and cannibals, devourers not only of men, but of ourselves; and that not in an allegory, but a positive truth; for all this mass of flesh which we behold came in at our mouths: this frame we look upon hath been upon our trenchers. In brief, we have devoured ourselves, I cannot believe the wisdom of Pythagoras did ever positively, and in a literal sense, affirm his metempsychosis, or impossible transmigration of the souls of men into beasts: of all metamorphoses or transmigrations, I believe only one, that is of Lot's wife, for that of Nebuchadnezzar proceeded not so far.[1] In all others I conceive no further verity than is contained in their implicit sense and morality: I believe that the whole frame of a beast doth perish, and is left in the same estate after death as before it was materialed into life; that the souls of men know neither contrary nor corruption; that they subsist beyond the body, and outlive death by the privilege of their proper natures, and without a miracle; that the souls of the faithful, as they leave earth, take possession of Heaven: that those apparitions and ghosts of departed persons are not the wandering souls of men, but the unquiet walks of Devils, prompting and suggesting us unto mischief, blood and villainy, instilling and stealing into our hearts that the blessed spirits are not at rest in their graves but wander solicitous of the affairs of the world. That those phantasms appear often, and do frequent cemeteries, charnel houses and churches, it is because those are the dormitories of the dead, where the Devil like an insolent champion beholds with pride the spoils and trophies of his victory in Adam.

SECT. 48 How shall the dead arise, is no question of my faith; to believe only possibilities, is not faith, but mere philosophy; many things are true in divinity, which are neither inducible by reason, nor confirmable by sense, and many things in philosophy confirmable by sense, yet not inducible by reason. Thus it is impossible by any solid or demonstrative reasons to persuade a man to believe the conversion of the needle to the north; though this be possible, and true, and easily credible, upon a single experiment unto the sense. I believe that our estranged and divided ashes shall unite again, that our separated dust after so many pilgrimages and transformations into the parts of minerals, plants, animals, elements, shall at the voice of God return into their primitive shapes; and join again to make up their primary and predestinate forms. As at the Creation, there was a separation of that confused mass into its species, so at the destruction thereof there shall be a separation into its distinct individuals. As at the creation of the world, all the distinct species that we behold, lay involved in one mass, till the fruitful voice of God separated this united multitude into its several species: so at the last day, when these corrupted relics shall be scattered in the wilderness of forms, and seem to have forgot their proper habits, God by a powerful voice shall command them back into their proper shapes, and call them out by their single individuals: Then shall appear the fertility of Adam, and the magic of that sperm that hath dilated into so many millions. I have often beheld as a miracle, that artificial resurrection and revivification of mercury, how being mortified into thousand shapes, it assumes again its own, and returns into its numerical self. Let us speak naturally, and like philosophers, the forms of alterable bodies in these sensible corruptions perish not; nor, as we imagine, wholly quit their mansions, but retire and contract themselves into their secret and unaccessible parts, where they may best protect themselves from the action of their antagonist. A plant or vegetable consumed to ashes, to a contemplative and school philosopher seems utterly destroyed, and the form to have taken his leave forever: But to a sensible artist the forms are not perished, but withdrawn into their incombustible part, where they lie secure from the action of that devouring element. This is made good by experience, which can from the ashes of a plant revive the plant, and from its cinders recall it into its stalk and leaves again. What the art of man can do in these inferior pieces, what blasphemy is it to affirm the finger of God cannot do in these more perfect and sensible structures? This is that mystical philosophy, from whence no true scholar becomes an atheist, but from the visible effects of nature, grows up a real divine, and beholds not in a dream, as Ezekiel [37:1–14], but in an ocular and visible object the types of his resurrection.

SECT. 57 I believe many are saved who to man seem reprobated, and many are reprobated, who in the opinion and sentence of man, stand elected; there will appear at the last day strange and unexpected examples both of his justice and his mercy, and therefore to define either is folly in man, and insolency even in the devils; those acute and subtle spirits, in all their sagacity, can hardly divine who shall be saved; which if they could prognosticate, their labour were at an end; nor need they compass the earth, seeking whom they may devour. Those who upon a rigid application of the Law, sentence Solomon unto damnation, condemn not only him, but themselves, and the whole world; for by the letter and written word of God, we are without exception in the state of death, but there is a prerogative of God, and an arbitrary pleasure above the letter of his own Law, by which alone we can pretend unto salvation, and through which Solomon might be as easily saved as those who condemn him.

SECT. 58 The number of those who pretend unto salvation, and those infinite swarms who think to pass through the eye of this needle, hath much amazed me. That name and compellation of "little flock" [Luke 12:32], doth not comfort but deject my devotion, especially when I reflect upon mine own unworthiness, wherein, according to my humble apprehensions, I am below them all. I believe there shall never be an anarchy in Heaven, but as there are hierarchies amongst the angels, so shall there be degrees of priority amongst the Saints. Yet is it (I protest) beyond my ambition to aspire unto the first ranks; my desires only are, and I shall be happy therein, to be but the last man, and bring up the rear in Heaven.

SECT. 59 Again, I am confident, and fully persuaded, yet dare not take my oath of my salvation; I am as it were sure, and do believe, without all doubt, that there is such a city as Constantinople, yet for me to take my oath thereon were a kind of perjury, because I hold no infallible warrant from my own sense to confirm me in the certainty thereof. And truly, though many pretend an absolute certainty of their salvation, yet when an humble soul shall contemplate her own unworthiness, she shall meet with many doubts and suddenly find how little we stand in need of the precept of Saint Paul, Work out your salvation with fear and trembling. That which is the cause of my election, I hold to be the cause of my salvation, which was the mercy and beneplacit of God, before I was, or the foundation of the world. Before Abraham was, I am, is the saying of Christ, yet is it true in some sense if I say it of myself, for I was not only before my self, but Adam, that is, in the idea of God, and the decree of that synod held from all eternity. And in this sense, I say, the world was before the creation, and at an end before it had a beginning; and thus was I dead before I was alive; though my grave be England, my dying place was Paradise, and Eve miscarried of me before she conceived of Cain.

SECT. 60 Insolent zeals that do decry good works and rely only upon faith, take not away merit: for depending upon the efficacy of their faith, they enforce the condition of God, and in a more sophistical way do seem to challenge Heaven. It was decreed by God, that only those that lapped in the waters like dogs, should have the honour to destroy the Midianites [Judges 7:5–7], yet could none of those justly challenge, or imagine he deserved that honour thereupon. I do not deny, but that true faith, and such as God requires, is not only a mark or token, but also a means of our salvation, but where to find this is as obscure to me, as my last end. And if our Saviour could object unto his own disciples and favourites, a faith that to the quantity of a grain of mustard seed is able to remove mountains; surely, that which we boast of is not anything, or at the most but a remove from nothing. This is the tenor of my belief, wherein, though there be many things singular, and to the humour of my irregular self, yet, if they square not with maturer judgements, I disclaim them, and do no further father them, than the learned and best judgements shall authorize them.

THE SECOND PART

SECT. 1 Now for that other virtue of charity, without which faith is a mere notion, and of no existence, I have ever endeavoured to nourish the merciful disposition and humane inclination I borrowed from my parents, and regulate it to the written and prescribed laws of charity; and if I hold the true anatomy of myself, I am delineated and naturally framed to such a piece of virtue: for I am of a constitution so general, that it consorts and sympathizeth with all things; I have no antipathy, or rather idiosyncracy, in diet, humour, air, anything; I wonder not at the French for their dishes of frogs, snails, and toadstools, nor at the Jews for locusts and grasshoppers, but being amongst them, make them my common viands; and I find they agree with my stomach as well as theirs; I could digest a salad gathered in a church-yard, as well as in a garden. I cannot start at the presence of a serpent, scorpion, lizard, or salamander; at the sight of a toad or viper I find in me no desire to take up a stone to destroy them. I feel not in myself those common antipathies that I can discover in others. Those national repugnances do not touch me, nor do I behold with prejudice the French, Italian, Spaniard, or Dutch; but where I find their actions in balance with my countrymen's, I honour, love, and embrace them in the same degree. I was born in the eighth climate,[1] but seem to be framed and constellated unto all; I am no plant that will not prosper out of a garden. All places, all airs make unto me one country; I am in England everywhere, and under any meridian: I have been shipwrecked, yet am not enemy with the sea or winds; I can study, play, or sleep in a tempest. In brief, I am averse from nothing, neither plant, animal, nor spirit; my conscience would give me the lie if I should say I absolutely detest or hate any essence but the Devil, or so at least abhor anything but that we might come to composition. If there be any among those common objects of hatred I do condemn and laugh at, it is that great enemy of reason, virtue, and religion, the multitude: that numerous piece of monstrosity, which taken asunder seem men, and the reasonable creatures of God; but confused together, make but one great beast, and a monstrosity more prodigious than Hydra; it is no breach of charity to call these fools, it is the style all holy writers have afforded them, set down by Solomon in canonical Scripture, and a point of our faith to believe so. Neither in the name of multitude do I only include the base and minor sort of people; there is a rabble even amongst the gentry, a sort of plebeian heads, whose fancy moves with the same wheel as these; men in the same level with mechanics, though their fortunes do somewhat gild their infirmities, and their purses compound for their follies. But as in casting account, three or four men together come short in account of one man placed by himself below them: so neither are a troop of these ignorant Dorados of that true esteem and value,[2] as many a forlorn person, whose condition doth place him below their feet. Let us speak like politicians; there is a nobility without heraldry, a natural dignity whereby one man is ranked with another, another filed before him, according to the quality of his desert, and preeminence of his good parts. Though the corruption of these times and the bias of present practise wheel another way, thus it was in the first and primitive commonwealths, and is yet in the integrity and cradle of well- ordered polities, till corruption getteth ground, ruder desires labouring after that which wiser considerations condemn, everyone having a liberty to amass and heap up riches, and they a license or faculty to do or purchase anything.

SECT. 5 There is I think no man that apprehends his own miseries less than myself, and no man that so nearly apprehends another's. I could lose an arm without a tear, and with a few groans, methinks, be quartered into pieces; yet can I weep most seriously at a play, and receive with a true passion the counterfeit griefs of those known and professed impostors. It is a barbarous part of inhumanity to add unto any afflicted party's misery, or endeavour to multiply in any man a passion, whose single nature is already above his patience; this was the greatest affliction of Job, and those oblique expostulations of his friends a deeper injury than the downright blows of the Devil. It is not the tears of our own eyes only, but of our friends also, that do exhaust the current of our sorrows, which, falling into many streams, runs more peaceably, and is contented with a narrower channel. It is an act within the power of charity, to translate a passion out of one breast into another, and to divide a sorrow almost out of itself; for an affliction, like a dimension, may be so divided, as if not indivisible, at least to become insensible. Now with my friend I desire not to share or participate, but to engross his sorrows, that by making them mine own, I may more easily discuss them; for in mine own reason, and within my self I can command that which I cannot entreat without myself, and within the circle of another. I have often thought those noble pairs and examples of friendship not so truly histories of what had been, as fictions of what should be, but I now perceive nothing in them but possibilities, nor anything in the heroic examples of Damon and Pythias, Achilles and Patroclus, which methinks upon some grounds I could not perform within the narrow compass of myself. That a man should lay down his life for his friend, seems strange to vulgar affections, and such as confine themselves within that worldly principle, charity begins at home. For mine own part I could never remember the relations that I hold unto myself, nor the respect I owe unto mine own nature, in the cause of God, my country, and my friends. Next to these three, I do embrace myself; I confess I do not observe that order that the schools ordain our affections, to love our parents, wives, children, and then our friends; for excepting the injunctions of religion, I do not find in myself such a necessary and indissoluble sympathy to all those of my blood. I hope I do not break the fifth commandment, if I conceive I may love my friend before the nearest of my blood, even those to whom I owe the principles of life. I never yet cast a true affection on a woman, but I have loved my friend as I do virtue, my soul, my God. From hence methinks I do conceive how God loves man, what happiness there is in the love of God. Omitting all other, there are three most mystical unions: two natures in one person; three persons in one nature; one soul in two bodies. For though indeed they be really divided, yet are they so united, as they seem but one, and make rather a duality then two distinct souls.

---

[1] eighth climate the eighth of the twenty-four climatic belts between the equator and the North Pole.

[2] Dorados wealthy persons.

SECT. 6 There are wonders in true affection, it is a body of enigmas, mysteries, and riddles, wherein two so become one, as they both become two; I love my friend before myself, and yet methinks I do not love him enough; some few months hence my multiplied affection will make me believe I have not loved him at all; when I am from him, I am dead till I be with him, when I am with him, I am not satisfied, but would still be nearer him; united souls are not satisfied with embraces, but desire to be truly each other, which being impossible, their desires are infinite, and must proceed without a possibility of satisfaction. Another misery there is in affection, that whom we truly love like our own selves, we forget their looks, nor can our memory retain the idea of their faces; and it is no wonder, for they are ourselves, and our affection makes their looks our own. This noble affection falls not on vulgar and common constitutions, but on such as are marked for virtue; he that can love his friend with this noble ardour, will in a competent degree affect all. Now, if we can bring our affections to look beyond the body, and cast an eye upon the soul, we have found out the true object, not only of friendship but charity; and the greatest happiness that we can bequeath the soul, is that wherein we all do place our last felicity, salvation, which though it be not in our power to bestow, it is in our charity and pious invocations to desire, if not to procure. And further, I cannot contentedly frame a prayer for myself in particular, without a catalogue of my friends, nor request a happiness wherein my sociable disposition doth not desire the fellowship of my neighbour. I never hear the toll of a passing bell, though in my mirth and at a tavern, without my prayers and best wishes for the departing spirit; I cannot go to cure the body of my patient, but I forget my profession, and call unto God for his soul; I cannot see one say his prayers, but instead of imitating him, I fall into a supplication for him, who perhaps is no more to me than a common nature: and if God hath vouchsafed an ear to my supplications, there are surely many happy that never saw me, and enjoy the blessing of mine unknown devotions. To pray for enemies, that is, for their salvation, is no harsh precept, but the practise of our daily and ordinary devotions.

SECT. 8 I thank God, amongst those millions of vices I do inherit and hold from Adam, I have escaped one, and that a mortal enemy to charity, the first and father sin, not only of man but of the devil, pride, a vice whose name is comprehended in a monosyllable, but in its nature not circumscribed with a world. I have escaped it in a condition that can hardly avoid it: those petty acquisitions and reputed perfections that advance and elevate the conceits of other men add no feathers unto mine; I have seen a grammarian tower and plume himself over a single line in Horace, and show more pride in the construction of one ode, than the author in the composure of the whole book. For my own part, besides the jargon and patois of several provinces, I understand no less then six languages, yet I protest I have no higher conceit of myself, than had our fathers before the confusion of Babel, when there was but one language in the world, and none to boast himself either linguist or critic. I have not only seen several countries, beheld the nature of their climes, the chorography of their provinces, topography of their cities, but understood their several laws, customs and policies; yet cannot all this persuade the dullness of my spirit unto such an opinion of myself, as I behold in nimbler and conceited heads, that never looked a degree beyond their nests. I know the names, and somewhat more, of all the constellations in my horizon, yet I have seen a prating mariner, that could only name the pointers and the North Star, out-talk me, and conceit himself a whole sphere above me. I know most of the plants of my country, and of those about me; yet methinks I do not know so many as when I did but know an hundred, and had scarcely ever simpled further than Cheapside:[1] for indeed heads of capacity, and such as are not full with a handful, or easy measure of knowledge, think they know nothing, till they know all; which being impossible, they fall upon the opinion of Socrates, and only know they know not anything...: we do but learn today what our better advanced judgements will unteach us tomorrow: and Aristotle doth but instruct us, as Plato did him; that is, to confute himself. I have run through all sects, yet find no rest in any; though our first studies and junior endeavours may style us peripatetics, stoics, or academics, yet I perceive the wisest heads prove at last almost all sceptics, and stand like Janus in the field of knowledge. I have therefore one common and authentic philosophy I learned in the schools, whereby I discourse and satisfy the reason of other men; another more reserved and drawn from experience, whereby I content mine own. Solomon that complained of ignorance in the height of knowledge, hath not only humbled my conceits, but discouraged my endeavours. There is yet another conceit that hath sometimes made me shut my books; which tells me it is a vanity to waste our days in the blind pursuit of knowledge; it is but attending a little longer, and we shall enjoy that by instinct and infusion which we endeavour at here by labour and inquisition: it is better to sit down in a modest ignorance, and rest contented with the natural blessing of our own reasons, than buy the uncertain knowledge of this life with sweat and vexation, which death gives every fool gratis, and is an accessory of our glorification.

SECT. 9 I was never yet once,[2] and commend their resolutions who never marry twice; not that I disallow of second marriage, as neither in all cases of polygamy, which, considering some times and the unequal number of both sexes, may be also necessary. The whole woman was made for man, but the twelfth part of man for woman: man is the whole world and the breath of God, woman the rib and crooked piece of man. I could be content that we might procreate like trees, without conjunction, or that there were any way to perpetuate the world without this trivial and vulgar way of coition. It is the foolishest act a wise man commits in all his life, nor is there any thing that will more deject his cold imagination, when he shall consider what an odd and unworthy piece of folly he hath committed. I speak not in prejudice, nor am averse from that sweet sex, but naturally amorous of all that is beautiful; I can look a whole day with delight upon a handsome picture, though it be but of an horse. It is my temper, and I like it the better, to affect all harmony, and sure there is music even in the beauty, and the silent note which Cupid strikes, far sweeter than the sound of an instrument. For there is a music wherever there is a harmony, order, or proportion; and thus far we may maintain the music of the spheres; for those well ordered motions and regular paces, though they give no sound unto the ear, yet to the understanding they strike a note most full of harmony. Whosoever is harmonically composed delights in harmony; which makes me much mistrust the symmetry of those heads which declaim against all Church music. For myself, not only from my obedience, but my particular genius, I do embrace it; for even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes me into a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer; there is something in it of divinity more than the ear discovers. It is an hieroglyphical and shadowed lesson of the whole world, and the creatures of God; such a melody to the ear, as the whole world well understood, would afford the understanding. In brief, it is a sensible fit of that harmony, which intellectually sounds in the ears of God. It unties the ligaments of my frame, takes me to pieces, dilates me out of myself, and by degrees, methinks, resolves me into Heaven. I will not say with Plato, the soul is an harmony, but harmonical, and hath its nearest sympathy unto music: thus, some whose temper of body agrees and humours the constitution of their souls are born poets, though indeed all are naturally inclined unto rhythm…

[2] Browne married in 1641.

I feel not in me those sordid and unchristian desires of my profession; I do not secretly implore and wish for plagues, rejoice at famines, revolve ephemerides, and almanacks in expectation of malignant aspects, fatal conjunctions, and eclipses: I rejoice not at unwholesome springs, nor unseasonable winters; my prayer goes with the husbandman's; I desire every thing in its proper season, that neither men nor the times be out of temper. Let me be sick myself, if sometimes the malady of my patient be not a disease unto me; I desire rather to cure his infirmities than my own necessities; where I do him no good methinks it is scarce honest gain, though I confess 'tis but the worthy salary of our well-intended endeavours. I am not only ashamed, but heartily sorry, that besides death, there are diseases incurable, yet not for my own sake, or that they be beyond my art, but for the general cause and sake of humanity, whose common cause I apprehend as mine own. And to speak more generally, those three noble professions which all civil commonwealths do honour, are raised upon the fall of Adam, and are not anyway exempt from their infirmities; there are not only diseases incurable in physic, but cases indissoluble in laws, vices incorrigible in divinity. If general councils may err, I do not see why particular courts should be infallible; their perfectest rules are raised upon the erroneous reason of man, and the laws of one do but condemn the rules of another; as Aristotle ofttimes the opinions of his predecessors, because, though agreeable to reason, yet were not consonant to his own rules, and the logic of his proper principles. Again, to speak nothing of the sin against the Holy Ghost, whose cure not only, but whose nature is unknown, I can cure the gout or stone in some, sooner than divinity, pride or avarice in others. I can cure vices by physic, when they remain incurable by divinity, and shall obey my pills, when they condemn their precepts. I boast nothing, but plainly say, we all labour against our own cure, for death is the cure of all diseases. There is no catholicon or universal remedy I know but this, which though nauseous to queasy stomachs, yet to prepared appetites is nectar, and a pleasant potion of immortality....

SECT. 11 Now for my life, it is a miracle of thirty years, which to relate were not an history, but a piece of poetry, and would sound to common ears like a fable; for the world, I count it not an inn, but an hospital, and a place not to live, but to die in. The world that I regard is myself; it is the microcosm of mine own frame that I cast mine eye on; for the other, I use it but like my globe, and turn it round sometimes for my recreation. Men that look upon my outside, perusing only my condition and fortunes, do err in my altitude; for I am above Atlas his shoulders. The earth is a point not only in respect of the heavens above us, but of that heavenly and celestial part within us: that mass of flesh that circumscribes me, limits not my mind: that surface that tells the heavens it hath an end, cannot persuade me I have any; I take my circle to be above three hundred and sixty; though the number of the ark do measure my body, it comprehendeth not my mind: whilst I study to find how I am a microcosm or little world, I find myself something more than the great. There is surely a piece of divinity in us, something that was before the elements and owes no homage unto the sun. Nature tells me I am the image of God, as well as scripture; he that understands not thus much hath not his introduction or first lesson, and is yet to begin the alphabet of man.

Let me not injure the felicity of others, if I say I am as happy as any, I have that in me can convert poverty into riches, adversity into prosperity: I am more invulnerable than Achilles, fortune hath not one place to hit me; Ruat coelum, Fiat voluntas tua [may your will be done though the heavens fall] salveth all; so that whatsoever happens, it is but what our daily prayers desire. In brief, I am content, and what should providence add more? Surely this is it we call happiness, and this do I enjoy; with this I am happy in a dream, and as content to enjoy a happiness in a fancy as others in a more apparent truth and reality.

SECT. 15 I conclude therefore and say, there is no happiness under (or as Copernicus will have it, above) the sun, nor any crambe in that repeated verity and burden of all the wisdom of Solomon, All is vanity and vexation of spirit; there is no felicity in that the world adores.[1] Aristotle whilst he labours to refute the ideas of Plato, falls upon one himself: for his summum bonum [greatest good] is a chimæra, and there is no such thing as his felicity. That wherein God himself is happy, the holy angels are happy, in whose defect the Devils are unhappy; that dare I call happiness: whatsoever conduceth unto this, may with an easy metaphor deserve that name; whatsoever else the world terms happiness, is to me a story out of Pliny, an apparition, or neat delusion, wherein there is no more of happiness than the name. Bless me in this life with but the peace of my conscience, command of my affections, the love of thyself and my dearest friends, and I shall be happy enough to pity Caesar. These are O Lord the humble desires of my most reasonable ambition and all I dare call happiness on earth: wherein I set no rule or limit to thy hand or providence. Dispose of me according to the wisdom of thy pleasure. Thy will be done, though in my own undoing.

Hydriotaphia, Urne-Burial, or A Discourse of the Sepulchral Urnes Lately found in Norfolk
(excerpts)

To my Worthy and Honoured Friend,
Thomas le Gros, of Crostwick, Esquire

When the funeral pyre was out, and the last valediction over, men took a lasting adieu of their interred friends, little expecting the curiosity of future ages should comment upon their ashes, and, having no old experience of the duration of the relics, held no opinion of such after-considerations.

But who knows the fate of his bones, or how often he is to be buried? who hath the oracle of his ashes, or whither they are to be scattered? The relics of many lie like the ruins of Pompey's, in all parts of the earth; and when they arrive at your hands, these may seem to have wandered far, who in a direct and meridian travel, have but few miles of known Earth between yourself and the pole.

That the bones of Theseus should be seen again in Athens was not beyond conjecture, and hopeful expectation; but that these should arise so opportunely to serve yourself, was an hit of fate and honour beyond prediction.

We cannot but wish these urns might have the effect of theatrical vessels, and great Hippodrome urns in Rome,[1] to resound the acclamations and honour due unto you. But these are sad and sepulchral pitchers, which have no joyful voices; silently expressing old mortality, the ruins of forgotten times, and can only speak with life, how long in this corruptible frame, some parts may be uncorrupted; yet able to outlast bones long unborn, and noblest pile among us.

We present not these as any strange sight or spectacle unknown to your eyes, who have beheld the best of urns and noblest variety of ashes; who are yourself no slender master of antiquities, and can daily command the view of so many imperial faces,[2] which raiseth your thoughts unto old things, and consideration of times before you, when even living men were antiquities; when the living might exceed the dead, and to depart this world, could not be properly said to go unto the greater number. And so run up your thoughts upon the ancient of days, the antiquary's truest object, unto whom the eldest parcels are young, and earth itself an infant; and without Egyptian account makes but small noise in thousands.

We were hinted by the occasion, not catched the opportunity to write of old things, or intrude upon the antiquary. We are coldly drawn unto discourses of antiquities, who have scarce time before us to comprehend new things, or make out learned novelties. But seeing they arose as they lay, almost in silence among us, at least in short account suddenly passed over; we were very unwilling they should die again, and be buried twice among us.

Beside, to preserve the living, and make the dead to live, to keep men out of their urns, and discourse of human fragments in them, is not impertinent unto our profession; whose study is life and death, who daily behold examples of mortality, and of all men least need artificial mementos, or coffins by our bedside, to mind us of our graves.

'Tis time to observe occurrences, and let nothing remarkable escape us. The supinity of elder days hath left so much in silence, or time hath so martyred the records, that the most industrious heads do find no easy work to erect a new Britannia.[3]

'Tis opportune to look back upon old times, and contemplate our forefathers. Great examples grow thin, and to be fetched from the passed world. Simplicity flies away, and inequity comes at long strides upon us. We have enough to do to make up ourselves from present and passed times, and the whole stage of things scarce serveth for our instruction. A complete piece of virtue must be made from the centos of all ages,[1] as all the beauties of Greece could make but one handsome Venus.

[1] Conceived to resound the voices of people at their shows [Browne's note]; the Hippodrome was the site of horse races.

[2] imperial faces on coins.

[3] Britannia a famous antiquarian work (1586) by William Camden.

When the bones of King Arthur were digged up, the old race might think they beheld therein some originals of themselves; unto these of our urns none here can pretend relation, and can only behold the relics of those persons who in their life giving the laws unto their predecessors, after long obscurity, now lie at their mercies. But, remembering the early civility they brought upon these countries, and forgetting long passed mischiefs, we mercifully preserve their bones, and piss not upon their ashes.

In the offer of these antiquities we drive not at ancient families, so long outlasted by them. We are far from erecting your worth upon the pillars of your forefathers, whose merits you illustrate. We honour your old virtues, conformable unto times before you, which are the noblest armoury. And, having long experience of your friendly conversation, void of empty formality, full of freedoms, constant and generous honesty. I look upon you as a gem of the old rock, and must profess myself even to urn and ashes,

Your every faithful friend and servant,

Thomas Browne

CHAPTER I

In the deep discovery of the subterranean world, a shallow part would satisfy some enquirers; who, if two or three yards were open about the surface, would not care to rake the bowels of Potosi,[2] and regions towards the centre. Nature hath furnished one part of the Earth, and man another. The treasures of time lie high, in urns, coins, and monuments, scarce below the roots of some vegetables. Time hath endless rarities, and shows of all varieties; which reveals old things in heaven, makes new discoveries in earth, and even earth itself a discovery. That great antiquity America lay buried for a thousand years; and a large part of the earth is still in the urn unto us.

Though if Adam were made out of an extract of the earth, all parts might challenge a restitution, yet few have returned their bones far lower than they might receive them; not affecting the graves of giants, under hilly and heavy coverings, but content with less than their own depth, have wished their bones might lie soft, and the earth be light upon them. Even such as hope to rise again would not be content with central interment, or so desperately to place their relics as to lie beyond discovery, and in no way to be seen again; which happy contrivance hath made communication with our forefathers, and left unto our view some parts, which they never beheld themselves.

The solemnities, ceremonies, rites of their cremation or interment, so solemnly delivered by authors, we shall not disparage our reader to repeat. Only the last and lasting part in their urns, collected bones and ashes, we cannot wholly omit or decline that subject, which occasion lately presented, in some discovered among us.

In a field of old Walsingham, not many months past, were digged up between forty and fifty urns, deposited in a dry and sandy soil, not a yard deep, nor far from one another. Not all strictly of one figure, but most answering these described: some containing two pounds of bones, distinguishable in skulls, ribs, jaws, thighbones, and teeth, with fresh impressions of their combustion. Besides the extraneous substances, like pieces of small boxes, or combs handsomely wrought, handles of small brass instruments, brazen nippers, and in one some kind of opal.

[1] centos scraps.

[2] Potosi the rich mountain of Peru [Browne's note].

Near the same plot of ground, for about six yards compass, were digged up coals and incinerated substances, which begat conjecture that this was the ustrina or place of burning their bodies, or some sacrificing place unto the manes [spirit], which was properly below the surface of the ground, as the aræ and altars unto the gods and heroes above it.

That these were the urns of Romans from the common custom and place where they were found, is no obscure conjecture,[1] not far from a Roman garrison, and but five miles from Brancaster, set down by ancient record under the name of Brannodunum. And where the adjoining town, containing seven parishes, in no very different sound, but Saxon termination, still retains the name of Burnham, which being an early station, it is not improbable the neighbour parts were filled with habitations, either of Romans themselves, or Brittains romanised, which observed the Roman customs....

Than the time of these urns deposited, or precise antiquity of these relics, nothing of more uncertainty. For since the lieutenant of Claudius seems to have made the first progress into these parts, since Boadicea was overthrown by the forces of Nero, and Agricola put a full end to these conquests; it is not probable the country was fully garrisoned or planted before; and therefore however these urns might be of later date, not likely of higher antiquity.[2]

And the succeeding Emperors desisted not from their conquests in these and other parts; as testified by history and medal inscriptions yet extant. The province of Britain, in so divided a distance from Rome, beholding the faces of many imperial persons, and in large account no fewer than Cæsar, Claudius, Britannicus, Vespasian, Titus, Adrian, Severus, Commodus, Geta, and Caracalla.

A great obscurity herein, because no medal or Emperor's coin enclosed, which might denote the date of their interments, observable in many urns, and found in those of Spitalfields by London, which contained the coins of Claudius, Vespasian, Commodus, Antoninus, attended with lachrymatories,[3] lamps, bottles of liquor, and other appurtenances of affectionate superstition, which in these rural interments were wanting.

Some uncertainty there is from the period or term of burning, or the cessation of that practise. Macrobius affirmeth it was disused in his days. But most agree, though without authentic record, that it ceased with the Antonini. Most safely to be understood after the reign of those Emperors, which assumed the name of Antoninus, extending unto Heliogabalus. Not strictly after Marcus: for about fifty years later we find the magnificent burning and consecration of Severus; and if we so fix this period or cessation, these urns will challenge above thirteen hundred years.[4]

But whether this practise was only then left by Emperors and great persons, or generally about Rome, and not in other provinces, we hold no authentic account. For after Tertullian, in the days of Minucius it was obviously objected upon Christians that they condemned the practise of burning. And we find a passage in Sidonius, which asserteth that practise in France unto a lower account. And perhaps not fully disused till Christianity fully established, which gave the final extinction to these sepulchral bonfires.

[1] Browne suggests that the urns date from the Roman occupation of Britain (43–410 C.E.). On the basis of an engraved illustration of the urns in the original edition, they have been identified instead as pre-Christian Saxon.

[2] For since...antiquity Browne argues that the urns could not be earlier than 78 C.E., after the first Roman excursions into Norfolk by Publius Ostorius Scapula ("the lieutenant of Claudius"), the suppression of native uprisings led by Queen Boadicea (d. 62), and the beginning of systematic pacification by Gnaeus Julius Agrippa.

[3] lachrymatories glass phials found in Roman tombs, presumably designed to hold tears.

[4] this period the beginning of the third century C.E.

Whether they were the bones of men or women or children, no authentic decision from ancient custom in distinct places of burial. Although not improbably conjectured, that the double sepulchre or burying place of Abraham had in it such intention. But from exility of bones, thinness of skulls, smallness of teeth, ribs, and thighbones; not improbable that many thereof were persons of minor age, or women. Confirmable also from things contained in them: in most were found substances resembling combs, plates like boxes, fastened with iron pins, and handsomely overwrought like the necks or bridges of musical instruments, long brass plates overwrought like the handles of neat implements, brazen nippers to pull away hair, and in one a kind of opal, yet maintaining a bluish colour.

Now that they accustomed to burn or bury with them things wherein they excelled, delighted, or which were dear unto them, either as farewells unto all pleasure, or vain apprehension that they might use them in the other world, is testified by all antiquity. Observable from the gem or beryl ring upon the finger of Cynthia, the mistress of Propertius, when after her funeral pyre her ghost appeared unto him. And notably illustrated from the contents of that Roman urn preserved by Cardinal Farnese, wherein besides great number of gems with heads of gods and goddesses were found an ape of agate, a grasshopper, an elephant of amber, a crystal ball, three glasses, two spoons, and six nuts of crystal, and beyond the content of urns, in the monument of Childerick the first, and fourth king from Pharamond, casually discovered three years past at Tournay, restoring unto the world much gold richly adorning his sword, two hundred rubies, many hundred Imperial coins, three hundred golden bees, the bones and horseshoe of his horse interred with him, according to the barbarous magnificence of those days in their sepulchral obsequies. Although if we steer by the conjecture of many and Septuagint expression, some trace thereof may be found even with the ancient Hebrews, not only from the sepulchral treasure of David, but the circumcision knives which Joshua also buried.

Some men considering the contents of these urns, lasting pieces and toys included in them, and the custom of burning with many other nations, might somewhat doubt whether all urns found among us were properly Roman relics, or some not belonging unto our British, Saxon, or Danish forefathers.

In the form of burial among the ancient Brittains, the large discourses of Cæsar, Tacitus, and Strabo are silent. For the discovery whereof, with other particulars, we much deplore the loss of that letter which Cicero expected or received from his brother Quintus, as a resolution of British customs; or the account which might have been made by Scribonius Largus, the physician accompanying the Emperor Claudius, who might have also discovered that frugal bit of the old Britains, which in the bigness of a bean could satisfy their thirst and hunger.[1]

But that the Druids and ruling priests used to burn and bury, is expressed by Pomponius. That Bellinus, the brother of Brennus and King of the Brittains, was burnt is acknowledged by Polydorus. That they held that practise in Gallia, Cæsar expressly delivereth. Whether the Brittains (probably descended from them, of like religion, language and manners) did not sometimes make use of burning; or whether at least such as were after civilized unto the Roman life and manners, conformed not unto this practise, we have no historical assertion or denial. But since, from the account of Tacitus the Romans early wrought so much civility upon the British stock, that they brought them to build temples, to wear the gown, and study the Roman laws and language, that they conformed also unto their religious rites and customs in burials, seems no improbable conjecture.

CHAPTER 5

Now since these dead bones have already out-lasted the living ones of Methuselah,[1] and in a yard underground, and thin walls of clay, out-worn all the strong and specious buildings above it; and quietly rested under the drums and tramplings of three conquests;[2] What Prince can promise such diuturnity unto his relics,[3] or might not gladly say,

Sic ego componi versus in ossa velim.[4]

Time which antiquates antiquities, and hath an art to make dust of all things, hath yet spared these minor monuments. In vain we hope to be known by open and visible conservatories, when to be unknown was the means of their continuation and obscurity into protection: If they died by violent hands, and were thrust into their urns, these bones become considerable, and some old philosophers would honour them, whose souls they conceived most pure, which were thus snatched from their bodies; and to retain a stronger propension unto them: whereas they weariedly left a languishing corps, and with faint desires of reunion. If they fell by long and aged decay, yet wrapt up in the bundle of time, they fall into indistinction, and make but one blot with infants. If we begin to die when we live, and long life be but a prolongation of death; our life is a sad composition; we live with death, and die not in a moment. How many pulses made up the life of Methuselah, were work for Archimedes: Common counters sum up the life of Moses his man [Psalm 90:10]. Our days become considerable like petty sums by minute accumulations; where numerous fractions make up but small round numbers; and our days of a span long make not one little finger.[5]

If the nearness of our last necessity, brought a nearer conformity unto it, there were a happiness in hoary hairs, and no calamity in half senses. But the long habit of living indisposeth us for dying; when avarice makes us the sport of death; when even David grew politickly cruel; and Solomon could hardly be said to be the wisest of men. But many are too early old, and before the date of age. Adversity stretcheth our days, misery makes Alcmenas nights,[6] and time hath no wings unto it. But the most tedious being is that which can unwish itself, content to be nothing, or never to have been, which was beyond the malcontent of Job, who cursed not the day of his life, but his nativity: Content to have so far been, as to have a title to future being; although he had lived here but in an hidden state of life, and as it were an abortion.

What song the Sirens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions are not beyond all conjecture.[7] What time the persons of these ossuaries entered the famous nations of the dead, and slept with princes and counsellors, might admit a wide solution. But who were the proprietaries of these bones, or what bodies these ashes made up, were a question above antiquarianism. Not to be resolved by man, nor easily perhaps by spirits, except we consult the provincial guardians, or tutelary observators. Had they made as good provision for their names, as they have done for the reliques, they had not so grossly erred in the art of perpetuation. But to subsist in bones, and be but pyramidally extant, is a fallacy in duration. Vain ashes, which in the oblivion of names, persons, times, and sexes, have found unto themselves, a fruitless continuation, and only arise unto late posterity, as emblems of mortal vanities; antidotes against pride, vain-glory, and madding vices. Pagan vain-glories which thought the world might last forever, had encouragement for ambition, and finding no Atropos unto the immortality of their names, were never damped with the necessity of oblivion.[1] Even old ambitions had the advantage of ours, in the attempts of their vain-glories, who acting early, and before the probable meridian of time, have by this time found great accomplishment of their designs, whereby the ancient heroes have already outlasted their monuments, and mechanical preservations. But in this latter scene of time we cannot expect such mummies unto our memories, when ambition may fear the prophecy of Elias,[2] and Charles the Fifth can never hope to live within two Methuselahs of Hector.[3]

[1] Methuselah traditionally, the oldest human; he lived 969 years (Genesis 5:27).

[2] three conquests Saxon, Danish, and Norman.

[3] diuturnity long-lastingness (OED).

[5] according to the ancient arithmetic of the hand wherein the little finger of the right hand contracted, signified an hundred [Browne's note].

[6] Alcmenas nights Zeus extended one night to the length of three when he seduced Alcmene, the mother of Hercules.

[7] the puzzling questions of Tiberius unto Grammarians [Browne's note]. Suetonius, Life of Tiberius, 70.

And therefore restless inquietude for the diuturnity of our memories unto present considerations, seems a vanity almost out of date, and superannuated piece of folly. We cannot hope to live so long in our names, as some have done in their persons, one face of Janus holds no proportion unto the other. 'Tis too late to be ambitious. The great mutations of the world are acted, or time may be too short for our designs. To extend our memories by monuments, whose death we daily pray for, and whose duration we cannot hope, without injury to our expectations, in the advent of the last day, were a contradiction to our beliefs. We whose generations are ordained in this setting part of time, are providentially taken off from such imaginations. And being necessitated to eye the remaining particle of futurity, are naturally constituted unto thoughts of the next world, and cannot excusably decline the consideration of that duration, which maketh pyramids pillars of snow, and all that's past a moment.

Circles and right lines limit and close all bodies, and the mortal right-lined circle,[4] must conclude and shut up all. There is no antidote against the opium of time, which temporally considereth all things; our Fathers find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how we may be buried in our survivors. Gravestones tell truth scarce forty years:[5] Generations pass while some trees stand, and old families last not three oaks. To be read by bare inscriptions like many in Gruter,[6] to hope for eternity by enigmatical epithets, or first letters of our names, to be studied by antiquaries, who we were, and have new names given us like many of the mummies,[7] are cold consolations unto the students of perpetuity, even by everlasting languages.

To be content that times to come should only know there was such a man, not caring whether they knew more of him, was a frigid ambition in

The world was commonly thought to have been created about 4000 years B.C.E.; if it were to last for 6000 years, the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V (born in 1500) had only 500 years in which to be famous before the world ended.

Cardan:[1] disparaging his horoscopal inclination and judgment of himself. Who cares to subsist like Hippocrates' patients, or Achilles' horses in Homer, under naked nominations, without deserts and noble acts, which are the balsam of our memories, the entelechia and soul of our subsistences.[2] To be nameless in worthy deeds exceeds an infamous history. The Canaanitish woman lives more happily without a name, than Herodias with one.[3] And who had not rather have been the good thief, than Pilate?

But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit of perpetuity. Who can but pity the founder of the Pyramids? Herostratus lives that burnt the Temple of Diana, he is almost lost that built it; time hath spared the epitaph of Adrian's horse, confounded that of himself. In vain we compute our felicities by the advantage of our good names, since bad have equal durations; and Thersites is like to live as long as Agamemnon.[4] Who knows whether the best of men be known? or whether there be not more remarkable persons forgot, than any that stand remembered in the known account of time? without the favour of the everlasting register the first man had been as unknown as the last,[5] and Methuselah's long life had been his only chronicle.

Oblivion is not to be hired: The greater part must be content to be as though they had not been, to be found in the register of God, not in the record of man. Twenty-seven names make up the first story,[6] and the recorded names ever since contain not one living century. The number of the dead long exceedeth all that shall live. The night of time far surpasseth the day, and who knows when was the equinox? Every hour adds unto that current arithmetic, which scarce stands one moment. And since death must be the Lucina of life,[7] and even pagans could doubt whether thus to live, were to die. Since our longest sun sets at right descensions, and makes but winter arches, and therefore it cannot be long before we lie down in darkness, and have our light in ashes.[8] Since the brother of death daily haunts us with dying mementos,[9] and time that grows old itself, bids us hope no long duration: Diuturnity is a dream and folly of expectation.

Darkness and light divide the course of time, and oblivion snares with memory, a great part even of our living beings; we slightly remember our felicities, and the smartest strokes of affliction leave but short smart upon us. Sense endureth no extremities, and sorrows destroy us or themselves. To weep into stones are fables.[10] Afflictions induce callosities, miseries are slippery, or fall like snow upon us, which notwithstanding is no unhappy stupidity. To be ignorant of evils to come, and forgetful of evils past, is a merciful provision in nature, whereby we digest the mixture of our few and evil days, and our delivered senses not relapsing into cutting remembrances, our sorrows are not kept raw by the edge of repetitions. A great part of antiquity contented their hopes of subsistency with a transmigration of their souls. A good way to continue their memories, while having the advantage of plural successions, they could not but act something remarkable in such variety of beings, and enjoying the fame of their passed selves, make accumulation of glory unto their last durations. Others rather than be lost in the uncomfortable night of nothing, were content to recede into the common being, and make one particle of the public soul of all things, which was no more than to return into their unknown and divine original again. Egyptian ingenuity was more unsatisfied, contriving their bodies in sweet consistences, to attend the return of their souls. But all was vanity, feeding the wind, and folly. The Egyptian mummies, which Cambyses or time hath spared,[1] avarice now consumeth. Mummy is become merchandise, Mizraim cures wounds, and Pharaoh is sold for balsams.[2]

[10] In mythology, Niobe turned into a stone from weeping.

In vain do individuals hope for immortality, or any patent from oblivion, in preservations below the moon: Men have been deceived even in their flatteries above the sun, and studied conceits to perpetuate their names in heaven. The various cosmography of that part hath already varied the names of contrived constellations; Nimrod is lost in Orion, and Osiris in the Dog-star. While we look for incorruption in the heavens, we find they are but like the Earth; durable in their main bodies, alterable in their parts: whereof beside comets and new stars, perspectives begin to tell tales.[3] And the spots that wander about the sun, with Phaeton's favour,[4] would make clear conviction.

There is nothing strictly immortal, but immortality; whatever hath no beginning may be confident of no end. All others have a dependent being, and within the reach of destruction, which is the peculiar of that necessary essence that cannot destroy itself; and the highest strain of omnipotency to be so powerfully constituted, as not to suffer even from the power of itself. But the sufficiency of Christian immortality frustrates all earthly glory, and the quality of either state after death, makes a folly of posthumous memory. God who can only destroy our souls, and hath assured our resurrection, either of our bodies or names hath directly promised no duration. Wherein there is so much of chance that the boldest expectants have found unhappy frustration; and to hold long subsistence, seems but a scape in oblivion. But man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave, solemnizing nativities and deaths with equal lustre, not omitting ceremonies of bravery, in the infamy of his nature.

Life is a pure flame, and we live by an invisible sun within us. A small fire sufficeth for life, great flames seemed too little after death, while men vainly affected precious pyres, and to burn like Sardanapalus,[5] but the wisdom of funeral laws, found the folly of prodigal blazes, and reduced undoing fires, unto the rule of sober obsequies, wherein few could be so mean as not to provide wood, pitch, a mourner, and an urn.

Five languages secured not the epitaph of Gordianus;[6] the man of God lives longer without a tomb than any by one, invisibly interred by angels, and adjudged to obscurity, though not without some marks directing humane discovery. Enoch and Elias without either tomb or burial,[7] in an anomalous state of being, are the great examples of perpetuity, in their long and living memory, in strict account being still on this side death, and having a late part yet to act upon this stage of earth. If in the decretory term of the world we shall not all die but be changed, according to received translation; the last day will make but few graves; at least quick resurrections will anticipate lasting sepultures; some graves will be opened before they be quite closed, and Lazarus be no wonder. When many that feared to die shall groan that they can die but once, the dismal state is the second and living death, when life puts despair on the damned; when men shall wish the coverings of mountains, not of monuments, and annihilation shall be courted.

[7] Enoch and Elias were both taken directly to Heaven (Genesis 5:24, II Kings 2:11).

While some have studied monuments, others have studiously declined them: and some have been so vainly boisterous, that they durst not acknowledge their graves; wherein Alaricus seems most subtle, who had a river turned to hide his bones at the bottom.[1] Even Sylla that thought himself safe in his urn, could not prevent revenging tongues, and stones thrown at his monument.[2] Happy are they whom privacy makes innocent, who deal so with men in this world, that they are not afraid to meet them in the next, who when they die, make no commotion among the dead, and are not touched with that poetical taunt of Isaiah.[3]

Pyramids, arches, obelisks, were but the irregularities of vain-glory, and wild enormities of ancient magnanimity. But the most magnanimous resolution rests in the Christian religion, which trampleth upon pride, and sets on the neck of ambition, humbly pursuing that infallible perpetuity, unto which all others must diminish their diameters, and be poorly seen in angles of contingency.[4]

Pious spirits who passed their days in raptures of futurity, made little more of this world, than the world that was before it, while they lay obscure in the chaos of pre-ordination, and night of their fore-beings. And if any have been so happy as truly to understand Christian annihilation, extasis, exolution, liquefaction, transformation, the kiss of the spouse, gustation of God, and ingression in the divine shadow,[5] they have already had an handsome anticipation of heaven; the glory of the world is surely over, and the earth in ashes unto them.

To subsist in lasting monuments, to live in their productions, to exist in their names, and predicament of chimeras, was large satisfaction unto old expectations, and made one part of their Elysiums.[6] But all this is nothing in the metaphysics of true belief. To live indeed is to be again ourselves, which being not only an hope but an evidence in noble believers; 'Tis all one to lie in St. Innocent's churchyard,[7] as in the sand of Egypt: ready to be anything, in the ecstasy of being ever, and as content with six foot as the moles of Adrianus.[8]

Edmund Waller

1606 – 1687

Waller was born in 1606 in Coleshill, Hertfordshire, the eldest son of Robert and Anne Waller. He was educated at High Wycombe and, after his father's death in 1616, at Eton and Cambridge, which he appears to have left without a degree. In 1622 he was admitted to Lincoln's Inn. Some sources contend that he first sat in Parliament at the age of sixteen, although it appears more likely that it would have been in 1624, when Amersham, which was his first constituency, recovered its right to return members. In 1631, Waller, who had been left a considerable inheritance by his own father, married Anne Banks, a substantial heiress, and went to live in Beaconsfield where his wife died in 1634 giving birth to their second child. Shortly thereafter Waller became part of a company of literary men, the "Club," who encouraged his literary efforts. His first publications, in 1633 and 1645, were followed by three editions of his collected verse in 1645. During the Civil War Waller participated in a plot to secure London for the King. When the plot was discovered Waller was imprisoned, declared incapable of sitting in Parliament, fined, and banished from England. Shortly before leaving for France, Waller married Mary Bracey of Oxfordshire. In November 1651 Waller was pardoned and returned to England. In 1661 he was restored to Parliament and served until 1687, when he died at his home in Beaconsfield.

On a Girdle

That which her slender waist confined,
Shall now my joyful temples bind;
No monarch but would give his crown,
His arms might do what this has done.

It was my heaven's extremist sphere,
The pale which held that lovely deer.[1]
My joy, my grief, my hope, my love,
Did all within this circle move!

A narrow compass! and yet there
Dwelt all that's good, and all that's fair;
Give me but what this riband bound,[2]
Take all the rest the sun goes round.
—1645

Go, Lovely Rose!

Go, lovely rose!
Tell her that wastes her time and me
That now she knows,
When I resemble her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be.

Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts, where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired.

Then die! that she
The common fate of all things rare

Upon His Majesty's Repairing of Paul's [1]

That shipwrecked vessel which th' Apostle bore, [2]
Scarce suffered more upon Melita's shore,
Than did his temple in the sea of time,
(Our nation's glory, and our nation's crime) [3]
When the first monarch of this happy isle, [4]
Moved with the ruin of so brave a pile,
This work of cost and piety begun,
To be accomplished by his glorious son,
Who all that came within the ample thought
Of his wise sire has to perfection brought;
He, like Amphion, makes those quarries leap
Into fair figures from a confused heap: [5]
For in his art of regiment is found
A power like that of harmony in sound. [6]
Those antique minstrels sure were Charles-like kings, [7]
Cities their lutes, and subjects' hearts their strings,
On which with so divine a hand they strook, [8]
Consent of motion from their breath they took
So all our minds with his conspire to grace
The Gentiles' great apostle, and deface
Those state-obscuring sheds, that like a chain
Seemed to confine and fetter him again; [9]
Which the glad saint shakes off at his command,
As once the viper from his sacred hand: [10]
So joys the aged oak, when we divide
The creeping ivy from his injured side.

Ambition rather would affect the fame
Of some new structure, to have borne her name;
Two distant virtues in one act we find,
The modesty and greatness of his mind;
Which not content to be above the rage,
And injury of all-impairing age,
In its own worth secure, doth higher climb,
And things half swallowed from the jaws of Time
Reduce ; an earnest of his grand design,
To frame no new church, but the old refine: [11]
Which, spouse-like, may with comely grace command
More than by force of argument or hand.
For doubtful reason few can apprehend,
And war brings ruin where it should amend;

[1] There is evidence that this poem was in manuscript circulation before its publication. For historical context see Margaret Whinney and Oliver Millar, English Art 1625–1714 (Oxford: Clarendon P, 1957), 29–32, where the point is made (p. 30) that "the work on St. Paul's contributed materially to public discontent, and so ultimately to rebellion." See also David Norbrook, Writing the English Republic (Cambridge: CUP, 1999), 74–78.

[2] th' Apostle St. Paul. See Acts 27–28. Melita is the modern Malta.

[3] glory St. Paul's was regarded as the most imposing building in Europe; crime presumably because it had been allowed to fall into decay.

[4] the first monarch of this happy isle James I, formerly James VI of Scotland, as the first King of England to rule over a "united kingdom."

[5] Amphion the son of Zeus and Antiope; legendary builder of Thebes. The stones moved into their places in response to his lyre (OCD). It seems likely that Marvell had this couplet in mind in the opening of Upon Appleton House, with its sardonic comment on the megalomaniac "foreign architect / That unto caves the quarries drew." Inigo Jones may not have been a foreign architect but he was certainly influenced by foreign practices.

[6] regiment rule or government, especially royal or magisterial authority (OED regiment sb 1). Milton, who was no admirer of Charles I, may have remembered this couplet, on the consonance between architecture and music, when he described the building of Pandemonium: "as in an Organ from one blast of wind / To many a row of Pipes the sound-board breathes" (Paradise Lost, 1.709–10).

[7] antique minstrels Amphion, Orpheus and so on.

[8] strook struck.

[9] state-obscuring sheds Whinney and Millar (30) write that "difficulties connected with the pulling down of houses abutting on the cathedral were swept aside." "The inhabitants of the houses opposed these changes, which they saw as an exploitation of royal power to override the liberties of the city" (Norbrook, 77).

[10] As once the viper from his sacred hand Acts 28:1–6.

[11] Reduce in its Latinate sense of "bring back, restore."

But beauty, with a bloodless conquest, finds
A welcome sovereignty in rudest minds.

Not aught which Sheba's wond'ring queen beheld
Amongst the works of Solomon, excelled [1]
His ships, and building; emblems of a heart
Large both in magnanimity and art.
While the propitious heavens this work attend,
Long-wanted showers they forget to send;
As if they meant to make it understood
Of more importance than our vital food.

The Sun, which riseth to salute the choir,
Already finished, setting shall admire
How private bounty could so far extend;
The King built all, but Charles the western end. [2]
So proud a fabric to devotion given,
At once it threatneth and obliges heaven.

Laomedon, that had the gods in pay,
Neptune, with him that rules the sacred day, [3]
Could no such structure raise: Troy walled so high,
Th'Atrides might as well have forced the sky. [4]

Glad, though amazed, are our neighbour kings,
To see such power employed in peaceful things;
They list not urge it to the dreadful field;
The task is easier to destroy, than build.

On St. James's Park, As Lately Improved by His Majesty

Of the first paradise there's nothing found;
Plants set by heaven are vanished, and the ground;
Yet the description lasts: who knows the fate
Of lines that shall this paradise relate?
Instead of rivers rolling by the side
Of Eden's garden, here flows in the tide;
The sea, which always served his empire, now
Pays tribute to our prince's pleasure too.
Of famous cities we the founders know;
But rivers, old as seas to which they go,
Are nature's bounty; 'tis of more renown
To make a river than to build a town.
For future shade, young trees upon the banks
Of the new stream appear in even ranks;
The voice of Orpheus, or Amphion's hand, [6]
In better order could not make them stand;
May they increase as fast, and spread their boughs,
As the high fame of their great owner grows!
May he live long enough to see them all
Dark shadows cast, and as his palace tall!
Methinks I see the love that shall be made,
The lovers walking in that amorous shade;
The gallants dancing by the river's side;
They bathe in summer, and in winter slide.
Methinks I hear the music in the boats,
And the loud echo which returns the notes;
While overhead a flock of new-sprung fowl

[1] Sheba's wond'ring queen See I Kings 10 and II Chronicles 9 for the Queen of Sheba's visit to King Solomon.

[2] The King built all etc. The entire reconstruction took place under the King's commission; Charles paid privately for the portico at the western end. Under Cromwell the portico was converted into shops for seamstresses.

[3] Laomedon the father of Priam; he refused to pay Poseidon for his work in building the walls of Troy; this led eventually to the city's downfall.

[4] Th'Atrides Agamemnon and Menelaus, sons of Atreus. The meaning is that if Troy had been walled as well as the cathedral was, they could no more have conquered Troy than they could have conquered the sky.

[5] Sic gratia regum etc. "Thus the favour of the kings was sought in Pierian measures" (adapted from Horace, Ars Poetica, 404–405). Pieria was the birthplace of the Muses.

[6] Orpheus a figure of Greek myth whose singing was said to attract even the trees, wild beasts and stones (OCD); Amphion a son of Zeus known for his musical abilities (OCD).

Hangs in the air, and does the sun control, [1]
Darkening the sky; they hover o'er, and shroud
The wanton sailors with a feathered cloud.
Beneath, a shoal of silver fishes glides,
And plays about the gilded barges' sides;
The ladies, angling in the crystal lake,
Feast on the waters with the prey they take:
At once victorious with their lines, and eyes,
They make the fishes, and the men, their prize.
A thousand Cupids on the billows ride,
And sea-nymphs enter with the swelling tide,
From Thetis sent as spies, to make report, [2]
And tell the wonders of her sovereign's court.
All that can, living, feed the greedy eye,
Or dead, the palate, here you may descry:
The choicest things that furnished Noah's ark,
Or Peter's sheet, inhabiting this park; [3]
All with a border of rich fruit-trees crowned,
Whose loaded branches hide the lofty mound.
Such various ways the spacious alleys lead,
My doubtful Muse knows not what path to tread.
Yonder, the harvest of cold months laid up
Gives a fresh coolness to the royal cup;
There ice, like crystal firm, and never lost,
Tempers hot July with December's frost;
Winter's dark prison, whence he cannot fly,
Though the warm spring, his enemy, draws nigh.
Strange, that extremes should thus preserve the snow,
High on the Alps, or in deep caves below.
    Here, a well-polished Mall gives us the joy [4]
To see our prince his matchless force employ:
His manly posture and his graceful mien,
Vigour and youth in all his motions seen;
His shape so lovely and his limbs so strong
Confirm our hopes we shall obey him long.
No sooner has he touched the flying ball
But 'tis already more than half the Mall;
And such a fury from his arm has got,
As from a smoking culverin 'twere shot. [5]
    Near this my Muse, what most delights her, sees
A living gallery of agèd trees:
Bold sons of Earth, that thrust their arms so high,
As if once more they would invade the sky.
In such green palaces the first kings reigned,
Slept in their shades, and angels entertained;
With such old counsellors they did advise,
And, by frequenting sacred groves, grew wise.
Free from the impediments of light and noise,
Man, thus retired, his nobler thoughts employs.
Here Charles contrives the ordering of his states, [6]
Here he resolves his neighbouring princes' fates:
What nation shall have peace, where war be made,
Determined is in this oraculous shade;
The world, from India to the frozen north,
Concerned in what this solitude brings forth.
His fancy, objects from his view receives;
The prospect, thought and contemplation gives.
That seat of empire here salutes his eye,
To which three kingdoms do themselves apply; [7]
The structure by a prelate raised, Whitehall, [8]
Built with the fortune of Rome's capitol;
Both, disproportioned to the present state
Of their proud founders, were approved by fate.

---

[1] control overpower (OED control v 5).

[2] Thetis a goddess of the sea (OCD).

[3] Peter's sheet The Apostle Peter, when asked why he associated with Gentiles, spoke of a vision he had had in which a sheet descended from heaven full of animals, reptiles and birds. When a voice told him to slaughter and eat he refused, protesting that he could not let anything profane or unclean pass his lips. The voice replied that what God had made clean should not be called profane (Acts 11:5).

[4] polished refined, cultured, elegant(OED polished ppla 2); Mall a walk bordered by trees in St. James's Park (OED mall 4).

[5] culverin a gun (OED).

[6] Charles Charles II.

[7] three kingdoms England, Scotland and Ireland.

[8] prelate Thomas Wolsey, who served as Lord Chancellor under Henry VIII and who enlarged and resided at Whitehall Palace prior to his fall from royal favour.

From hence he does that antique pile behold, [1]
Where royal heads receive the sacred gold:
It gives them crowns, and does their ashes keep;
There made like gods, like mortals there they sleep;
Making the circle of their reign complete,
Those suns of empire, where they rise, they set.
When others fell, this, standing, did presage
The crown should triumph over popular rage:
Hard by that house, where all our ill were shaped, [2]
The auspicious temple stood, and yet escaped.
So snow on Aetna does unmelted lie, [3]
Whence rolling flames and scattered cinders fly;
The distant country in the ruin shares;
What falls from heaven the burning mountain spares.
Next, that capacious hall he sees, the room
Where the whole nation does for justice come;
Under whose large roof flourishes the gown,
And judges grave, on high tribunals, frown.
Here, like the people's pastor he does go,
His flock subjected to his view below;
On which reflecting in his mighty mind,
No private passion does indulgence find;
The pleasures of his youth suspended are,
And made a sacrifice to public care.
Here, free from court compliances, he walks,
And with himself, his best adviser, talks:
How peaceful olive may his temples shade,
For mending laws, and for restoring trade;
Or, how his brows may be with laurel charged,
For nations conquered, and our bounds enlarged.
Of ancient prudence here he ruminates,
Of rising kingdoms and of falling states;
What ruling arts gave great Augustus fame, [4]
And how Alcides purchased such a name. [5]
His eyes, upon his native palace bent,
Close by, suggest a greater argument.
His thoughts rise higher when he does reflect
On what the world may from that star expect
Which at his birth appeared, to let us see
Day, for his sake, could with the night agree;
A prince, on whom such different lights did smile,
Born the divided world to reconcile!
Whatever heaven, or high extracted blood
Could promise, or foretell, he will make good;
Reform these nations, and improve them more
Than this fair park, from what it was before.

Of the Last Verses in the Book

When we for age could neither read nor write,
The subject made us able to indite;
The soul, with nobler resolutions decked,
The body stooping, does herself erect.
No mortal parts are requisite to raise
Her that, unbodied, can her Maker praise.
The seas are quiet when the winds give o'er;
So, calm are we when passions are no more!
For then we know how vain it was to boast
Of fleeting things, so certain to be lost.
Clouds of affection from our younger eyes
Conceal that emptiness which age descries.
The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed,
Lets in new light through chinks that time has made;
Stronger by weakness, wiser men become,
As they draw near to their eternal home.
Leaving the world, both worlds at once they view,
That stand upon the threshold of the new.

[3] Ætna Mount Ætna is a volcanic mountain near the east coast of Sicily which Roman writers claim was the smithy of Vulcan.

John Milton

1608 – 1674

Milton was born in London; his parents were John Milton and Sarah Jeffrey. John Milton senior was disinherited by his Catholic father when, as a student at Christ Church, Oxford, he became a Protestant. John Milton senior was a successful scrivener and a good amateur musician. He encouraged his son in his studies, engaging Thomas Young, who later became master of Jesus College, Cambridge, as his tutor. Not later than 1620, Milton went to St. Paul's school, where he learned Latin, Greek, French, Italian and some Hebrew, besides reading widely in English literature. Like Cowley, he was an enthusiastic reader of Spenser's Faerie Queene, and later wrote that he dared be known to think Spenser a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas. Milton became a member of Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1625. Letters to Thomas Young and to his school friends Alexander Gill and Charles Diodati survive from this period, as well as some academic exercises. Milton abandoned any intention of ordination he might have had because he disliked Anglicanism as it developed under Archbishop Laud. From 1632 to 1638 he lived in his father's house in Horton, Buckinghamshire, undertaking a self-administered course of private postgraduate study, punctuated by trips to London to buy books and for private lessons in mathematics and music. The poems of this period, culminating in "Lycidas," would in themselves be sufficient to ensure that he would be remembered. From April 1638 to July 1639 Milton travelled in Europe, with a letter of introduction from Sir Henry Wotton, then Provost of Eton, which helped him to meet well-known scholars and writers, especially in Florence. On hearing of the outbreak of the Scottish troubles, he decided to return to England, lest, as he said, he should be travelling abroad while his countrymen were fighting for liberty. He did not exactly hurry, however, and spent time in Florence and Venice on the way back.

Soon after his return to England Milton undertook the education of two nephews, Edward and John Phillips, whose father had died, and in 1643 took on more pupils. His treatise Of Education probably reflects his own practice as a tutor. Milton aligned himself with the attacks upon episcopal church government initiated by the Long Parliament, and wrote his pamphlets on church government. This was the beginning of an involvement with the political life of his country which continued until his death, though necessarily in a more subdued and coded manner after the Restoration. In May 1643 Milton married Mary Powell, the third of eleven children of a Royalist family, then aged seventeen. After a short time Mary went back to her parents on a visit, from which she did not return; it is possible that she found life with Milton dull, that she was distressed by the beatings he administered to his pupils, and that the marriage was not consummated. Milton then published some pamphlets advocating easier access to divorce on grounds of incompatibility, which rendered him notorious in his own time, and make very good reading in ours. The divorce tracts were followed by Areopagitica, an argument against censorship. Milton by this time had become disenchanted with the Presbyterians, seeing their system of church government as just as autocratic as Laudian Anglicanism had been. Perhaps because of the defeat of the Royalist cause, Mary Powell or her family decided that she should return to Milton, and after she had begged his pardon, he took her back. She died in 1652, after giving birth to four children. Milton's first book of collected verse was published in 1645, and may have been prompted by the desire to vindicate himself as a person of high culture after the attacks upon him prompted by his writings on divorce. In 1647, after the death of his father, Milton gave up teaching in order, probably, to find more time for writing. The execution of Charles I occasioned more political prose; Milton's justification for the execution, The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, appeared in February 1649. He was then invited to be Latin Secretary to the Council of State, Latin then being the common language of diplomatic correspondence. He also acted as a polemicist for the new regime. Eikonoklastes (the image-breaker) appeared in October 1649, as a reply to Eikon basilike (the image of a king), which had been published in February of that year. Eikon basilike, purporting to have been written by Charles I during his final imprisonment, was a highly successful piece of Royalist propaganda, very frequently reprinted in the years following the execution of Charles. During his work for the Commonwealth, Milton became blind, his duties accordingly became less onerous, and he had a succession of assistants, one of whom was Andrew Marvell. Milton's second marriage, to Catharine Woodcock, took place in November 1656; a daughter was born in October 1657; mother and child both died in the following February. Milton continued as Latin Secretary almost until the Restoration, and even when it appeared inevitable was still publishing, courageously, against a return to monarchical government. After going into hiding for some time, Milton was arrested and imprisoned. His release was probably brought about by the intercession of friends, among them notably Andrew Marvell. In February 1663 he married Elizabeth Minshull, some thirty years his junior. It is probable, from his relationships and from internal evidence, that in his later years he was sympathetic to Quakerism. Paradise Lost was published in 1667, and Paradise Regained and Samson Agonistes, in the same volume, in 1671. They have been interpreted as representing Milton's withdrawal from the political realm into detached religious meditation; more recently their political significance has been acknowledged.

For Milton see also Aubrey, Brief Lives.

On the Morning of Christ's Nativity[1]

I

This is the month, and this the happy morn
Wherein the son of heaven's eternal king,
Of wedded maid, and virgin mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring;
For so the holy sages once did sing,
That he our deadly forfeit should release,
And with his father work us a perpetual peace.[2]

II

That glorious form, that light unsufferable,
And that far-beaming blaze of majesty,
Wherewith he wont at heaven's high council-table,
To sit the midst of trinal unity,
He laid aside; and here with us to be,
Forsook the courts of everlasting day,
And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay.

III

Say heavenly muse, shall not thy sacred vein
Afford a present to the infant God?
Hast thou no verse, no hymn, or solemn strain,
To welcome him to this his new abode,
Now while the heaven by the sun's team untrod,[3]
Hath took no print of the approaching light,
And all the spangled host keep watch in squadrons bright?

IV

See how from far upon the eastern road
The star-led wizards haste with odours sweet,[4]
O run, prevent them with thy humble ode,

---

[1] In his sixth Latin elegy, Milton says that he began this poem before dawn on Christmas Day, 1629. It was printed first in 1645 and in 1673.

[2] holy sages Hebrew prophets. See for example the verse made famous by Handel's Messiah, Isaiah 9:6: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given"; our deadly forfeit the consequences of "original sin" to which all human beings, as descendants of Adam and Eve, were thought to be liable.

[3] the sun's team the horses of the sun's chariot.

[4] star-led wizards the Magi. See Matthew 2:1–12.

And lay it lowly at his blessèd feet; [1]
Have thou the honour first thy Lord to greet,
And join thy voice unto the angel choir,
From out his secret altar touched with hallowed fire. [2]

The Hymn

I

It was the winter wild,
While the heaven-born child
All meanly wrapped in the rude manger lies;
Nature in awe to him
Had doffed her gaudy trim,
With her great master so to sympathize: [3]
It was no season then for her
To wanton with the sun her lusty paramour.

II

Only with speeches fair
She woos the gentle air
To hide her guilty front with innocent snow,
And on her naked shame,
Pollute with sinful blame, [4]
The saintly veil of maiden white to throw,
Confounded, that her maker's eyes
Should look so near upon her foul deformities.

III

But he her fears to cease,
Sent down the meek-eyed Peace; [5]
She crowned with olive green, came softly sliding
Down through the turning sphere
His ready harbinger, [6]
With turtle wing the amorous clouds dividing,
And waving wide her myrtle wand,
She strikes a universal peace through sea and land.

IV

No war, or battle's sound
Was heard the world around:
The idle spear and shield were high up hung,
The hookèd chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood, [7]
The trumpet spake not to the armèd throng,
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sov'reign Lord was by. [8]

V

But peaceful was the night
Wherein the prince of light
His reign of peace upon the earth began:
The winds with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kissed, [9]
Whispering new joys to the mild ocean,
Who now hath quite forgot to rave,

---

[1] prevent go before, anticipate. Compare the Collect for Easter Day in BCP, with its reference to God's special grace preventing us and putting into our minds good desires.

[2] touched with hallowed fire See Isaiah 6:1–8.

[3] sympathize be in accord with; the accord between natural and human events is common in literature of the ancient world.

[4] her guilty front…her naked shame…sinful blame Nature "fell" along with mankind; see Paradise Lost 10: 649f.

[5] Peace The "peace of Augustus" prevailed throughout the Roman empire at the time of Christ's birth. The idea that this period of peace was especially ordained by God for the reception of Christ into the world became common after the fifth century C.E. It was thought of as fulfilling the sayings of the Hebrew prophets concerning the Messiah. In Dante's Paradiso 6: 55–57, Milton could have found a juxtaposition of the idea of peace on earth with that of the harmony of the heavens similar to that he makes in this poem. In the Convivio Book 4, chapter 5, Dante introduces the same idea at greater length, and makes more explicit reference to the harmony of the planets at Christ's birth.

[6] harbinger forerunner (OED harbinger sb 3).

[7] hookèd armed with scythes.

[8] awful filled with awe, reverential.

[9] whist hushed, still.

While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmèd wave.[1]

VI

The stars with deep amaze
Stand fixed in steadfast gaze,
Bending one way their precious influence,
And will not take their flight,
For all the morning light,
Or Lucifer that often warned them thence;[2]
But in their glimmering orbs did glow,[3]
Until their Lord himself bespake, and bid them go.

VII

And though the shady gloom
Had given day her room,
The sun himself withheld his wonted speed,[4]
And hid his head for shame,
As his inferior flame,
The new enlightened world no more should need;
He saw a greater sun appear
Than his bright throne, or burning axle-tree could bear.[5]

The shepherds on the lawn,
Or ere the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they then,
That the mighty Pan
Was kindly come to live with them below,[6]
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busy keep.[7]

IX

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet,
As never was by mortal finger strook,
Divinely-warbled voice
Answering the stringèd noise,
As all their souls in blissful rapture took:
The air such pleasure loath to lose,
With thousand echoes still prolongs each heav'nly close.

X

Nature that heard such sound
Beneath the hollow round
Of Cynthia's seat, the airy region thrilling,
Now was almost won
To think her part was done,
And that her reign had here its last fulfilling;
She knew such harmony alone
Could hold all heav'n and earth in happier union.

At last surrounds their sight
A globe of circular light,
That with long beams the shamefaced night arrayed,
The helmèd cherubim

[1] birds of calm According to ancient fable, the halcyon, or kingfisher, bred about the time of the winter solstice in a nest floating on the sea, and charmed the wind and waves so that the sea was specially calm during this period. See OED halcyon.

[2] Lucifer the morning star, Venus.

[3] orbs the concentric hollow spheres of the Ptolemaic astronomy, in which the planets and stars are carried around the earth.

[4] The Sun himself withheld his wonted speed The winter solstice is one of two times in the year when the sun reaches its farthest point from the Equator and appears to stand still before its return. Milton is concerned in this poem with the idea of Christ's birth as marking a turning-point in time.

[5] a greater Sun The pun on Sun-Son originates in Malachi 4:2: "But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings"; burning axle-tree the axle of the Sun's chariot.

[6] Pan in ancient Greece, the god of shepherds; in the Renaissance a symbol of Christ; kindly both in the modern sense and "as one of their kind," in reference to the fact that in the Incarnation God became human.

[7] silly simple, unsophisticated, rustic (OED simple a 3).

And sworded seraphim,[1]
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed,
Harping in loud and solemn choir,
With unexpressive notes to heav'n's new-born heir.[2]

XII

Such music (as 'tis said)
Before was never made,
But when of old the songs of morning sung,
While the creator great
His constellations set,
And the well-balanced world on hinges hung,
And cast the dark foundations deep,
And bid the welt'ring waves their oozy channel keep.[3]

XIII

Ring out, ye crystal spheres,
Once bless our human ears
(If ye have power to touch our senses so),
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And let the base of heaven's deep organ blow,
And with your ninefold harmony
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.[4]

XIV

For if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
Time will run back, and fetch the age of gold,
And speckled vanity
Will sicken soon and die,
And lep'rous sin will melt from earthly mould,
And hell itself will pass away,
And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.

XV

Yea Truth, and Justice then
Will down return to men,
Orbed in a rainbow; and like glories wearing
Mercy will sit between,
Throned in celestial sheen,[5]
With radiant feet the tissued clouds down steering,
And heaven as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace hall.

XVI

Bust wisest fate says no,
This must not yet be so,
The babe lies yet in smiling infancy,[6]

[1] cherubim...seraphim the second and first highest respectively of the nine orders of angels, described by the pseudo-Dionysius in the fifteenth chapter of his Celestial Hierarchy. A readable account of his writings (very influential throughout the Middle Ages and as late as the Renaissance) is Frederick Copleston's A History of Philosophy (New York: Doubleday 1962), vol 2, part 1, ch. 9.

[2] unexpressive inexpressible: one of Shakespeare's coinages.

[3] Dante writes in the Convivio Book 4, chapter 5, that since the heavens began to revolve, that is, since the Creation, they had never been in a better disposition than when Christ descended to earth, who made them and governs them; and, he adds, mathematicians are able to prove this by their arts. In terms of the poem, this would mean that the music of the spheres had never been so beautiful since the Fall; it was like a new creation.

[4] And with your ninefold harmony etc. The nine orders of angels parallel the nine celestial spheres of Ptolemaic astronomy. The idea of a harmony between the singing of the angels and the music of the spheres may have been suggested by Dante, Purgatorio 30: 91–93.

[5] Truth, Justice, Mercy. "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other" (Psalm 85:10). John Leonard points out that the "righteousness" of the Authorized Version is justitia in the Vulgate, and that a mediaeval tradition makes Truth, Justice, and Mercy three of the four daughters of God, the other being Peace, which is also a preoccupation of this poem. See John Leonard, ed., John Milton: The Complete Poems (London: Penguin Books, 1998). Subsequent references to Leonard's notes will be indicated by "(JL)".

[6] smiling infancy Jesus can smile, but not yet speak (Latin infans unspeaking). Lancelot Andrewes plays on logos (word) and infans in a sermon for Christmas 1618: "An infant: Verbum infans: the Word

That on the bitter cross
Must redeem our loss;
So both himself and us to glorify:
Yet first to those ychained in sleep, [1]
The wakeful trump of doom must thunder through the deep. [2]

With such a horrid clang
As on Mount Sinai rang [3]
While the red fire, and smould'ring clouds out brake:
The agèd earth aghast
With terror of that blast,
Shall from the surface to the centre shake;
When at the world's last session,
The dreadful judge in middle air shall spread his throne. [4]

And then at last our bliss
Full and perfect is,
But now begins; for from this happy day [5]

In straiter limits bound,
Not half so far casts his usurpèd sway,
And wroth to see his kingdom fail,
Swinges the scaly horror of his folded tail. [7]

The oracles are dumb,
No voice or hideous hum
Runs through the archèd roof in words deceiving. [8]
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos leaving. [9]

without a word, the aeternall Word not able to speak a word." T.S. Eliot had the misfortune to misquote this passage while writing of how Andrewes impresses himself on the memory. See Alan Rudrum, "T.S. Eliot on Lancelot Andrewes's 'word within a word'," ANQ: A Quarterly Journal of Short Articles, Notes, and Reviews, Vol. 9, No. 4 (Fall 1996), 43-44.

[1] ychained in sleep that is, the dead.

[2] trump of doom signalling the Day of Judgement.

[3] As on Mount Sinai rang Exodus 19:16–18.

[4] middle air See Matthew 24:30. The clouds occupied the second of the three regions of the air.

[5] From this point through stanza XXVI Milton's theme is the defeat of the pagan gods at the coming of Christ. The cult of the sun-god Mithras spread through the Roman empire and was popular for two centuries after the birth of Christ; his festival was held at the winter solstice, December 25 in the Roman calendar. It was not until after Mithraism had declined in importance that December 25 was fixed as the date of Christmas. Certain of the early Christians disagreed with this date, and accused those in favour of it of sun-worship. The defence was that Christ was "the true Sun." Some of the false sun-gods feature in the second part of this poem, for example Apollo, Baalim, Moloch, Ashtaroth. We may see the "Nativity Ode" as a meditation on a Christian festival about which many of Milton's fellow-Puritans had deep reservations. They argued that it was a heathen festival (quite apart from Mithraism, December 25 had been a religious festival in Britain long before the introduction of Christianity), and in 1644 an Act of Parliament was passed forbidding any merriment or religious services on that day. It is, then, significant that Milton did not omit this poem, written in 1629, from the volume he published in 1645, but rather gave it pride of place as the first poem in that volume. His message might be thought of as "What we Puritans hate most is idolatry; at Christmas what we celebrate is the overthrow of idolatry."

[6] Th'old dragon underground Satan. See Revelation 20:2. In the thirty-fourth canto of the Inferno Satan is depicted as crucified upside down at the centre of the earth. For Milton's account of Satan being thrown out of heaven, see Paradise Lost 1:44–49.

[7] Swinges lashes. The "g" is soft as in "hinges" (JL).

[8] words deceiving The Delphic oracle was ambiguous, and so often led astray those who consulted it.

[9] There is a tradition that at the birth of Christ, a priest of Apollo, who was sacrificing near Delphi, suddenly stopped, and declared that the son of a god was at that moment born whose power would equal that of Apollo. This stanza is beautifully illustrated by William Blake, who shows the spirit of Apollo leaping from the statue and diving into the sea with a movement that is the perfect visual rendering of a "hollow shriek." There are similar traditions about the oracles being struck dumb (XIX); about the statue of Apollo sweating or weeping (XXI); about the infant Christ's expulsion of the false gods of Egypt (XXIII–XXV). The historians Josephus and Tacitus both relate how one day the doors of the inner shrine of the temple were thrown open, and "a voice of more than mortal tone was heard to cry that the gods

The lonely mountains o'er,
And the resounding shore,

In consecrated earth,
And on the holy hearth,
The lars, and lemures moan with midnight

And the chill marble seems to sweat,
While each peculiar power forgoes his wonted

Peor, and Baalim,
Forsake their temples dim,[4]
With that twice battered god of Palestine,[5]
And moonèd Ashtaroth,
Heaven's queen and mother both,[6]
Now sits not girt with tapers' holy shine,
The Libyc Hammon shrinks his horn,[7]
In vain the Tyrian maids their wounded

And sullen Moloch fled,
Hath left in shadows dread,
His burning idol all of blackest hue
In vain with cymbals' ring,
They call the grisly king,
In dismal dance about the furnace blue;[9]
The brutish gods of Nile as fast,
Isis and Orus, and the dog Anubis haste.

were departing. At the same instant there was a mighty stir, as of departure." With the second part of this poem, compare the virtuoso passage on the false gods in Paradise Lost 1: 300–522.

[1] cell the innermost part of the temple, where the god's idol stood.

[2] lars, and lemures The lares were Roman household gods, the lemures Roman spirits of the dead.

[3] flamens an order of Roman priests.

[4] Peor, and Baalim Baal-Peor, a Canaanite sun-god (Numbers 25:3–5); Baalim is the plural of Baal, referring to such gods as Baal-Zebub and Baal-Perith.

[5] that twice battered god of Palestine Dagon. His idol was thrown down twice when the ark of the Covenant was set beside it; see I Samuel 5:1–5.

[6] Ashtaroth the Phoenician moon-goddess. Milton uses the plural form. To Roman Catholics Mary was the "queen of Heaven," and, not for the last time, Milton is being satirical at their expense.

[7] The Libyc Hammon shrinks his horn Ammon was a Libyan god depicted as a ram.

[8] Thammuz a beautiful youth loved by Astarte and killed by a boar.

[9] Moloch an Ammonite fire-god. Children were sacrificed to him while their cries were drowned by the noise of cymbals. See Leviticus 18:21: "And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech"; II Kings 23:10: "that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech"; Jeremiah 32:35: "And they built the high places of Baal…to cause their sons and daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech."

[10] Osiris…with lowings loud Osiris was worshipped in the form of a bull.

Nought but profoundest hell can be his shroud,
In vain with timbrelled anthems dark
The sable-stolèd sorcerers bear his worshipped ark.[1]

He feels from Judah's land
The dreaded infant's hand,[2]
The rays of Bethlehem blind his dusky eyn;[3]
Nor all the gods beside,
Longer dare abide,
Not Typhon huge ending in snaky twine:[4]

Can in his swaddling bands control the damnèd crew.[5]

So when the sun in bed,
Curtained with cloudy red,
Pillows his chin upon an orient wave,
The flocking shadows pale,
Troop to th' infernal jail,
Each fettered ghost slips to his several grave,[6]
And the yellow-skirted fays,
Fly after the night-steeds, leaving their moon-loved maze.[7]

XXVII

But see the virgin blest,
Hath laid her babe to rest.
Time is our tedious song should here have ending:
Heav'n's youngest teemèd star,
Hath fixed her polished car,[8]
Her sleeping Lord with handmaid lamp attending:
And all about the courtly stable,
Bright-harnessed angels sit in order serviceable.

L'Allegro[9]

Hence loathèd Melancholy
Of Cerberus, and blackest Midnight born,[10]

[1] Nor…ark Set tricked his brother Osiris into entering a chest, which Set cast adrift on the Nile. Isis (Osiris's wife) recovered the chest, but Set dismembered Osiris's body and scattered the pieces over the earth. Isis then gathered the pieces and restored life to the body (JL). Milton makes use of this in a wonderful passage in Areopagitica: "Truth indeed came once into the world with her divine Master, and was a perfect shape most glorious to look on: but when he ascended, and his Apostles after him were laid asleep, then strait arose a wicked race of deceivers, who as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the good Osiris, took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since, the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering limb by limb still as they could find them."

[2] from Judah's land "And the land of Judah shall be a terror unto Egypt" (Isaiah 19:17).

[3] eyn an archaic plural: eyes.

[4] Typhon The Egyptian god Set was conflated with the Greek Typhon, a hundred-headed serpent.

[5] Our babe…crew in allusion to the infant Hercules, who strangled two snakes sent by Juno to kill him in his cradle. Hercules was a common "type" of Christ (JL).

[6] Troop…grave Compare A Midsummer Night's Dream 3.2.382–83: "ghosts wandering here and there / Troop home to churchyards" (JL).

[7] Night-steeds the horses which draw the chariot of Night. Compare the cry of Marlowe's Faustus: "O lente, lente currite, noctis equi" (slowly, slowly run, horses of the night), ironically adapted from Ovid, Amores I.13.40.

[8] Heav'n's youngest teemèd star Theologians had debated whether the star of Matthew 2:2 was a new creation (JL); fixed "the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over the place where the young child was" (Matthew 2:9); polished car gleaming chariot.

[9] The title means "the cheerful man." Milton probably thought of this and the next poem as being like contrasting movements in a musical composition. Musical directions (Allegro being a common one) are usually given in Italian.

[10] loathèd Melancholy not to be equated with the "divinest Melancholy" of Il Penseroso. For clues as to the relationship between them see "melancholy" and its close relatives in OED. The Galenist theory (influential among medical men of the day) was that melancholy was bad; the Aristotelian (influential among literary men) was that it could

In Stygian cave forlorn
'Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy,[1]
Find out some uncouth cell,
Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings,
And the night-raven sings;
There under ebon shades, and low-browed rocks,
As ragged as thy locks,
In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell.[2]
But come thou goddess fair and free,
In heaven yclept Euphrosyne,[3]
And by men, heart-easing Mirth,
Whom lovely Venus at a birth
With two sister Graces more
To ivy-crownèd Bacchus bore;
Or whether (as some sager sing)
The frolic wind that breathes the spring,
Zephyr with Aurora playing,
As he met her once a-Maying,[4]

And fresh-blown roses washed in dew,
Filled her with thee a daughter fair,
So buxom, blithe, and debonair.[5]
Haste thee nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,
Nods, and becks, and wreathèd smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;[6]
Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his sides.
Come, and trip it as ye go
On the light fantastic toe,
And in thy right hand lead with thee,
The mountain nymph, sweet Liberty;
And if I give thee honour due,
Mirth, admit me of thy crew
To live with her, and live with thee,
In unreprovèd pleasures free;
To hear the lark begin his flight,
And singing startle the dull night,[7]
From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise;
Then to come in spite of sorrow,
And at my window bid good morrow,
Through the sweet-briar, or the vine,
Or the twisted eglantine.
While the cock with lively din,
Scatters the rear of darkness thin,
And to the stack, or the barn door,
Stoutly struts his dames before,
Oft list'ning how the hounds and horn
Cheerly rouse the slumb'ring morn,
From the side of some hoar hill,[8]
Through the high wood echoing shrill.

be good, as the temperament natural to those of scholarly bent. The genealogy of Melancholy is Milton's own invention.

[1] Stygian cave Cerberus lived in a cave on the banks of the Styx. Aeneas heard shrieks of dead children as he passed the cave (JL).

[2] Cimmerian desert Homer's Cimmerians live on the edge of the world in a land of perpetual darkness (JL).

[3] yclept named; an archaism from Spenser; Euphrosyne ("Mirth") was one of the three Graces.

[4] Zephyr…Aurora the west wind and the dawn. The rites of May-day included sexual games; see Herrick's "Corinna's going a-maying."

[5] buxom, blithe, and debonair Close comparison makes it clear that "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" were intended as companion pieces. They correspond to one another in detail as well as in overall structure. Compare this line with "Sober, steadfast and demure"; the three adjectives and the metrical similarity lead us to compare the lines so that we contrast their meanings.

[6] Hebe the goddess of youth.

[7] To hear the lark…startle the dull night Dr. Johnson wrote that Milton "saw nature through the spectacles of books," but these lines embody an exact knowledge of the habits of the skylark. The cheerful man hears the lark begin its flight because the lark rarely sings while on the ground; he hears it begin its flight, because the lark begins to sing as it begins to fly, while only a few feet from the ground; the song startles the dull night because the skylark's song may be heard very early in the morning, long before dawn.

[8] hoar The hill is grey from lack of foliage, or from mist.

By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
Right against the eastern gate,
Where the great sun begins his state,
Robed in flames, and amber light,
The clouds in thousand liveries dight,
While the ploughman near at hand,
Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
And the mower whets his scythe,
And every shepherd tells his tale
Under the hawthorn in the dale. [1]
Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures
Whilst the landscape round it measures.
Russet lawns, and fallows grey, [2]
Where the nibbling flocks do stray,
Mountains on whose barren breast
The labouring clouds do often rest:
Meadows trim with daisies pied,
Shallow brooks, and rivers wide,
Towers, and battlements it sees
Bosomed high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure of neighbouring eyes. [3]
Hard by, a cottage chimney smokes,
From betwixt two agèd oaks,
Where Corydon and Thyrsis met,
Are at their savoury dinner set
Of herbs, and other country messes,
Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses;
And then in haste her bower she leaves,
With Thestylis to bind the sheaves; [4]
Or if the earlier season lead
To the tanned haycock in the mead,
Sometimes with secure delight
The upland hamlets will invite,
When the merry bells ring round,
And the jocund rebecks sound [5]
To many a youth, and many a maid,
Dancing in the chequered shade;
And young and old come forth to play
On a sunshine holiday,
Till the livelong daylight fail,
Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
With stories told of many a feat,
How fairy Mab the junkets eat, [6]
She was pinched, and pulled she said,
And he by friar's lantern led [7]
Tells how the drudging goblin sweat,
To earn his cream-bowl duly set, [8]
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn,
That ten day-labourers could not end; [9]
Then lies him down the lubber fiend,
And stretched out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength;
And crop-full out of doors he flings,
Ere the first cock his matin rings.
Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.
Towered cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men,
Where throngs of knights and barons bold,
In weeds of peace high triumphs hold, [10]
With store of ladies, whose bright eyes

[1] tells his tale either counts ("tallies") his sheep, or tells a story.

[2] Russet lawns, and fallows grey untilled land, scorched reddish-brown by the sun; and ploughed land (JL).

[3] cynosure the Pole star, hence "centre of attraction" (OED cynosure 2b).

[4] Corydon and Thyrsis are men, Phyllis and Thestylis women. These are stock names from pastoral poetry.

[5] rebecks three-stringed fiddles.

[6] Mab queen of the fairies; junkets cream cheeses or other dishes made of cream.

[7] friar's lantern the ignis fatuus or will o'the wisp; see OED friar sb 9b; under one name or other, very frequently referred to in the literature of this period. See Paradise Lost 9:634–642.

[8] drudging goblin hobgoblin, also called Robin Goodfellow or Puck. See A Midsummer Night's Dream 2.1.32–57.

[9] end put into a barn (OED end v^2); he threshes more corn in one night than ten labourers could stack in a day.

[10] weeds garments.

Married to immortal verse
Such as the meeting soul may pierce
In notes, with many a winding bout
Of linkèd sweetness long drawn out,
With wanton heed, and giddy cunning,
The melting voice through mazes running;
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.
That Orpheus self may heave his head
From golden slumber on a bed
Of heaped Elysian flowers, and hear
Such strains as would have won the ear
Of Pluto, to have quite set free
His half-regained Eurydice. [4]

Il Penseroso [5]

Hence vain deluding joys,
The brood of folly without father bred,
How little you bestead, [6]
Or fill the fixèd mind with all your toys; [7]
Dwell in some idle brain,
And fancies fond with gaudy shapes possess,
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sunbeams,
Or likest hovering dreams
The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train. [8]
But hail thou goddess, sage and holy,
Hail divinest Melancholy,
Whose saintly visage is too bright
To hit the sense of human sight;
And therefore to our weaker view,
O'erlaid with black staid wisdom's hue.
Black, but such as in esteem,
Prince Memnon's sister might beseem, [9]
Or that starred Ethiop queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The sea-nymphs, and their powers offended. [10]
Yet thou art higher far descended,
Thee bright-haired Vesta long of yore,

[1] Hymen the god of marriage.

[2] Jonson's learnèd sock in reference to the low-heeled shoe of actors in Greek comedy, and so to Jonson as a noted writer of comedies.

[3] Lydian airs Plato condemned the Lydian mode of music as being morally lax, and preferred the Dorian mode; others saw it as relaxing and pleasant. Milton is ironic on the subject in Areopagitica: "No music must be heard, no song be set or sung, but what is grave and Dorick." Horace, at the end of an ode to Augustus (Odes 4:15), is also complimentary about Lydian music.

[4] That Orpheus…Eurydice Orpheus sought his dead wife in Hades; Proserpine and Pluto permitted her to return on condition that Orpheus did not look back at her; he did so, and lost her again. See Il Penseroso 105–108; Elysian flowers Orpheus was reunited with Eurydice in Elysium after his death.

[5] The title means "the thoughtful man."

[6] bestead help or relieve (OED bestead v^1).

[7] toys idle fancies (OED toy sb 4).

[8] Morpheus the god of dreams.

[9] Memnon a black Ethiopian king who fought for Troy, described by Homer as the handsomest of men. Later writers gave him a beautiful sister, Himera (JL).

[10] starred Ethiop queen Cassiopeia, wife of the Ethiopian king Cephalus, was changed into a constellation because she claimed to be more beautiful than the Nereids (JL).

To solitary Saturn bore; [1]
His daughter she (in Saturn's reign,
Such mixture was not held a stain) [2]
Oft in glimmering bowers, and glades
He met her, and in secret shades
Of woody Ida's inmost grove, [3]
While yet there was no fear of Jove. [4]
Come pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain,
Flowing with majestic train,
And sable stole of cypress lawn,
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Come, but keep thy wonted state,
With even step, and musing gait,
And looks commercing with the skies,
Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes:
There held in holy passion still,
Forget thyself to marble, till
With a sad leaden downward cast,
Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
And join with thee calm Peace, and Quiet,
Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
And hears the muses in a ring,
Ay round about Jove's altar sing.
And add to these retired Leisure,
That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;
But first, and chiefest, with thee bring,
Him that yon soars on golden wing,
Guiding the fiery-wheelèd throne, [5]
The cherub Contemplation, [6]
And the mute Silence hist along,
'Less Philomel will deign a song,
In her sweetest, saddest plight,
Smoothing the rugged brow of night, [7]
While Cynthia checks her dragon yoke,
Gently o'er th' accustomed oak; [8]
Sweet bird that shunn'st the noise of folly,
Most musical, most melancholy!
Thee chauntress oft the woods among,
I woo to hear thy even-song;
And missing thee, I walk unseen
On the dry smooth-shaven green,
To behold the wandering moon,
Riding near her highest noon,
Like one that had been led astray
Through the heaven's wide pathless way;
And oft, as if her head she bowed,
Stooping through a fleecy cloud.
Oft on a plat of rising ground,
I hear the far-off curfew sound,
Over some wide-watered shore,
Swinging slow with sullen roar;
Or if the air will not permit,
Some still removèd place will fit,
Where glowing embers through the room
Teach light to counterfeit a gloom,
Far from all resort of mirth,
Save the cricket on the hearth,
Or the bellman's drowsy charm,
To bless the doors from nightly harm: [9]
Or let my lamp at midnight hour,
Be seen in some high lonely tower,

[1] Vesta Saturn's daughter, the Roman goddess of the hearth and household.

[2] Such mixture was not held a stain Incest was not considered to be sinful.

[3] woody Ida's inmost grove Saturn reigned on Mount Ida in Crete.

[4] While yet there was no fear of Jove Jove ended the Golden Age by usurping Saturn's throne. See Paradise Lost 1:512–516.

[5] the fiery-wheelèd throne as in Ezekiel's vision of God's chariot.

[6] The cherub Contemplation In pseudo-Dionysius, Celestial Hierarchy 7.1.31–37 the cherubim are described as having the "faculty of seeing God, and of contemplating the beauty of the Supreme Being."

[7] Philomel turned into a nightingale after being raped by Tereus. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 6:438ff.

[8] Cynthia goddess of the moon.

[9] bellman the night-watchman who called the hours.

Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,[1]
With thrice great Hermes, or unsphere[2]
The spirit of Plato to unfold
What worlds, or what vast regions hold
The immortal mind that hath forsook
Her mansion in this fleshly nook:
And of those daemons that are found
In fire, air, flood, or underground,
Whose power hath a true consent
With planet, or with element.
Sometime let gorgeous Tragedy
In sceptred pall come sweeping by,
Presenting Thebes, or Pelops' line,
Or the tale of Troy divine.[3]
Or what (though rare) of later age,
Ennobled hath the buskined stage.[4]
But, O sad virgin, that thy power
Might raise Musaeus from his bower,[5]
Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing
Such notes as warbled to the string,
Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,
And made hell grant what love did seek.
Or call up him that left half-told
The story of Cambuscan bold,[6]
Of Camball, and of Algarsife,
And who had Canace to wife,
That owned the virtuous ring and glass,
And of the wondrous horse of brass,
On which the Tartar king did ride;
And if aught else, great bards beside,
In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
Of tourneys and of trophies hung;
Of forest, and enchantments drear,
Where more is meant than meets the ear.
Thus Night oft see me in thy pale career,
Till civil-suited Morn appear,
Not tricked and frounced as she was wont,
With the Attic boy to hunt,[7]
But kerchiefed in a comely cloud,
While rocking winds are piping loud,
Or ushered with a shower still,
When the gust hath blown his fill,
Ending on the rustling leaves,
With minute drops from off the eaves.[8]
And when the sun begins to fling
His flaring beams, me goddess bring
To archèd walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown that Sylvan loves
Of pine, or monumental oak,[9]
Where the rude axe with heavèd stroke,
Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
There in close covert by some brook,
Where no profaner eye may look,
Hide me from day's garish eye,

[1] outwatch the Bear keep awake all night (Ursa Major never sets).

[2] thrice great Hermes Hermes Trismegistus, the supposed author of the hermetic books, once thought to have been a very ancient source of wisdom. Though by Milton's time they had been shown to have been composed in the first three centuries C.E., they were still widely read and highly esteemed; unsphere that is, to summon Plato from the celestial sphere which, according to Neoplatonic philosophy, his soul would inhabit after his death.

[3] Thebes the city of Oedipus; Pelops' line The descendants of Pelops appear in various Greek tragedies; the tale of Troy the scene of tragedies by Sophocles and Euripides.

[4] buskined in reference to the high boots of the Greek tragic actor; compare the reference to "sock" in L'Allegro 132.

[5] Musaeus a mythical Greek poet and priest said to have been the son or pupil of Orpheus (JL).

[6] him Chaucer, whose Squire's Tale is unfinished.

[7] the Attic boy Cephalus, an Athenian prince and hunter loved by Aurora (JL). See Ovid, Metamorphoses, 7:690–865.

[8] minute drops John Leonard remarks that most editors adopt Warton's 1791 note: "drops falling at intervals of a minute," comments that Warton was presumably thinking of minute guns or bells, fired or tolled at intervals of a minute as a sign of mourning, and points out that neither existed in Milton's time. He glosses minute as meaning "small," as does another recent editor, Roy Flannagan (The Riverside Milton, New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1998, 76). I am inclined to agree with Warton. Minute guns or bells may not have existed in Milton's time, but minute-watches (on the dials of which minutes were marked) did.

[9] Sylvan Silvanus, Roman god of the woods.

While the bee with honied thigh,
That at her flowery work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring
With such consort as they keep,
Entice the dewy-feathered Sleep;
And let some strange mysterious dream,
Wave at his wings in airy stream,
Of lively portraiture displayed,
Softly on my eyelids laid.
And as I wake, sweet music breathe
Above, about, or underneath,
Sent by some spirit to mortals good,
Or th' unseen genius of the wood.
But let my due feet never fail,
To walk the studious cloister's pale, [1]
And love the high embowèd roof,
With antique pillars' massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light. [2]
There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full-voiced choir below,
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes.
And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown and mossy cell,
Where I may sit and rightly spell,
Of every star that heaven doth shew,
And every herb that sips the dew;
Till old experience do attain
To something like prophetic strain.
These pleasures Melancholy give,
And I with thee will choose to live.

Lycidas

In this monody the author bewails a learned friend, unfortunately drowned in his passage from Chester on the Irish Seas, 1637. And by occasion foretells the ruin of our corrupted clergy then in their height. [3]

Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more
Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere,
I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,
And with forced fingers rude,
Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year.
Bitter constraint, and sad occasion dear,
Compels me to disturb your season due:
For Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime,
Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer: [4]
Who would not sing for Lycidas? he knew
Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme.
He must not float upon his watery bier
Unwept, and welter to the parching wind,
Without the meed of some melodious tear.
    Begin then, sisters of the sacred well,
That from beneath the seat of Jove doth spring, [5]
Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse,
So may some gentle muse
With lucky words favour my destined urn, [6]
And as he passes turn,
And bid fair peace be to my sable shroud.
For we were nursed upon the self-same hill,
Fed the same flock; by fountain, shade, and rill. [7]

---

[1] pale enclosure.

[2] storied illustrating scenes from biblical history.

[3] This headnote was added in 1645; it would have been highly impolitic in 1638, when the poem was first published.

[4] dead ere his prime Edward King was twenty-five years old when he was drowned.

[5] sisters of the sacred well the Muses.

[6] lucky words fortunate, well-chosen, felicitous.

[7] the self-same hill Cambridge, where Milton and King were students, is not conspicuously hilly; this is pastoral's way of saying that they studied in the same place. Critics have sometimes "interpreted" this section in terms of Cambridge undergraduate life in the early modern period. The point of pastoral here, however, is to link Milton's and

Together both, ere the high lawns appeared
Under the opening eyelids of the morn,
We drove afield, and both together heard
What time the grey-fly winds her sultry horn,
Battening our flocks with the fresh dews of night, [1]
Oft till the star that rose, at evening, bright
Toward heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel.
Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute,
Tempered to the oaten flute,
Rough satyrs danced, and fauns with cloven heel,
From the glad sound would not be absent long,
And old Damoetas loved to hear our song. [2]
But O the heavy change, now thou art gone,
Now thou art gone, and never must return!
Thee shepherd, thee the woods, and desert caves,
With wild thyme and the gadding vine o'ergrown, [3]
And all their echoes mourn.
The willows, and the hazel copses green,
Shall now no more be seen,
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.
As killing as the canker to the rose,
Or taint-worm to the weanling herds that graze,
Or frost to flowers, that their gay wardrobe wear,
When first the whitethorn blows;
Such, Lycidas, thy loss to shepherd's ear.
Where were ye nymphs when the remorseless deep
Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?
For neither were ye playing on the steep,
Where your old bards, the famous Druids lie, [4]
Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high, [5]
Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream: [6]
Ay me, I fondly dream!
Had ye been there…for what could that have done?
What could the muse herself that Orpheus bore, [7]
The muse herself, for her enchanting son
Whom universal nature did lament, [8]
When by the rout that made the hideous roar, [9]
His gory visage down the stream was sent,
Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore.
Alas! What boots it with uncessant care
To tend the homely slighted shepherd's trade,
And strictly meditate the thankless muse,
Were it not better done as others use,
To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neaera's hair? [10]
Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
(That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights, and live laborious days;
But the fair guerdon when we hope to find,
And think to burst out into sudden blaze, [11]

King's educational experience to an ancient poetic tradition, and to elevate it by placing it within the European tradition of education and culture. See Alan Rudrum, Milton: Comus and Shorter Poems (London: Macmillan, 1967), 63–64.

[1] Battening fattening; see OED batten v^1. Compare Virgil, Eclogue 8:15: "Scarce had night's cool shade left the sky, what time the dew on the tender grass is sweetest to the flock" (Loeb).

[2] Damoetas a conventional pastoral name. Milton may have had a particular tutor in mind.

[3] gadding straggling.

[4] Druids were both priests and poets, and so have particular relevance to Edward King.

[5] shaggy top of Mona. Mona (Anglesey) was not wooded in Milton's time, but Drayton remarks that it had once been dark with sacred oaks (Poly-Olbion 9:452–459).

[6] where Deva spreads her wizard stream The river Dee was credited with powers of divination (Poly-Olbion 10:186–210). Drayton used the adjective "wizard" of another river, the Weaver.

[7] the muse herself that Orpheus bore Calliope.

[8] enchanting The word is used in a strict sense, in relation to the magical powers of Orpheus.

[9] the rout that made the hideous roar Orpheus was torn to pieces by the Maenads, female followers of Bacchus.

[10] To sport…hair? Amaryllis and Neaera are conventional names for shepherdesses or nymphs in pastoral verse.

[11] guerdon reward or recompense (OED guerdon sb). The apparently noble but ultimately futile aspiration to fame is expressed in terms of that courtly chivalry ("spurs," "guerdon") which Milton was later to reject in the prologue to Book IX of Paradise Lost.

Comes the blind Fury with th' abhorrèd shears,
And slits the thin-spun life. But not the praise, [1]
Phoebus replied, and touched my trembling ears;
Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glistering foil
Set off to the world, nor in broad rumour lies,
But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes,
And perfect witness of all-judging Jove;
As he pronounces lastly on each deed,
Of so much fame in heaven expect thy meed. [2]
O fountain Arethuse, and thou honoured flood,
Smooth-sliding Mincius, crowned with vocal reeds, [3]
That strain I heard was of a higher mood: [4]
But now my oat proceeds, [5]
And listens to the herald of the sea [6]
That came in Neptune's plea, [7]
He asked the waves, and asked the felon winds,
What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain?
And questioned every gust of rugged wings
That blows from off each beakèd promontory;
They knew not of his story,
And sage Hippotades their answer brings,
That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed, [8]
The air was calm, and on the level brine,
Sleek Panope with all her sisters played. [9]
It was that fatal and perfidious bark
Built in th' eclipse, and rigged with curses dark,
That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.
Next Camus, reverend sire, went footing slow,
His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge, [10]
Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe. [11]
Ah! who hath reft (quoth he) my dearest pledge?
Last came, and last did go,
The pilot of the Galilean lake,
Two massy keys he bore of metals twain
(The golden opes, the iron shuts amain), [12]
He shook his mitred locks, and stern bespake,
How well could I have spared for thee, young swain,
Enow of such as for their bellies' sake,
Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold?

[1] the blind Fury Milton's attention to mythological detail is remarkable. Conventionally, it was the Fates, not the Furies, who cut the thread of life. The Fates were inexorable, but also impartial and just; the Furies on the other hand were spirits of vengeance, seeking out a particular person.

[2] Phoebus, Jove It used to be argued, on the basis of these pagan names, that this is a passage of false consolation, to be superseded by the Christian consolation of the poem's close. This argument ignores the common practice of Milton and many other Renaissance poets. Phoebus Apollo, the god of poetry, was frequently equated with Christ; and one only has to go to the first line of A Mask for another example of Milton using "Jove" for "God."

[3] Arethuse, and...Mincius The fountain-nymph Arethusa fled from the river-god Alpheus and reappeared in Sicily as a spring welling up near the sea; this is one of the poem's resurrection-images, all of which, appropriately to an elegy for a man who was drowned, are related to water. Mincius is an Italian river mentioned ("honoured") by Virgil (Georgics 3:14–15). Together, they represent Greek and Roman pastoral poetry.

[4] That strain I heard was of a higher mood This refers back to the end of the previous section, placing it higher than the inspiration of the pastoral poets, who lived in pagan times.

[5] oat the oaten flute of pastoral.

[6] the herald of the sea Triton, Neptune's son.

[7] in Neptune's plea in view of the lines which follow, to gather evidence for Neptune's court. See OED plea sb I.

[8] Hippotades the ruler of the winds, more familiar by his name of Aeolus.

[9] Panope one of the fifty Nereids (sea-nymphs) who calmed the seas.

[10] Camus, reverend sire the river Cam, "reverend" because Cambridge was already an ancient university in the seventeenth century. Camus is not a pagan god, and so the passage provides a subtle transition to the explicit Christianity of the last spirit of the waters: St. Peter, the "pilot of the Galilean lake." Neptune, Camus and the pilot of the Galilean lake form a progression: Nature, Culture, Religion. See Rudrum, Comus and Shorter Poems, 71–72.

[11] that sanguine flower inscribed with woe the hyacinth, supposed to have sprung from the blood of a youth accidentally killed by Apollo during a game of quoits. It is supposed to be marked with the letters aiai, the Greek exclamation expressing grief.

[12] Two massy keys "thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matthew 16:18–19).

Of other care they little reckoning make,
Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,
And shove away the worthy bidden guest.
Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold
A sheep-hook, or have learned aught else the least
That to the faithful herdman's art belongs! [1]
What recks it them? What need they? They are sped;
And when they list, their lean and flashy songs
Grate on their scrannel pipes of wretched straw,
The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
But swoll'n with wind, and the rank mist they draw,
Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread:
Besides what the grim wolf with privy paw [2]
Daily devours apace, and nothing said,
But that two-handed engine at the door,
Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more. [3]
Return Alpheus, the dread voice is past,
That shrunk thy streams; return Sicilian muse, [4]
And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
Their bells, and flowrets of a thousand hues.
Ye valleys low where the mild whispers use,
Of shades and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,
On whose fresh lap the swart star sparely looks,
Throw hither all your quaint enamelled eyes,
That on the green turf suck the honied showers,
And purple all the ground with vernal flowers.
Bring the rathe primrose that forsaken dies,
The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,
The white pink, and the pansy freaked with jet,
The glowing violet,
The musk-rose, and the well-attired woodbine,
With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head,
And every flower that sad embroidery wears:
Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffodillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureate hearse where Lycid lies. [5]
For so to interpose a little ease,
Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise
(Ay me!) Whilst thee the shores, and sounding seas [6]
Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled,
Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides
Where thou perhaps under the whelming tide
Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world;
Or whether thou to our moist vows denied,
Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old, [7]

[1] Blind mouths John Ruskin drew attention to the force of this in the first lecture of Sesame and Lilies, pointing out that a bishop means one who sees and a pastor is one who feeds, and commenting "The most unbishoply character a man can have is to be blind. The most unpastoral is, instead of feeding, to want to be fed—to be a Mouth."

[2] the grim wolf with privy paw the Roman Catholic church, operating in England in secret to undo the Reformation. This was Milton's (and a good many others') view of what was happening in the 1630s; Archbishop Laud and other Anglican clerics were thought to be crypto-Catholics.

[3] that two-handed engine at the door a famous crux. Innumerable solutions have been offered, ranging from the Houses of Parliament to the "Jack o'th'Clock" which adorned several churches in Milton's day. The last two lines of this section of the poem may be vague, but they suggest, with adequate clarity and force, the terror and finality of God's avenging justice.

[4] Return Alpheus... return Sicilian muse The transition to the third section is achieved in a manner similar to that from the first to the second, in a modulation back to pagan pastoralism. Alpheus is the god of one of the rivers of Arcadia. The Sicilian muse refers to pastoral poetry, the Sicilian Theocritus being traditionally regarded as the father of pastoral poets.

[5] The passage which ends here draws upon one of the conventions of pastoral verse, the passage of the flowers. These are flowers that seem to mourn, but the feeling is different from that in the opening section: the passage has more colour than the "brown" myrtles and the "never-sere" ivy. In its gentleness, and delicacy of colour, the passage conveys consolation as much as lament; but it is a false consolation, as the poet recognizes in the close, because Lycidas is not lying on a "laureate hearse"; he died too soon to win poetic laurels, and his body is in the ocean, beyond the reach of his mourners.

[6] with false surmise / (Ay me!) Early modern texts tended to be punctuated for sound, for example to indicate pauses, rather than "grammatically." If we are modernizing at all, the original period after "surmise" has to be deleted. I have indicated the pause that it intended by bracketing (Ay me!). The point is that the period after "surmise" yields a syntax in which the "angel" who is asked to "look homeward" must logically be Lycidas rather than Michael.

[7] fable of Bellerus old the fabled abode of Bellerus; the latter is a giant or hero invented by Milton in accordance with "Bellerium," the Latin name for Land's End in Cornwall.

Where the great vision of the guarded mount
Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold; [1]
Look homeward angel now, and melt with ruth. [2]
And, O ye dolphins, waft the hapless youth. [3]
Weep no more, woeful shepherds weep no more,
For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead,
Sunk though he be beneath the watery floor,
So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams, and with new spangled ore,
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky: [4]
So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
Through the dear might of him that walked the waves, [5]
Where other groves, and other streams along,
With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves,
And hears the unexpressive nuptial song,
In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love. [6]
There entertain him all the saints above,
In solemn troops, and sweet societies
That sing, and singing in their glory move,
And wipe the tears for ever from his eyes.
Now Lycidas the shepherds weep no more;
Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore, [7]
In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
To all that wander in that perilous flood.
Thus sang the uncouth swain to th' oaks and rills,
While the still morn went out with sandals grey,
He touched the tender stops of various quills,
With eager thought warbling his Doric lay: [8]
And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
And now was dropped into the western bay;
At last he rose, and twitched his mantle blue: [9]
Tomorrow to fresh woods, and pastures new. [10]

Sonnet 7 [11]

How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth,
Stol'n on his wing my three and twenti'th year!
My hasting days fly on with full career,
But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th. [12]
Perhaps my semblance might deceive the truth,
That I to manhood am arriv'd so near, [13]

[1] the great vision of the guarded mount St. Michael, the guardian angel who was said to have appeared to fishermen on St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall in 495 C.E.; Namancos and Bayona's hold a region in north-west Spain and a Spanish fortress respectively.

[2] Look homeward angel now, and melt with ruth because the Catholic threat, since the defeat of the Armada in 1588 and the failure of the Gunpowder Plot in 1604, is no longer from Spain but within England itself. In this context we may dismiss the notion that the angel's home is in heaven; there is no reason why he should "melt with ruth" when looking in that particular direction. The relevant consideration is Michael's status as guardian angel of England.

[3] waft convey safely to land (OED waft $v^1$2). Dolphins are friendly to humans, and were thought to perform this service both to the living and the dead.

[4] the day-star perhaps Lucifer, the morning star; more likely the sun. Both were symbols of resurrection.

[5] him that walked the waves Jesus. See Matthew 14:22–33.

[6] unexpressive inexpressible; nuptial song the marriage song of the Lamb (Revelation 19:1–9).

[7] genius of the shore that is, the genius loci, the guardian spirit of that place.

[8] eager thought in contrast to the reluctance expressed in the beginning of the poem; Doric lay The pastoral poets Theocritus, Moschus and Bion wrote in the Doric dialect.

[9] blue the colour of hope.

[10] fresh woods, and pastures new echoing Phineas Fletcher, The Purple Island (1633), 6:77: "Tomorrow shall ye feast in pastures new."

[11] The date when this sonnet was written is important to its interpretation. Was it December 9, 1631, Milton's twenty-third birthday, or December 9, 1632, when Milton had ceased being twenty-three? The second of these possibilities has been widely accepted.

[12] bud or blossom a common metaphor for poetry. Compare the title of Cowley's first volume, Poetical Blossoms.

[13] deceive the truth that is, misrepresent it.

And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
That some more timely-happy spirits indu’th.[1]
Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,
It shall be still in strictest measure ev’n,[2]
To that same lot, however mean, or high,
Toward which Time leads me, and the will of Heav’n;[3]
All is, if I have grace to use it so,
As ever in my great task-master’s eye.
—1645

Sonnet 12
On the detraction which followed upon my writing certain treatises[4]

I did but prompt the age to quit their clogs[5]
By the known rules of ancient liberty,[6]
When straight a barbarous noise environs me
Of owls and cuckoos, asses, apes and dogs.[7]
As when those hinds that were transformed to frogs
Railed at Latona’s twin-born progeny
Which after held the sun and moon in fee.[8]
But this is got by casting pearl to hogs;[9]
That bawl for freedom in their senseless mood,
And still revolt when truth would set them free.[10]

---

[1] timely-happy forward, precocious; indu’th the inward ripeness that inheres in some more timely-happy spirits; see OED endue v 9 b, this place cited. There has been a good deal of discussion about which of his contemporaries Milton might have had in mind. One candidate is Thomas Randolph, a Cambridge contemporary who had had a play acted before the King and Queen in 1632. Given the wide acceptance of the later date of composition, Cowley, ten years younger than Milton, is a strong contender for another place. Poetical Blossoms has a date of 1633 on the title-page, but its entry in the Stationers’ Registers is dated October 24, 1632; it was common for the stationers to give books printed in the last month or two of the year the date of the following year, rather as nowadays “2000 model year” vehicles are available during the second half of the preceding year.

[2] It referring back to “inward ripeness.”

[3] Yet be it…will of Heav’n Whatever the degree of ripeness, whether it comes early or late, it will be equal to, proportionate with, the “lot” towards which the poet is being led by time and the will of heaven. The last two lines of the poem register Milton’s own responsibility in the matter.

[4] This title is from the Trinity Manuscript, where it covers this and another sonnet (“A book was writ of late called Tetrachordon”). The two sonnets are a response to the attacks upon Milton after he published his divorce tracts. The Presbyterians had been Milton’s allies against the bishops, but they were hostile to the divorce tracts. In a sermon preached before both houses of Parliament in August 1644, Herbert Palmer spoke of the disadvantages of religious toleration, and mentioned a new theory of divorce “of which a wicked book is abroad and uncensured, though deserving to be burnt, whose Author hath been so impudent as to set his name to it and dedicate it to yourselves.”

[5] quit their clogs rid themselves of encumbrances. A “clog” was a heavy piece of wood attached to a prisoner’s leg or neck to prevent escape (OED clog sb 2).

[6] known rules of ancient liberty the Mosaic law; also the natural law of right reason, which Milton believed to be of “more antiquity” than “marriage itself.” (JL)

[7] owls and cuckoos, asses, apes and dogs Owls represent ignorance, cuckoos ingratitude, asses obstinate stupidity, apes empty mockery and dogs quarrelsomeness.

[8] Latona’s twin-born progeny When Latona, with her new-born twins, Apollo and Diana, fled from the wrath of Juno, she came to Lycia and, being thirsty, wished to drink from a lake of clear water. Some countrymen who were there stopped her; when she pleaded with them, they added threats and abusive language. As a punishment, Latona changed them into frogs (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 6:331f), (E. A. J. Honigmann, ed., Milton’s sonnets, London: Macmillan, 1966, 118). In a Christian interpretation of this story, Latona is said to represent “faith or the Scripture, which from the beginning were pregnant with Phoebus and Diana, that is with Christ and the Blessed Virgin.” Alexander Ross published in 1653 a work called Mystogogus Poeticus; here it is asserted that “Our Saviour Christ is the true Apollo”; and that “God’s Church is the true Diana” (Rudrum, Comus and Shorter Poems, 90). The reference to Latona and her twins imply that Milton’s writings on divorce are a true interpretation of the gospels.

[9] casting pearl to hogs See Matthew 7:6. These pearls were conventionally interpreted as “the mysteries of the gospel,” and the swine as “profane men, who despise and care nothing about the gospel” (Rudrum, Comus and Shorter Poems, 91).

[10] revolt draw back from a course of action, return to one’s allegiance (OED revolt v 2b). Milton’s Presbyterian detractors “revolt” by sliding back into conservative traditions. Milton also plays on the other sense of “revolt” to imply that the Presbyterians are rebels against Truth. He employs the same pun in his prose, always at the Presbyterians’ expense (JL).

Licence they mean when they cry liberty; [1]
For who loves that, must first be wise and good;
But from that mark how far they rove we see
For all this waste of wealth, and loss of blood. [2]

Sonnet 18
On the Late Massacre in Piedmont[3]

Avenge O Lord thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old
When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones, [4]
Forget not: in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piedmontese that rolled
Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow [5]
O'er all the Italian fields where still doth sway
The triple tyrant: that from these may grow [6]
A hundredfold, who having learnt thy way
Early may fly the Babylonian woe. [7]

Sonnet 19[8]

When I consider how my light is spent,
Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide, [9]
And that one talent which is death to hide, [10]
Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
To serve therewith my maker, and present
My true account, lest he returning chide,
Doth God exact day-labour, light denied,
I fondly ask; but patience to prevent
That murmur, soon replies, God doth not need
Either man's work or his own gifts, who best

[1] Licence probably in reference to the Licensing Order of June 14, 1643; Milton is identifying Truth with freedom of speech and publication; in his prose Milton wrote that "Liberty hath a sharp and double edge, fit only to be handled by just and virtuous men"; and that "none can love freedom heartily, but good men; the rest love not freedom, but licence" (Honigmann, 120).

[2] For all in spite of. Milton is not condemning the Civil War. He is blaming the Presbyterians for making it futile.

[3] The massacre to which this poem refers was one of the most atrocious episodes in the religious conflicts of the seventeenth century. The Waldenses, who practised a simple form of Christianity, took their name from their founder Pierre Valdes. They were excommunicated in 1215. Driven out of the cities and fertile regions, they lived in the Alpine mountains of France and Italy. On the Italian side they lived in the territory of the Duke of Savoy, who made a treaty with them in 1561. In 1655 his successor sent an army to enforce the terms of that treaty. The result was a massacre in which seventeen hundred Waldensians died. Cromwell responded energetically, and refrained from sending an army only because the Duke made peace in August 1655, and accepted the principle of toleration. Milton as Latin Secretary wrote to the Duke of Savoy and other heads of state. Much publicity was given to this episode in England; the language of the poem echoes that in various newsletters: see Honigmann's edition for details.

[4] who kept thy truth so pure of old Protestants of Milton's time thought the sect was even older than it actually was, and that it retained apostolic purity (JL); stocks and stones that is, idols made of wood and stones: "[Israel] defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and with stocks" (Jeremiah 3:9).

[5] Their martyred blood and ashes sow in reference to the saying that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.

[6] triple tyrant the Pope, with his three-tiered crown.

[7] the Babylonian woe Puritans regarded the Roman Catholic church as the Babylon of the Apocalypse, whose doom is foretold; see Revelation 17 and 18.

[8] The date of this sonnet is not certainly known. Milton's eyesight had been failing since 1644; he became completely blind in 1652.

[9] Ere half my days This has been subject to a good deal of discussion. If Milton had been referring to the biblical "three score years and ten," the sonnet must be dated considerably earlier than the time at which he became completely blind. Some scholars think he may have reckoned his own life-span in relation to his father, who lived to be eighty-four; others that he was referring to an "immemorial popular belief" that man lives for a hundred years. See the interesting discussion in Honigmann, 172–174.

[10] that one talent which is death to hide See Matthew 25:14f. Milton is referring to his literary talent.

Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best, his state[1]
Is kingly. Thousands at his bidding speed
And post o'er land and ocean without rest:[2]
They also serve who only stand and wait.[3]

On the New Forcers of Conscience under the Long Parliament[4]

Because you have thrown off your prelate lord,[5]
And with stiff vows renounced his liturgy[6]
To seize the widowed whore plurality
From them whose sin ye envied, not abhorred,[7]
Dare ye for this adjure the civil sword
To force our consciences that Christ set free,
And ride us with a classic hierarchy[8]
Taught ye by mere A.S. and Rutherford?[9]
Men whose life, learning, faith and pure intent
Would have been held in high esteem with Paul
Must now be named and printed heretics
By shallow Edwards and Scotch What-d'ye-call:[10]
But we do hope to find out all your tricks,
Your plots and packing worse than those of Trent,[11]
That so the Parliament
May with their wholesome and preventive shears
Clip your phylacteries, though balk your ears,[12]
And succour our just fears
When they shall read this clearly in your charge,
New Presbyter is but old Priest writ large.[13]
—1673

---

[1] his mild yoke "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me…For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light" (Matthew 11: 29–30).

[2] Thousands at his bidding speed Milton is referring to the angels, as God's "messengers."

[3] stand and wait "Wait on the Lord" is a frequent biblical phrase; see Psalm 27:14 for example.

[4] Honigmann (198) remarks that the most likely date of composition is early in 1646, since two of the Presbyterians referred to attacked Milton in print at about this time. This is a "tailed sonnet," such as was used by Italian poets for humorous or satirical sonnets. The form was not familiar in English.

[5] thrown off your prelate lord The "Ordinance for the abolition of archbishops, bishops etc" came out on October 9, 1646; but there had been a series of measures before that, and the Lords and Commons had resolved as early as 1643 that the hierarchical government of the church was evil and would be taken away. There is a probable pun on Archbishop Laud's name; see Honigmann, 197.

[6] with stiff vows renounced his liturgy William Prynne, in Canterburies Doome, 1646, remarks that the bill of attainder against Laud was passed "the very same hour they voted down the liturgy" (Honigmann, 197).

[7] widowed whore plurality The Presbyterians had railed against pluralism, the practice of receiving income from two or more benefices simultaneously, but were quick to adopt the practice themselves.

[8] classic hierarchy The "classis" or presbytery was a body of elders which acted as a disciplinary court in the Presbyterian system.

[9] A.S. and Rutherford Adam Stuart was a Scot who lived in London and wrote against the Independents; Samuel Rutherford, Professor of Divinity at St. Andrews, sat in the Assembly of Divines as one of the Scottish Commissioners.

[10] shallow Edwards Thomas Edwards, who had attacked Milton as a "divorcer" in Gangraena, 1646; Scotch What-d'ye-call not certainly identified; but Robert Baillie was a Scottish Commissioner who "expressed himself with bitterness against the Independents." Earlier commentators thought that George Gillespie, another Scottish Commissioner, was Milton's target; he was hostile to religious toleration, wrote of sectaries as heretics, and supported the Presbyterian campaign for the right to excommunicate. See Honigmann, 201.

[11] Trent Honigmann (202) remarks that the intrigues at the Council of Trent (1545–1563) had become notorious. The Westminster Assembly was partly a political arena for Presbyterians and Independents.

[12] phylacteries small boxes containing quotations from the Mosaic law which were worn on the forehead by pious Jews. Their display was treated in the gospel (Matthew 23:5) as a byword for hypocrisy; balk your ears stop short of cutting off their ears (a punishment of the time). The Trinity Manuscript had "crop ye as close as marginal P-'s ears," clearly a reference to William Prynne ("marginal" because he was famed for crowding his margins, in his many books, with citations of authorities). Prynne's ears were cropped twice, in 1634 and in 1637.

[13] New Presbyter is but old Priest writ large Milton is making a political point out of a philological one; etymologically, "priest" is a contraction of "presbyter."

Sonnet 15
On the Lord General Fairfax at the Siege of Colchester[1]

Fairfax, whose name in arms through Europe rings[2]
Filling each mouth with envy, or with praise,
And all her jealous monarchs with amaze,
And rumours loud, that daunt remotest kings,
Thy firm unshaken virtue ever brings
Victory home, though new rebellions raise
Their Hydra heads, and the false North displays
Her broken league, to imp their serpent wings,[3]
O yet a nobler task awaits thy hand;
For what can war, but endless war still breed,
Till truth, and right from violence be freed,
And public faith cleared from the shameful brand
Of public fraud. In vain doth valour bleed[4]
While avarice, and rapine share the land.

Samson Agonistes[5]

OF THAT SORT OF DRAMATIC POEM WHICH IS CALLED TRAGEDY

Tragedy, as it was anciently composed, hath been ever held the gravest, moralest, and most profitable of all other poems: therefore said by Aristotle to be of power by raising pity and fear, or terror, to purge the mind of those and such-like passions, that is to temper and reduce them to just measure with a kind of delight, stirred up by reading or seeing those passions well imitated.[6] Nor is nature wanting in her own effects to make good his assertion: for so in physic things of melancholic hue and quality are used against melancholy, sour against sour, salt to remove salt humours. Hence philosophers and other gravest writers, as Cicero, Plutarch and others, frequently cite out of tragic poets, both to adorn and illustrate their discourse. The Apostle Paul himself thought it not unworthy to insert a verse of Euripides into the text of Holy Scripture, I Cor. xv.33, and Paraeus commenting on the Revelation, divides the whole book as a tragedy, into acts distinguished each by a chorus of heavenly harpings and song between.[7] Heretofore men in highest dignity have laboured not a little to be thought able to compose a tragedy. Of that honour Dionysius the elder was no less ambitious, than before of his attaining to the tyranny. [1]Augustus Caesar also had begun his Ajax, but unable to please his own judgement with what he had begun, left it unfinished. Seneca the philosopher is by some thought the author of those tragedies (at least the best of them) that go under that name.[2] Gregory Nazianzen a Father of the church, thought it not unbeseeming the sanctity of his person to write a tragedy, which he entitled, Christ Suffering.[3] This is mentioned to vindicate tragedy from the small esteem, or rather infamy, which in the account of many it undergoes at this day with other common interludes; happening through the poet's error of intermixing comic stuff with tragic sadness and gravity; or introducing trivial and vulgar persons, which by all judicious hath been counted absurd; and brought in without discretion, corruptly to gratify the people. And though ancient tragedy use no prologue, yet using sometimes, in case of self-defence, or explanation, that which Martial calls an epistle;[4] in behalf of this tragedy coming forth after the ancient manner, much different from what among us passes for best, thus much beforehand may be epistled; that chorus is here introduced after the Greek manner, not ancient only but modern, and still in use among the Italians. In the modelling therefore of this poem, with good reason, the ancients and Italians are rather followed, as of much more authority and fame. The measure of verse used in the chorus is of all sorts, called by the Greeks monostrophic, or rather apolelymenon,[5] without regard had to strophe, antistrophe or epode, which were a kind of stanzas framed only for the music, then used with the chorus that sung; not essential to the poem, and therefore not material; or being divided into stanzas or pauses, they may be called alleostropha.[6] Division into act and scene referring chiefly to the stage (to which this work never was intended) is here omitted. It suffices if the whole drama be found not produced beyond the fifth act.

[1] This sonnet, from the Trinity Manuscript, was composed in July or August 1648. Perhaps thought unpublishable in 1673 because of its republican tendencies, it was published in 1694 by Edward Phillips. For full historical background see Honigman, 138–144.

[2] whose name in arms through Europe rings Fairfax had been a very successful commander for Parliament and was made Commander in Chief of the New Model Army in January 1645. In 1648 several Royalist risings initiated the Second Civil War. Fairfax laid siege to Colchester, which fell on August 27. Fairfax disapproved of the execution of Charles I; his wife, masked, called out from the gallery at Charles's trial, "Oliver Cromwell is a traitor" (C.V. Wedgewood, A Coffin for King Charles, New York: Time Incorporated, 1966, 143–144). See Marvell, Upon Appleton House.

[3] Hydra heads The Hydra was a many-headed serpent; when one head was severed, two more grew in its place; it was slain by Hercules; false North…broken league The Scots (who had been Parliament's allies) invaded England in support of the King on July 8, 1648. The invasion violated the Solemn League and Covenant; imp their serpent wings engraft feathers so as to improve powers of flight (JL).

[4] Public Faith See the note on stanza 10 of Lovelace's To Lucasta. From Prison. Honigmann remarks that in Milton's day the phrase was widely used to refer to a form of National Debt incurred by the Parliament; it was also used to fob off the army whose pay was in arrears; public fraud Milton was said to have "lent most of his Personal Estate upon the Publick Faith" (Honigmann, 142) and may have been motivated here by a strong sense of personal injury. Misappropriation of public funds was a charge often brought by Royalists; in this case the Independents and Army-chiefs alleged it of Parliamentarians.

[5] The date of composition has been much discussed. I have always regarded it as a post-Restoration work, and consider this to be now established with moral certitude. See Blair Worden, "Milton, Samson Agonistes, and the Restoration" in Culture and Society in the Stuart Restoration, ed. Gerald MacLean (Cambridge: Cambridge U P, 1995), 111–136.

[6] Aristotle writes of tragic catharsis in Poetics 6.

[7] Paraeus David Paraeus (1548–1622) a Calvinist theologian and biblical commentator.

Of the style and uniformity, and that commonly called the plot, whether intricate or explicit, which is nothing indeed but such economy, or disposition of the fable as may stand best with verisimilitude and decorum; they only will best judge who are not unacquainted with Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, the three tragic poets unequalled yet by any, and the best rule to all who endeavour to write tragedy. The circumscription of time wherein the whole drama begins and ends, is according to ancient rule, and best example, within the space of twenty-four hours.

THE ARGUMENT

Samson made captive, blind, and now in the prison at Gaza, there to labour as in a common workhouse, on a festival day, in the general cessation from labour, comes forth into the open air, to a place nigh, somewhat retired there to sit a while and bemoan his condition. Where he happens at length to be visited by certain friends and equals of his tribe, which make the Chorus, who seek to comfort him what they can; then by his old father Manoa, who endeavours the like, and withal tells him his purpose to procure his liberty by ransom; lastly, that this feast was proclaimed by the Philistines as a day of thanksgiving for their deliverance from the hands of Samson, which yet more troubles him. Manoa then departs to prosecute his endeavour with the Philistian lords for Samson's redemption; who in the meanwhile is visited by other persons; and lastly by a public officer to require his coming to the feast before the lords and people, to play or show his strength in their presence; he at first refuses, dismissing the public officer with absolute denial to come; at length persuaded inwardly that this was from God, he yields to go along with him, who came now the second time with great threatenings to fetch him; the Chorus yet remaining on the place, Manoa returns full of joyful hope, to procure ere long his son's deliverance: in the midst of which discourse an Hebrew comes in haste confusedly at first; and afterward more distinctly relating the catastrophe, what Samson had done to the Philistines, and by accident to himself; wherewith the tragedy ends.

[1] Dionysius the elder Dionysius I of Syracuse (ca. 430–367 B.C.E.).

[2] Seneca the philosopher is by some thought the author of those tragedies in fact the same person, but this was not established in Milton's day. Lucius Annaeus Seneca (4 B.C.E.–65 C.E.) was influential in the Renaissance in both capacities.

[3] Gregory Nazianzen Bishop of Constantinople (329–389).

[4] Martial Martial noted that tragedies and comedies may need epistles since "they cannot speak for themselves" (JL). What this means may be suggested by the following: "Samson Agonistes, the major poem of Milton's we must try to understand without the promptings of a narrative voice, might be held to exemplify the postmodern view that 'meanings are undecidable'" (Alan Rudrum, "Discerning the Spirit in Samson Agonistes: the Dalila Episode," in "All in All": Unity, Diversity and Miltonic Perspective, eds. Charles W. Durham and Kristin A. Pruitt, London: Associated U P, 1999, 245).

[5] monostrophic repeating one stanzaic arrangement; apolelymenon Greek: "freed" from the obligation to repeat stanzaic patterns (JL).

[6] alleostropha of irregular strophes or stanzas.

The Scene before the Prison in Gaza

Sam. A little onward lend thy guiding hand
To these dark steps, a little further on;
For yonder bank hath choice of sun or shade,
There I am wont to sit, when any chance
Relieves me from my task of servile toil,
Daily in the common prison else enjoined me,
Where I a prisoner chained, scarce freely draw
The air imprisoned also, close and damp,
Unwholesome draught: but here I feel amends,
The breath of heaven fresh blowing, pure and sweet,
With day-spring born; here leave me to respire.[1]
This day a solemn feast the people hold
To Dagon their sea-idol, and forbid[2]
Laborious works, unwillingly this rest
Their superstition yields me; hence with leave
Retiring from the popular noise, I seek
This unfrequented place to find some ease,
Ease to the body some, none to the mind
From restless thoughts, that like a deadly swarm
Of hornets armed, no sooner found alone,
But rush upon me thronging, and present
Times past, what once I was, and what am now.
O wherefore was my birth from heaven foretold
Twice by an angel, who at last in sight
Of both my parents all in flames ascended
From off the altar, where an offering burned,
As in a fiery column charioting
His godlike presence, and from some great act
Or benefit revealed to Abraham's race?[3]
Why was my breeding ordered and prescribed
As of a person separate to God,
Designed for great exploits; if I must die

---

[1] With day-spring born There has been much discussion as to whether Samson Agonistes is a drama of regeneration, or whether Samson is a failed hero, contrasted with the true heroism of Jesus in Paradise Regained. For those able to hear biblical echoes, this is an early clue. Compare Luke 1:78–79: "Through the tender mercy of our God, whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, and to guide our feet into the way of peace."

[2] Dagon their sea-idol the principal god of the Philistines, described at Paradise Lost 1.462–63 as a "sea-monster, upward man / And downward fish."

[3] O wherefore was my birth from heaven foretold Judges 13:3–5; 13:10–23. In annotating I shall assume that the reader will be familiar with the biblical Samson story in Judges 13–16.

Betrayed, captived, and both my eyes put out,
Made of my enemies the scorn and gaze;
To grind in brazen fetters under task
With this heaven-gifted strength? O glorious strength
Put to the labour of a beast, debased
Lower than bond-slave! Promise was that I
Should Israel from Philistian yoke deliver;
Ask for this great deliverer now, and find him
Eyeless in Gaza at the mill with slaves,
Himself in bonds under Philistian yoke;
Yet stay, let me not rashly call in doubt
Divine prediction; what if all foretold
Had been fulfilled but through mine own default,
Whom have I to complain of but myself?
Who this high gift of strength committed to me,
In what part lodged, how easily bereft me,
Under the seal of silence could not keep,
But weakly to a woman must reveal it,
O'ercome with importunity and tears.
O impotence of mind, in body strong!
But what is strength without a double share
Of wisdom, vast, unwieldy, burdensome,
Proudly secure, yet liable to fall
By weakest subtleties, not made to rule,
But to subserve where wisdom bears command.
God, when he gave me strength, to show withal
How slight the gift was, hung it in my hair.
But peace, I must not quarrel with the will
Of highest dispensation, which herein
Haply had ends above my reach to know:
Suffices that to me strength is my bane,
And proves the source of all my miseries;
So many, and so huge, that each apart
Would ask a life to wail, but chief of all,
O loss of sight, of thee I most complain!
Blind among enemies, O worse than chains,
Dungeon, or beggary, or decrepit age!
Light the prime work of God to me is extinct,
And all her various objects of delight
Annulled, which might in part my grief have eased,
Inferior to the vilest now become
Of man or worm; the vilest here excel me,
They creep, yet see, I dark in light exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse and wrong,
Within doors, or without, still as a fool,
In power of others, never in my own;
Scarce half I seem to live, dead more than half.
O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse
Without all hope of day!
O first-created beam, and thou great word,
Let there be light, and light was over all;
Why am I thus bereaved thy prime decree?
The sun to me is dark
And silent as the moon,
When she deserts the night
Hid in her vacant interlunar cave.[1]
Since light so necessary is to life,
And almost life itself, if it be true
That light is in the soul,
She all in every part; why was the sight
To such a tender ball as the eye confined?
So obvious and so easy to be quenched,
And not as feeling through all parts diffused,
That she might look at will through every pore?
Then had I not been thus exiled from light;
As in the land of darkness yet in light,
To live a life half dead, a living death,
And buried; but O yet more miserable!
Myself, my sepulchre, a moving grave,
Buried, yet not exempt
By privilege of death and burial
From worst of other evils, pains and wrongs,
But made hereby obnoxious more
To all the miseries of life,[2]

---

[1] silent as the moon…her vacant interlunar cave The sense, applied to the moon, of "not shining" is first recorded in 1646 (OED silent a 5a); "vacant" means "at leisure"; the ancients supposed that the moon rested in a cave during the interlunar period between old and new moons (JL).

[2] obnoxious exposed, liable, exposed to (OED obnoxious 1a).

Life in captivity
Among inhuman foes.
But who are these? for with joint pace I hear
The tread of many feet steering this way;
Perhaps my enemies who come to stare
At my affliction, and perhaps to insult,
Their daily practice to afflict me more.

Chor. This, this is he; softly awhile,
Let us not break in upon him;
O change beyond report, thought, or belief!
See how he lies at random, carelessly diffused, [1]
With languished head unpropped,
As one past hope, abandoned,
And by himself given over;
In slavish habit, ill-fitted weeds
O'er-worn and soiled;
Or do my eyes misrepresent? Can this be he,
That heroic, that renowned,
Irresistible Samson? whom unarmed
No strength of man, or fiercest wild beast could withstand;
Who tore the lion, as the lion tears the kid,
Ran on embattled armies clad in iron,
And weaponless himself,
Made arms ridiculous, useless the forgery
Of brazen shield and spear, the hammered cuirass, [2]
Chalybean-tempered steel, and frock of mail
Adamantean proof; [3]
But safest he who stood aloof,
When insupportably his foot advanced,
In scorn of their proud arms and warlike tools,
Spurned them to death by troops. The bold Ascalonite
Fled from his lion ramp, old warriors turned
Their plated backs under his heel; [4]
Or grovelling soiled their crested helmets in the dust.
Then with what trivial weapon came to hand,
The jaw of a dead ass, his sword of bone,
A thousand foreskins fell, the flower of Palestine
In Ramath-lehi famous to this day: [5]
Then by main force pulled up, and on his shoulders bore
The gates of Azza; post, and massy bar
Up to the hill by Hebron, seat of giants old,
No journey of a sabbath-day, and loaded so; [6]
Like whom the Gentiles feign to bear up heaven. [7]
Which shall I first bewail,
Thy bondage or lost sight,
Prison within prison
Inseparably dark?
Thou art become (O worst imprisonment!)
The dungeon of thyself; thy soul
(Which men enjoying sight oft without cause complain)
Imprisoned now indeed,
In real darkness of the body dwells,
Shut up from outward light
To incorporate with gloomy night;
For inward light alas
Puts forth no visual beam.
O mirror of our fickle state,
Since man on earth unparalleled!
The rarer thy example stands,
By how much from the top of wondrous glory,

[1] diffused spread out (OED diffuse v 3, this place cited).

[2] cuirass breastplate. In this passage as in the prologue to Paradise Lost 9 Milton suggests his disdain of mediaeval "chivalry" and the "heroism" of warfare.

[3] Chalybean-tempered steel The Chalybes were a Black Sea tribe famous for their forging of iron; Adamantean proof armour capable of resisting adamant, a mythical substance of impenetrable hardness (JL).

[4] Ascalonite Ascalon was one of five Philistine cities.

[5] A thousand foreskins fell The Jews were circumcised, the Philistines were not.

[6] journey of a sabbath-day Jewish law restricted travel on the sabbath to about three quarters of a mile. Samson carried the massive gates from Gaza to Hebron—about forty miles (JL).

[7] whom the Gentiles feign to bear up heaven Atlas.

Strongest of mortal men,
To lowest pitch of abject fortune thou art fallen.
For him I reckon not in high estate
Whom long descent of birth
Or the sphere of fortune raises;
But thee whose strength, while virtue was her mate,
Might have subdued the earth,
Universally crowned with highest praises.

Sam. I hear the sound of words, their sense the air
Dissolves unjointed ere it reach my ear.

Chor. He speaks, let us draw nigh. Matchless in might,
The glory late of Israel, now the grief;
We come thy friends and neighbours not unknown
From Eshtaol and Zora's fruitful vale
To visit or bewail thee, or if better,
Counsel or consolation we may bring,
Salve to thy sores, apt words have power to suage
The tumours of a troubled mind,
And are as balm to festered wounds.

Sam. Your coming, friends, revives me, for I learn
Now of my own experience, not by talk,
How counterfeit a coin they are who friends
Bear in their superscription (of the most
I would be understood), in prosperous days
They swarm, but in adverse withdraw their head
Not to be found, though sought. Ye see, O friends,
How many evils have enclosed me round;
Yet that which was the worst now least afflicts me,
Blindness, for had I sight, confused with shame,
How could I once look up, or heave the head,
Who like a foolish pilot have shipwrecked
My vessel trusted to me from above,
Gloriously rigged; and for a word, a tear,
Fool, have divulged the secret gift of God
To a deceitful woman: tell me friends,
Am I not sung and proverbed for a fool
In every street, do they not say, how well
Are come upon him his deserts? yet why?
Immeasurable strength they might behold
In me, of wisdom nothing more than mean;
This with the other should, at least, have paired,
These two proportioned ill drove me transverse.

Chor. Tax not divine disposal, wisest men
Have erred, and by bad women been deceived;
And shall again, pretend they ne'er so wise.
Deject not then so overmuch thyself,
Who hast of sorrow thy full load besides;
Yet truth to say, I oft have heard men wonder
Why thou shouldst wed Philistian women rather
Than of thine own tribe fairer, or as fair,
At least of thy own nation, and as noble.

Sam. The first I saw at Timna, and she pleased
Me, not my parents, that I sought to wed,
The daughter of an infidel: they knew not
That what I motioned was of God; I knew
From intimate impulse, and therefore urged
The marriage on; that by occasion hence
I might begin Israel's deliverance, [1]
The work to which I was divinely called;
She proving false, the next I took to wife
(O that I never had! fond wish too late)
Was in the vale of Sorec, Dalila,
That specious monster, my accomplished snare.
I thought it lawful from my former act, [2]
And the same end; still watching to oppress
Israel's oppressors: of what now I suffer

[1] I knew / From intimate impulse For the understanding of such "intimate impulses" in Puritan thinking, see Blair Worden's essay, mentioned above; also Geoffrey F. Nuttall, The Holy Spirit in Puritan Faith and Experience (Chicago: U of Chicago P, reprinted 1992).

[2] I thought it lawful from my former act "Here Samson marks the distinction between the inner voice and the promptings of the devices and desires of our own hearts…he made the mistake of acting by analogy. He had no 'intimate impulse' but thought it lawful from his former act. In the first instance there was an apparent violation of God's law, in the second a real one" (Rudrum, Discerning the Spirit, 253).

She was not the prime cause, but I myself,
Who vanquished with a peal of words (O weakness!)
Gave up my fort of silence to a woman.

Chor. In seeking just occasion to provoke
The Philistine, thy country's enemy,
Thou never wast remiss, I bear thee witness:
Yet Israel still serves with all his sons.

Sam. That fault I take not on me, but transfer
On Israel's governors, and heads of tribes,
Who seeing those great acts which God had done
Singly by me against their conquerors
Acknowledged not, or not at all considered
Deliverance offered: I on the other side
Used no ambition to commend my deeds,
The deeds themselves, though mute, spoke loud the doer;
But they persisted deaf, and would not seem
To count them things worth notice, till at length
Their lords the Philistines with gathered powers
Entered Judea seeking me, who then
Safe to the rock of Etham was retired,
Not flying, but forecasting in what place
To set upon them, what advantaged best;
Meanwhile the men of Judah to prevent
The harass of their land, beset me round;
I willingly on some conditions came
Into their hands, and they as gladly yield me
To the uncircumcised a welcome prey,
Bound with two cords; but cords to me were threads
Touched with the flame: on their whole host I flew
Unarmed, and with a trivial weapon felled
Their choicest youth; they only lived who fled.
Had Judah that day joined, or one whole tribe,
They had by this possessed the towers of Gath,
And lorded over them whom now they serve;
But what more oft in nations grown corrupt,[1]
And by their vices brought to servitude,
Than to love bondage more than liberty,
Bondage with ease than strenuous liberty;
And to despise, or envy, or suspect
Whom God hath of his special favour raised
As their deliverer; if he aught begin,
How frequent to desert him, and at last
To heap ingratitude on worthiest deeds?

Chor. Thy words to my remembrance bring
How Succoth and the fort of Penuel
Their great deliverer contemned,
The matchless Gideon in pursuit
Of Madian and her vanquished kings;[2]
And how ingrateful Ephraim
Had dealt with Jephtha, who by argument,
Not worse than by his shield and spear
Defended Israel from the Ammonite,
Had not his prowess quelled their pride
In that sore battle when so many died
Without reprieve adjudged to death,
For want of well pronouncing shibboleth.[3]

Sam. Of such examples add me to the roll,
Me easily indeed mine may neglect,
But God's proposed deliverance not so.

Chor. Just are the ways of God,
And justifiable to men;
Unless there be who think not God at all,
If any be, they walk obscure;
For of such doctrine never was there school,
But the heart of the fool,
And no man therein doctor but himself.[4]

---

[1] But what more oft in nations grown corrupt etc. This passage has obvious relevance to England's restoration of Charles II to the throne.

[2] Gideon See Judges 8:5–9.

[3] Ephraim See Judges 11:12–33, 12:1–6.

[4] the heart of the fool "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God" (Psalm 14:1).

Yet more there be who doubt his ways not just,
As to his own edicts, found contradicting,
Then give the reins to wandering thought,
Regardless of his glory's diminution;
Till by their own perplexities involved
They ravel more, still less resolved,
But never find self-satisfying solution.
As if they would confine the interminable,
And tie him to his own prescript,
Who made our laws to bind us, not himself,
And hath full right to exempt
Whom so it pleases him by choice
From national obstriction, without taint [1]
Of sin, or legal debt;
For with his own laws he can best dispense.
He would not else who never wanted means,
Nor in respect of the enemy just cause
To set his people free,
Have prompted this heroic Nazarite,
Against his vow of strictest purity,
To seek in marriage that fallacious bride,
Unclean, unchaste.
Down reason then, at least vain reasonings down,
Though reason here aver
That moral verdict quits her of unclean:
Unchaste was subsequent, her stain not his. [2]
But see here comes thy reverend sire
With careful step, locks white as down,
Old Manoa: advise
Forthwith how thou ought'st to receive him.

Sam. Ay me, another inward grief awaked,
With mention of that name renews the assault.

Man. Brethren and men of Dan, for such ye seem,
Though in this uncouth place; if old respect, [3]
As I suppose, towards your once gloried friend,
My son now captive, hither hath informed
Your younger feet, while mine cast back with age
Came lagging after; say if he be here.

Chor. As signal now in low dejected state,
As erst in highest, behold him where he lies.

Man. O miserable change! is this the man,
That invincible Samson, far renowned,
The dread of Israel's foes, who with a strength
Equivalent to angel's walked their streets,
None offering fight; who single combatant
Duelled their armies ranked in proud array,
Himself an army, now unequal match
To save himself against a coward armed
At one spear's length. O ever-failing trust
In mortal strength! and O what not in man
Deceivable and vain! Nay what thing good
Prayed for, but often proves our woe, our bane?
I prayed for children, and thought barrenness
In wedlock a reproach; I gained a son,
And such a son as all men hailed me happy;
Who would be now a father in my stead?
O wherefore did God grant me my request,
And as a blessing with such pomp adorned?
Why are his gifts desirable, to tempt
Our earnest prayers, then given with solemn hand
As graces, draw a scorpion's tail behind?
For this did the angel twice descend? for this
Ordained thy nurture holy, as of a plant;
Select, and sacred, glorious for awhile,
The miracle of men: then in an hour
Ensnared, assaulted, overcome, led bound,

---

[1] obstriction legal obligation, in this case prohibiting marriage with Gentiles. This is a crucial paragraph. The Hebrew Scriptures implicitly make much of God's freedom by showing him working in ways that strict Israelites would have found unorthodox. It is precisely the perceived freedom of God, his not being bound by his own prescripts, which endows his human worshippers with freedom. Dagon, on the other hand, is an idol, because, his will being coterminous with that of the priests and elders of Israel, he has no transcendence. See Rudrum, Discerning the Spirit, 248f.

[2] Unchaste was subsequent Samson's first wife became unchaste when she was "given to his companion" (Judges 14:20) (JL).

[3] uncouth unfamiliar (OED uncouth a 2).

Thy foes' derision, captive, poor, and blind
Into a dungeon thrust, to work with slaves?
Alas methinks whom God hath chosen once
To worthiest deeds, if he through frailty err,
He should not so o'erwhelm, and as a thrall
Subject him to so foul indignities,
Be it but for honour's sake of former deeds.

Sam. Appoint not heavenly disposition, father, [1]
Nothing of all these evils hath befall'n me
But justly; I myself have brought them on,
Sole author I, sole cause: if aught seem vile,
As vile hath been my folly, who have profaned
The mystery of God given me under pledge
Of vow, and have betrayed it to a woman,
A Canaanite, my faithless enemy.
This well I knew, nor was at all surprised,
But warned by oft experience: did not she
Of Timna first betray me, and reveal
The secret wrested from me in her height
Of nuptial love professed, carrying it straight
To them who had corrupted her, my spies,
And rivals? In this other was there found
More faith? who also in her prime of love,
Spousal embraces, vitiated with gold,
Though offered only, by the scent conceived
Her spurious first-born; treason against me?
Thrice she assayed with flattering prayers and sighs,
And amorous reproaches to win from me
My capital secret, in what part my strength
Lay stored, in what part summed, that she might know: [2]
Thrice I deluded her, and turned to sport
Her importunity, each time perceiving
How openly, and with what impudence
She purposed to betray me, and (which was worse
Than undissembled hate) with what contempt
She sought to make me traitor to myself;
Yet the fourth time, when mustering all her wiles,
With blandished parleys, feminine assaults,
Tongue-batteries, she surceased not day nor night
To storm me over-watched, and wearied out.
At times when men seek most repose and rest,
I yielded, and unlocked her all my heart,
Who with a grain of manhood well resolved
Might easily have shook off all her snares:
But foul effeminacy held me yoked
Her bond-slave; O indignity, O blot
To honour and religion! servile mind
Rewarded well with servile punishment!
The base degree to which I now am fall'n,
These rags, this grinding, is not yet so base
As was my former servitude, ignoble,
Unmanly, ignominious, infamous,
True slavery, and that blindness worse than this,
That saw not how degenerately I served.

Man. I cannot praise thy marriage-choices, son,
Rather approved them not; but thou didst plead
Divine impulsion prompting how thou might'st
Find some occasion to infest our foes.[3]
I state not that; this I am sure; our foes
Found soon occasion thereby to make thee
Their captive, and their triumph; thou the sooner
Temptation found'st, or over-potent charms
To violate the sacred trust of silence
Deposited within thee; which to have kept
Tacit, was in thy power; true; and thou bear'st
Enough, and more the burden of that fault;
Bitterly hast thou paid, and still art paying
That rigid score. A worse thing yet remains,
This day the Philistines a popular feast
Here celebrate in Gaza, and proclaim

---

[1] Appoint both "blame" and "prescribe" (OED appoint v 8, 18).

[2] capital a pun (the word being derived from the Latin for "head"); it was Samson's chief secret, it was in his head, and it was on his head.

[3] thou didst plead / Divine impulsion Manoa is inaccurate here. Samson only claimed divine impulsion for the first marriage. Manoa (like a number of modern commentators) is suggesting that Samson was unreliable in interpreting "divine motions" (or "the inner voice"); Samson had no such doubts.

Great pomp, and sacrifice, and praises loud
To Dagon, as their god who hath delivered
Thee Samson bound and blind into their hands,
Them out of thine, who slew'st them many a slain.
So Dagon shall be magnified, and God,
Besides whom is no god, compared with idols,
Disglorified, blasphemed, and had in scorn
By the idolatrous rout amidst their wine;
Which to have come to pass by means of thee,
Samson, of all thy sufferings think the heaviest,
Of all reproach the most with shame that ever
Could have befall'n thee and thy father's house.

Sam. Father, I do acknowledge and confess
That I this honour, I this pomp have brought
To Dagon, and advanced his praises high
Among the heathen round; to God have brought
Dishonour, obloquy, and oped the mouths
Of idolists, and atheists; have brought scandal
To Israel, diffidence of God, and doubt
In feeble hearts, propense enough before
To waver, or fall off and join with idols;
Which is my chief affliction, shame and sorrow,
The anguish of my soul, that suffers not
Mine eye to harbour sleep, or thoughts to rest.
This only hope relieves me, that the strife
With me hath end; all the contest is now
'Twixt God and Dagon; Dagon hath presumed,
Me overthrown, to enter lists with God,
His deity comparing and preferring
Before the God of Abraham. He, be sure,
Will not connive, or linger, thus provoked,
But will arise and his great name assert:
Dagon must stoop, and shall ere long receive
Such a discomfit, as shall quite despoil him
Of all these boasted trophies won on me,
And with confusion blank his worshippers.

Man. With cause this hope relieves thee, and these words
I as a prophecy receive: for God,
Nothing more certain, will not long defer
To vindicate the glory of his name
Against all competition, nor will long
Endure it, doubtful whether God be Lord,
Or Dagon. But for thee what shall be done?
Thou must not in the meanwhile here forgot
Lie in this miserable loathsome plight
Neglected. I already have made way
To some Philistian lords, with whom to treat
About thy ransom: well they may by this
Have satisfied their utmost of revenge
By pains and slaveries, worse than death inflicted
On thee, who now no more canst do them harm.

Sam. Spare that proposal, father, spare the trouble
Of that solicitation; let me here,
As I deserve, pay on my punishment;
And expiate, if possible, my crime,
Shameful garrulity. To have revealed
Secrets of men, the secrets of a friend,
How heinous had the fact been, how deserving
Contempt, and scorn of all, to be excluded
All friendship, and avoided as a blab,
The mark of fool set on his front!
But I God's counsel have not kept, his holy secret
Presumptuously have published, impiously,
Weakly at least, and shamefully: a sin
That Gentiles in their parables condemn
To their abyss and horrid pains confined.

Man. Be penitent and for thy fault contrite,
But act not in thy own affliction, son,
Repent the sin, but if the punishment
Thou canst avoid, self-preservation bids;
Or the execution leave to high disposal,
And let another hand, not thine, exact
Thy penal forfeit from thyself; perhaps
God will relent, and quit thee all his debt;
Who evermore approves and more accepts
(Best pleased with humble and filial submission)
Him who imploring mercy sues for life,

Than who self-rigorous chooses death as due;
Which argues over-just, and self-displeased
For self-offence, more than for God offended.
Reject not then what offered means, who knows
But God hath set before us, to return thee
Home to thy country and his sacred house,
Where thou may'st bring thy off'rings, to avert
His further ire, with prayers and vows renewed.

Sam. His pardon I implore; but as for life,
To what end should I seek it? when in strength
All mortals I excelled, and great in hopes
With youthful courage and magnanimous thoughts
Of birth from heaven foretold and high exploits,
Full of divine instinct, after some proof
Of acts indeed heroic, far beyond
The sons of Anak, famous now and blazed,[1]
Fearless of danger, like a petty god
I walked about admired of all and dreaded
On hostile ground, none daring my affront.
Then swoll'n with pride into the snare I fell
Of fair fallacious looks, venereal trains,
Softened with pleasure and voluptuous life;
At length to lay my head and hallowed pledge
Of all my strength in the lascivious lap
Of a deceitful concubine who shore me
Like a tame wether, all my precious fleece,[2]
Then turned me out ridiculous, despoiled,
Shaven, and disarmed among my enemies.

Chor. Desire of wine and all delicious drinks,
Which many a famous warrior overturns,
Thou couldst repress, nor did the dancing ruby
Sparkling, out-poured, the flavour, or the smell,
Or taste that cheers the heart of gods and men,
Allure thee from the cool crystalline stream.[3]

Sam. Wherever fountain or fresh current flowed
Against the eastern ray, translucent, pure
With touch ethereal of heaven's fiery rod
I drank, from the clear milky juice allaying
Thirst, and refreshed; nor envied them the grape
Whose heads that turbulent liquor fills with fumes.

Chor. O madness, to think use of strongest wines
And strongest drinks our chief support of health,
When God with these forbidden made choice to rear
His mighty champion, strong above compare,
Whose drink was only from the liquid brook.

Sam. But what availed this temperance, not complete
Against another object more enticing?
What boots it at one gate to make defence,
And at another to let in the foe
Effeminately vanquished? by which means,[4]
Now blind, disheartened, shamed, dishonoured, quelled,
To what can I be useful, wherein serve
My nation, and the work from heaven imposed,[5]
But to sit idle on the household hearth,
A burdenous drone; to visitants a gaze,
Or pitied object, these redundant locks[6]
Robustious to no purpose clustering down,
Vain monument of strength; till length of years
And sedentary numbness craze my limbs
To a contemptible old age obscure.

[1] sons of Anak giants. See Numbers 13:33.

[2] wether a castrated ram.

[3] Desire of wine This passage reflects the fact that as a Nazarite Samson had to "separate himself from wine and strong drink" (Numbers 6:3).

[4] Effeminately through degrading passion for a woman (OED effeminately adv 2, this place cited, as sole instance).

[5] To what can I be useful "a merely rhetorical question. Samson, in his terms, the terms of a champion, can no longer be useful. He has quietly admitted as much (460). But resignation to God's terms is not resignation to Manoa's. The vision of uselessness conjured up by Manoa's proposal wrings from Samson a cry that tells us, the readers, that he still wants to be useful. Born and raised a hero, he can think only in heroic terms" (Alan Rudrum, Samson Agonistes, London: Macmillan, 1969, 37).

[6] redundant abounding to excess (OED redundant a 2, where this is remarked as the first instance of the usage in modern English).

Here rather let me drudge and earn my bread,
Till vermin or the draff of servile food
Consume me, and oft-invocated death
Hasten the welcome end of all my pains.

Man. Wilt thou then serve the Philistines with that gift
Which was expressly given thee to annoy them?
Better at home lie bed-rid, not only idle,
Inglorious, unemployed, with age outworn.
But God who caused a fountain at thy prayer
From the dry ground to spring, thy thirst to allay
After the brunt of battle, can as easy
Cause light again within thy eyes to spring,
Wherewith to serve him better than thou hast;
And I persuade me so; why else this strength
Miraculous yet remaining in those locks?
His might continues in thee not for naught,
Nor shall his wondrous gifts be frustrate thus.

Sam. All otherwise to me my thoughts portend,
That these dark orbs no more shall treat with light,
Nor the other light of life continue long,
But yield to double darkness nigh at hand:
So much I feel my genial spirits droop,
My hopes all flat, nature within me seems
In all her functions weary of herself;
My race of glory run, and race of shame,
And I shall shortly be with them that rest.

Man. Believe not these suggestions, which proceed
From anguish of the mind and humours black, [1]
That mingle with thy fancy. I however
Must not omit a father's timely care
To prosecute the means of thy deliverance
By ransom or how else: meanwhile be calm,
And healing words from these thy friends admit.

Sam. O that torment should not be confined
To the body's wounds and sores
With maladies innumerable
In heart, head, breast, and reins; [2]
But must secret passage find
To the inmost mind,
There exercise all his fierce accidents,
And on her purest spirits prey,
As on entrails, joints, and limbs,
With answerable pains, but more intense,
Though void of corporal sense.
My griefs not only pain me
As a lingering disease,
But finding no redress, ferment and rage,
Nor less than wounds immedicable
Rankle, and fester, and gangrene,
To black mortification.
Thoughts my tormentors armed with deadly stings
Mangle my apprehensive tenderest parts,
Exasperate, exulcerate, and raise
Dire inflammation which no cooling herb
Or med'cinal liquor can assuage,
Nor breath of vernal air from snowy alp.
Sleep hath forsook and given me o'er
To death's benumbing opium as my only cure.
Thence faintings, swoonings of despair,
And sense of heaven's desertion.
I was his nursling once and choice delight,
His destined from the womb,
Promised by heavenly message twice descending.
Under his special eye
Abstemious I grew up and thrived amain;
He led me on to mightiest deeds
Above the nerve of mortal arm
Against the uncircumcised, our enemies.
But now hath cast me off as never known,
And to those cruel enemies,

---

[1] humours black in the "Four humours" psychology of the period, melancholy, deriving from "black bile."

[2] reins kidneys.

Whom I by his appointment had provoked,
Left me all helpless with the irreparable loss
Of sight, reserved alive to be repeated
The subject of their cruelty, or scorn.
Nor am I in the list of them that hope;
Hopeless are all my evils, all remediless;
This one prayer yet remains, might I be heard,
No long petition, speedy death,
The close of all my miseries, and the balm.

Chor. Many are the sayings of the wise
In ancient and in modern books enrolled;
Extolling patience as the truest fortitude; [1]
And to the bearing well of all calamities,
All chances incident to man's frail life
Consolatories writ
With studied argument, and much persuasion sought
Lenient of grief and anxious thought,
But with the afflicted in his pangs their sound
Little prevails, or rather seems a tune,
Harsh, and of dissonant mood from his complaint,
Unless he feel within
Some source of consolation from above;
Secret refreshings, that repair his strength,
And fainting spirits uphold.
God of our fathers, what is man!
That thou towards him with hand so various,
Or might I say contrarious,
Temper'st thy providence through his short course,
Not evenly, as thou rul'st
The angelic orders and inferior creatures mute,
Irrational and brute.
Nor do I name of men the common rout,
That wand'ring loose about
Grow up and perish, as the summer fly,
Heads without name no more remembered,
But such as thou hast solemnly elected,
With gifts and graces eminently adorned
To some great work, thy glory,
And people's safety, which in part they effect:
Yet toward these thus dignified, thou oft
Amidst their height of noon,
Changest thy countenance, and thy hand with no regard
Of highest favours past
From thee on them, or them to thee of service.
Nor only dost degrade them, or remit
To life obscured, which were a fair dismission,
But throw'st them lower than thou didst exalt them high,
Unseemly falls in human eye,
Too grievous for the trespass or omission,
Oft leav'st them to the hostile sword
Of heathen and profane, their carcases
To dogs and fowls a prey, or else captived:
Or to the unjust tribunals, under change of times,
And condemnation of the ingrateful multitude. [2]
If these they scape, perhaps in poverty

---

[1] patience as the truest fortitude We may understand from this passage that there is more than one kind of fortitude, patience being the truest; and that the point has been discussed by ancient and modern philosophers. This is in fact the case. From the Stoic philosophers down through the Christian centuries there had been discussion of the role of patience in the ethical and religious life. It had been classified as a kind of fortitude, the other kind being magnanimity. St. Thomas Aquinas, in discussing "fortitude," described magnanimity as a virtue of aggression and patience as a virtue of endurance (Summa Theologica Part II, Second Part, questions 123–139). We may say that magnanimity is the kind of fortitude appropriate to the hero of epic, patience the kind appropriate to the Christian saint. There can be little doubt which of the two Milton preferred to celebrate. See Paradise Lost 9:27f and 12:569.

[2] their carcases / To dogs and fowls a prey, or else captived: / Or to the unjust tribunals, under change of times, / And condemnation of the ingrateful multitude These lines express very well the fate of some republicans under the Restoration; see Blair Worden's "Milton, Samson Agonistes, and the Restoration" in Culture and Society in the Stuart Restoration, 122f. Worden remarks that the three regicides executed in April 1662 proclaimed that their cause would survive "when the fowls have eaten of our vile bodies."

With sickness and disease thou bow'st them down,
Painful diseases and deformed,
In crude old age;
Though not disordinate, yet causeless suffering
The punishment of dissolute days, in fine,
Just or unjust, alike seem miserable,
For oft alike, both come to evil end.
So deal not with this once thy glorious champion,
The image of thy strength, and mighty minister.
What do I beg? how hast thou dealt already?
Behold him in this state calamitous, and turn
His labours, for thou canst, to peaceful end.
But who is this, what thing of sea or land?
Female of sex it seems,
That so bedecked, ornate, and gay,
Comes this way sailing
Like a stately ship [1]
Of Tarsus, bound for th' isles
Of Javan or Gadire
With all her bravery on, and tackle trim,
Sails filled, and streamers waving,
Courted by all the winds that hold them play,
An amber scent of odorous perfume
Her harbinger, a damsel train behind;
Some rich Philistian matron she may seem,
And now at nearer view, no other certain
Than Dalila thy wife.

Sam. My wife, my traitress, let her not come near me.

Chor. Yet on she moves, now stands and eyes thee fixed,
About t' have spoke, but now, with head declined
Like a fair flower surcharged with dew, she weeps
And words addressed seem into tears dissolved,
Wetting the borders of her silken veil:
But now again she makes address to speak.

Dal. With doubtful feet and wavering resolution
I came, still dreading thy displeasure, Samson,
Which to have merited, without excuse,
I cannot but acknowledge; yet if tears
May expiate (though the fact more evil drew
In the perverse event than I foresaw)
My penance hath not slackened, though my pardon
No way assured. But conjugal affection
Prevailing over fear, and timorous doubt
Hath led me on desirous to behold
Once more thy face, and know of thy estate.
If aught in my ability may serve
To lighten what thou suffer'st, and appease
Thy mind with what amends is in my power,
Though late, yet in some part to recompense
My rash but more unfortunate misdeed.

Sam. Out, out hyena; these are thy wonted arts,
And arts of every woman false like thee,
To break all faith, all vows, deceive, betray,
Then as repentant to submit, beseech,
And reconcilement move with feigned remorse,
Confess, and promise wonders in her change,
Not truly penitent, but chief to try
Her husband, how far urged his patience bears,
His virtue or weakness which way to assail:
Then with more cautious and instructed skill
Again transgresses, and again submits;
That wisest and best men full oft beguiled
With goodness principled not to reject
The penitent, but ever to forgive,
Are drawn to wear out miserable days,
Entangled with a poisonous bosom snake,
If not by quick destruction soon cut off
As I by thee, to ages an example.

Dal. Yet hear me Samson; not that I endeavour
To lessen or extenuate my offence,
But that on the other side, if it be weighed
By itself, with aggravations not surcharged,
Or else with just allowance counterpoised,

---

[1] Like a stately ship The Israelites were not a sea-going nation, but some of their enemies were.

I may, if possible, thy pardon find
The easier towards me, or thy hatred less.
First granting, as I do, it was a weakness
In me, but incident to all our sex,
Curiosity, inquisitive, importune
Of secrets, then with like infirmity
To publish them, both common female faults:
Was it not weakness also to make known
For importunity, that is for naught,
Wherein consisted all thy strength and safety?
To what I did thou show'dst me first the way.
But I to enemies revealed, and should not.
Nor shouldst thou have trusted that to woman's frailty:
Ere I to thee, thou to thyself wast cruel.
Let weakness then with weakness come to parle
So near related, or the same of kind,
Thine forgive mine; that men may censure thine
The gentler, if severely thou exact not
More strength from me, than in thyself was found.
And what if love, which thou interpret'st hate,
The jealousy of love, powerful of sway
In human hearts, nor less in mine towards thee,
Caused what I did? I saw thee mutable
Of fancy, feared lest one day thou wouldst leave me
As her at Timna, sought by all means therefore
How to endear, and hold thee to me firmest:
No better way I saw than by importuning
To learn thy secrets, get into my power
Thy key of strength and safety: thou wilt say,
Why then revealed? I was assured by those
Who tempted me, that nothing was designed
Against thee but safe custody, and hold:
That made for me; I knew that liberty
Would draw thee forth to perilous enterprises,
While I at home sat full of cares and fears
Wailing thy absence in my widowed bed;
Here I should still enjoy thee day and night
Mine and love's prisoner, not the Philistines',
Whole to myself, unhazarded abroad,
Fearless at home of partners in my love.
These reasons in love's law have passed for good,
Though fond and reasonless to some perhaps;
And love hath oft, well meaning, wrought much woe.
Yet always pity or pardon hath obtained.
Be not unlike all others, not austere
As thou art strong, inflexible as steel.
If thou in strength all mortals dost exceed,
In uncompassionate anger do not so.

Sam. How cunningly the sorceress displays
Her own transgressions, to upbraid me mine!
That malice not repentance brought thee hither,
By this appears: I gave, thou say'st, the example,
I led the way; bitter reproach, but true,
I to myself was false ere thou to me,
Such pardon therefore as I give my folly,
Take to thy wicked deed: which when thou seest
Impartial, self-severe, inexorable,
Thou wilt renounce thy seeking, and much rather
Confess it feigned, weakness is thy excuse,
And I believe it, weakness to resist
Philistian gold: if weakness may excuse,
What murderer, what traitor, parricide,
Incestuous, sacrilegious, but may plead it?
All wickedness is weakness: that plea therefore
With God or man will gain thee no remission.
But love constrained thee; call it furious rage
To satisfy thy lust: love seeks to have love;
My love how couldst thou hope, who took'st the way
To raise in me inexpiable hate,
Knowing, as needs I must, by thee betrayed?
In vain thou striv'st to cover shame with shame,
Or by evasions thy crime uncover'st more.

Dal. Since thou determin'st weakness for no plea
In man or woman, though to thy own condemning,
Hear what assaults I had, what snares besides,
What sieges girt me round, ere I consented;
Which might have awed the best-resolved of men,
The constantest to have yielded without blame.

It was not gold, as to my charge thou lay'st,
That wrought with me; thou know'st the magistrates
And princes of my country came in person,
Solicited, commanded, threatened, urged,
Adjured by all the bonds of civil duty
And of religion, pressed how just it was,
How honourable, how glorious to entrap
A common enemy, who had destroyed
Such numbers of our nation: and the priest
Was not behind, but ever at my ear,
Preaching how meritorious with the gods
It would be to ensnare an irreligious
Dishonourer of Dagon: what had I
To oppose against such powerful arguments?
Only my love of thee held long debate;
And combated in silence all these reasons
With hard contest: at length that grounded maxim
So rife and celebrated in the mouths
Of wisest men; that to the public good
Private respects must yield; with grave authority
Took full possession of me and prevailed;
Virtue, as I thought, truth, duty so enjoining.

Sam. I thought where all thy circling wiles would end;
In feigned religion, smooth hypocrisy.
But had thy love, still odiously pretended,
Been, as it ought, sincere, it would have taught thee
Far other reasonings, brought forth other deeds.
I before all the daughters of my tribe
And of my nation chose thee from among
My enemies, loved thee, as too well thou knew'st,
Too well, unbosomed all my secrets to thee,
Not out of levity, but overpowered
By thy request, who could deny thee nothing;
Yet now am judged an enemy. Why then
Didst thou at first receive me for thy husband?
Then, as since then, thy country's foe professed:
Being once a wife, for me thou wast to leave
Parents and country; nor was I their subject, [1]
Nor under their protection but my own,
Thou mine, not theirs: if aught against my life
Thy country sought of thee, it sought unjustly,
Against the law of nature, law of nations,
No more thy country, but an impious crew
Of men conspiring to uphold their state
By worse than hostile deeds, violating the ends
For which our country is a name so dear;
Not therefore to be obeyed. But zeal moved thee;
To please thy gods thou didst it; gods unable
To acquit themselves and prosecute their foes
But by ungodly deeds, the contradiction
Of their own deity, gods cannot be:
Less therefore to be pleased, obeyed, or feared,
These false pretexts and varnished colours failing,
Bare in thy guilt how foul must thou appear!

Dal. In argument with men a woman ever
Goes by the worse, whatever be her cause.

Sam. For want of words no doubt, or lack of breath,
Witness when I was worried with thy peals.

Dal. I was a fool, too rash, and quite mistaken
In what I thought would have succeeded best.
Let me obtain forgiveness of thee, Samson,
Afford me place to show what recompense
Towards thee I intend for what I have misdone,
Misguided; only what remains past cure
Bear not too sensibly, nor still insist
To afflict thyself in vain: though sight be lost,
Life yet hath many solaces, enjoyed
Where other senses want not their delights

[1] Being once a wife, for me thou wast to leave / Parents and country Whether in the context of the Hebrew Bible, or of Milton's England, it would have been obvious that in marrying Samson, Dalila renounced her god and society and owed fealty to his society and his God. Modern views and customs are irrelevant to the poem's meaning, though not of course to its significance. For the distinction between these terms see E.D. Hirsch, Validity in Interpretation (New Haven: Yale U P, 1967).

At home in leisure and domestic ease,
Exempt from many a care and chance to which
Eyesight exposes daily men abroad.
I to the lords will intercede, not doubting
Their favourable ear, that I may fetch thee
From forth this loathsome prison-house, to abide
With me, where my redoubled love and care
With nursing diligence, to me glad office,
May ever tend about thee to old age
With all things grateful cheered, and so supplied,
That what by me thou hast lost thou least shalt miss.

Sam. No, no, of my condition take no care;
It fits not; thou and I long since are twain;
Nor think me so unwary or accursed
To bring my feet again into the snare
Where once I have been caught; I know thy trains
Though dearly to my cost, thy gins, and toils;
Thy fair enchanted cup, and warbling charms
No more on me have power, their force is nulled,[1]
So much of adder's wisdom I have learnt
To fence my ear against thy sorceries.[2]
If in my flower of youth and strength, when all men
Loved, honoured, feared me, thou alone could hate me
Thy husband, slight me, sell me, and forgo me;
How wouldst thou use me now, blind, and thereby
Deceivable, in most things as a child
Helpless, thence easily contemned, and scorned;
And last neglected? How wouldst thou insult
When I must live uxorious to thy will
In perfect thraldom, how again betray me,
Bearing my words and doings to the lords
To gloss upon, and censuring, frown or smile?
This jail I count the house of liberty
To thine whose doors my feet shall never enter.[3]

Dal. Let me approach at least, and touch thy hand.

Sam. Not for thy life, lest fierce remembrance wake
My sudden rage to tear thee joint by joint.
At distance I forgive thee, go with that;
Bewail thy falsehood, and the pious works
It hath brought forth to make thee memorable
Among illustrious women, faithful wives:
Cherish thy hastened widowhood with the gold
Of matrimonial treason: so farewell.

Dal. I see thou art implacable, more deaf
To prayers than winds and seas, yet winds to seas
Are reconciled at length, and sea to shore:
Thy anger, unappeasable, still rages,
Eternal tempest never to be calmed.
Why do I humble thus myself, and suing
For peace, reap nothing but repulse and hate?
Bid go with evil omen and the brand
Of infamy upon my name denounced?
To mix with thy concernments I desist
Henceforth, nor too much disapprove my own.
Fame if not double-faced is double-mouthed,
And with contrary blast proclaims most deeds,
On both his wings, one black, the other white,
Bears greatest names in his wild airy flight.
My name perhaps among the circumcised
In Dan, in Judah, and the bordering tribes,
To all posterity may stand defamed,
With malediction mentioned, and the blot
Of falsehood most unconjugal traduced.
But in my country where I most desire,
In Ecron, Gaza, Asdod, and in Gath
I shall be named among the famousest
Of women, sung at solemn festivals,

---

[1] Thy fair enchanted cup in allusion to Circe.

[2] adder's wisdom deafness; "they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely" (Psalm 58: 4–5).

[3] To thine compared to thine; a very common idiom in this period.

Living and dead recorded, who to save
Her country from a fierce destroyer, chose
Above the faith of wedlock-bands, my tomb
With odours visited and annual flowers.
Not less renowned than in Mount Ephraim,
Jael, who with inhospitable guile
Smote Sisera sleeping through the temples nailed.[1]
Nor shall I count it heinous to enjoy
The public marks of honour and reward
Conferred upon me, for the piety
Which to my country I was judged to have shown.
At this whoever envies or repines
I leave him to his lot, and like my own.

Chor. She's gone, a manifest serpent by her sting
Discovered in the end, till now concealed.

Sam. So let her go, God sent her to debase me,
And aggravate my folly who committed
To such a viper his most sacred trust
Of secrecy, my safety, and my life.

Chor. Yet beauty, though injurious, hath strange power,
After offence returning, to regain
Love once possessed, nor can be easily
Repulsed, without much inward passion felt
And secret sting of amorous remorse.

Sam. Love-quarrels oft in pleasing concord end,
Not wedlock-treachery endangering life.

Chor. It is not virtue, wisdom, valour, wit,
Strength, comeliness of shape, or amplest merit
That woman's love can win or long inherit;
But what it is, hard is to say,
Harder to hit
(Which way soever men refer it),
Much like thy riddle, Samson, in one day
Or seven, though one should musing sit;[2]
If any of these or all, the Timnian bride
Had not so soon preferred
Thy paranymph, worthless to thee compared,[3]
Successor in thy bed,
Nor both so loosely disallied
Their nuptials, nor this last so treacherously
Had shorn the fatal harvest of thy head.
Is it for that such outward ornament
Was lavished on their sex, that inward gifts
Were left for haste unfinished, judgment scant,
Capacity not raised to apprehend
Or value what is best
In choice, but oftest to affect the wrong?
Or was too much of self-love mixed,
Of constancy no root infixed,
That either they love nothing, or not long?
Whate'er it be, to wisest men and best
Seeming at first all heavenly under virgin veil,
Soft, modest, meek, demure,
Once joined, the contrary she proves, a thorn
Intestine, far within defensive arms
A cleaving mischief, in his way to virtue
Adverse and turbulent, or by her charms
Draws him awry enslaved
With dotage, and his sense depraved
To folly and shameful deeds which ruin ends.
What pilot so expert but needs must wreck
Embarked with such a steers-mate at the helm?
Favoured of heaven who finds
One virtuous rarely found,
That in domestic good combines:
Happy that house! his way to peace is smooth:
But virtue which breaks through all opposition,

[1] Jael For the story of Jael and Sisera, see Judges 4.

[2] Much like thy riddle See Judges 14.

[3] paranymph in Greek antiquity, the "friend of the bridegroom," who accompanied him when he went to fetch home the bride; in modern terms, "best man" at a wedding. The reference is to Judges 14:20. The Septuagint uses a different noun, with the same meaning, at this place. The word comes as a reminder that, though his story is biblical, Milton had Greek drama in mind when writing Samson.

And all temptation can remove,
Most shines and most is acceptable above.
Therefore God's universal law
Gave to the man despotic power
Over his female in due awe,
Nor from that right to part an hour,
Smile she or lour:
So shall he least confusion draw
On his whole life, not swayed
By female usurpation, nor dismayed.[1]
But had we best retire, I see a storm?

Sam. Fair days have oft contracted wind and rain.

Chor. But this another kind of tempest brings.

Sam. Be less abstruse, my riddling days are past.

Chor. Look now for no enchanting voice, nor fear
The bait of honeyed words; a rougher tongue
Draws hitherward, I know him by his stride,
The giant Harapha of Gath, his look
Haughty as is his pile high-built and proud.
Comes he in peace? what wind hath blown him hither
I less conjecture than when first I saw
The sumptuous Dalila floating this way:
His habit carries peace, his brow defiance.

Sam. Or peace or not, alike to me he comes.

Chor. His fraught we soon shall know, he now arrives.

Har. I come not Samson, to condole thy chance,
As these perhaps, yet wish it had not been,
Though for no friendly intent. I am of Gath,
Men call me Harapha, of stock renowned
As Og or Anak and the Emims old
That Kiriathaim held, thou know'st me now
If thou at all art known. Much I have heard
Of thy prodigious might and feats performed
Incredible to me, in this displeased,
That I was never present on the place
Of those encounters, where we might have tried
Each other's force in camp or listed field:[2]
And now am come to see of whom such noise
Hath walked about, and each limb to survey,
If thy appearance answer loud report.

Sam. The way to know were not to see but taste.

Har. Dost thou already single me? I thought
Gyves and the mill had tamed thee. O that fortune[3]
Had brought me to the field where thou art famed
To have wrought such wonders with an ass's jaw;
I should have forced thee soon wish other arms,
Or left thy carcase where the ass lay thrown:
So had the glory of prowess been recovered
To Palestine, won by a Philistine
From the unforeskinned race, of whom thou bear'st
The highest name for valiant acts, that honour
Certain to have won by mortal duel from thee,
I lose, prevented by thy eyes put out.

Sam. Boast not of what thou wouldst have done, but do
What then thou wouldst, thou seest it in thy hand.

Har. To combat with a blind man I disdain,
And thou hast need much washing to be touched.

---

[1] not swayed / By female usurpation "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve" (I Timothy 2:12–13). JL notes that Milton cites this approvingly in the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.

[2] listed field provided with lists, for tilting.

[3] Gyves shackles, fetters.

Sam. Such usage as your honourable lords
Afford me assassinated and betrayed, [1]
Who durst not with their whole united powers
In fight withstand me single and unarmed,
Nor in the house with chamber ambushes
Close-banded durst attack me, no not sleeping,
Till they had hired a woman with their gold
Breaking her marriage faith to circumvent me.
Therefore without feigned shifts let be assigned
Some narrow place enclosed, where sight may give thee,
Or rather flight, no great advantage on me;
Then put on all thy gorgeous arms, thy helmet
And brigandine of brass, thy broad habergeon, [2]
Vantbrace and greaves, and gauntlet, add thy spear
A weaver's beam, and seven-times-folded shield, [3]
I only with an oaken staff will meet thee,
And raise such outcries on thy clattered iron,
Which long shall not withhold me from thy head,
That in a little time while breath remains thee,
Thou oft shalt wish thyself at Gath to boast
Again in safety what thou wouldst have done
To Samson, but shalt never see Gath more.

Har. Thou durst not thus disparage glorious arms
Which greatest heroes have in battle worn,
Their ornament and safety, had not spells
And black enchantments, some magician's art
Armed thee or charmed thee strong, which thou from heaven
Feign'dst at thy birth was given thee in thy hair,
Where strength can least abide, though all thy hairs
Were bristles ranged like those that ridge the back
Of chafed wild boars or ruffled porcupines.

Sam. I know no spells, use no forbidden arts; [4]
My trust is in the living God who gave me
At my nativity this strength, diffused
No less through all my sinews, joints and bones, [5]
Than thine, while I preserved these locks unshorn,
The pledge of my unviolated vow.
For proof hereof, if Dagon be thy god,
Go to his temple, invocate his aid
With solemnest devotion, spread before him
How highly it concerns his glory now
To frustrate and dissolve these magic spells,
Which I to be the power of Israel's God
Avow, and challenge Dagon to the test,
Offering to combat thee his champion bold,
With the utmost of his godhead seconded:
Then thou shalt see, or rather to thy sorrow
Soon feel, whose God is strongest, thine or mine.

Har. Presume not on thy God, whate'er he be,
Thee he regards not, owns not, hath cut off
Quite from his people, and delivered up
Into thy enemies' hand, permitted them
To put out both thine eyes, and fettered send thee
Into the common prison, there to grind
Among the slaves and asses thy comrades,
As good for nothing else, no better service
With those thy boisterous locks, no worthy match
For valour to assail, nor by the sword
Of noble warrior, so to stain his honour,
But by the barber's razor best subdued.

Sam. All these indignities, for such they are
From thine, these evils I deserve and more,
Acknowledge them from God inflicted on me
Justly, yet despair not of his final pardon
Whose ear is ever open; and his eye
Gracious to readmit the suppliant;

---

[1] assassinated wounded by treachery (OED assassinate v 3).

[2] brigandine chain-mail or plates sewn on canvas or leather; habergeon sleeveless coat of mail; Vantbrace armour for the forearm (JL); greaves armour for the leg below the knee (OED greave 2).

[3] seven-times-folded shield Compare the seven-fold shield of Turnus in Virgil's Aeneid 12:925.

[4] I know no spells, use no forbidden arts an echo of the oath taken by mediaeval knights before a tournament.

[5] My trust is in the living God Samson has rediscovered his role as God's champion.

In confidence whereof I once again
Defy thee to the trial of mortal fight,
By combat to decide whose god is God,
Thine or whom I with Israel's sons adore.

Har. Fair honour that thou dost thy God, in trusting
He will accept thee to defend his cause,
A murderer, a revolter, and a robber.

Sam. Tongue-doughty giant, how dost thou prove me these?

Har. Is not thy nation subject to our lords?
Their magistrates confessed it, when they took thee
As a league-breaker and delivered bound
Into our hands: for hadst thou not committed
Notorious murder on those thirty men
At Ascalon, who never did thee harm,
Then like a robber stripp'dst them of their robes?
The Philistines, when thou hadst broke the league,
Went up with armèd powers thee only seeking,
To others did no violence nor spoil.

Sam. Among the daughters of the Philistines
I chose a wife, which argued me no foe;
And in your city held my nuptial feast:
But your ill-meaning politician lords,
Under pretence of bridal friends and guests,
Appointed to await me thirty spies,
Who threatening cruel death constrained the bride
To wring from me and tell to them my secret,
That solved the riddle which I had proposed.
When I perceived all set on enmity,
As on my enemies, wherever chanced,
I used hostility, and took their spoil
To pay my underminers in their coin.
My nation was subjected to your lords.
It was the force of conquest; force with force
Is well ejected when the conquered can.
But I a private person, whom my country
As a league-breaker gave up bound, presumed
Single rebellion and did hostile acts.
I was no private but a person raised
With strength sufficient and command from heaven [1]
To free my country; if their servile minds
Me their deliverer sent would not receive,
But to their masters gave me up for nought,
The unworthier they; whence to this day they serve.
I was to do my part from heaven assigned,
And had performed it if my known offence
Had not disabled me, not all your force:
These shifts refuted, answer thy appellant
Though by his blindness maimed for high attempts,
Who now defies thee thrice to single fight,
As a petty enterprise of small enforce.

Har. With thee a man condemned, a slave enrolled,
Due by the law to capital punishment?
To fight with thee no man of arms will deign.

Sam. Cam'st thou for this, vain boaster, to survey me,
To descant on my strength, and give thy verdict?
Come nearer, part not hence so slight informed;
But take good heed my hand survey not thee.

Har. O Baal-zebub! can my ears unused
Hear these dishonours, and not render death?

Sam. No man withholds thee, nothing from thy hand
Fear I incurable; bring up thy van,
My heels are fettered, but my fist is free.

---

[1] I was no private but a person raised etc. Samson does not concede that he is merely a private person; he had been appointed by God.

Har. This insolence other kind of answer fits.

Sam. Go baffled coward, lest I run upon thee,
Though in these chains, bulk without spirit vast,
And with one buffet lay thy structure low,
Or swing thee in the air, then dash thee down
To the hazard of thy brains and shattered sides.

Har. By Astaroth ere long thou shalt lament
These braveries in irons loaden on thee.

Chor. His giantship is gone somewhat crestfall'n,
Stalking with less unconscionable strides,
And lower looks, but in a sultry chafe.

Sam. I dread him not, nor all his giant-brood,
Though fame divulge him father of five sons
All of gigantic size, Goliah chief.

Chor. He will directly to the lords, I fear,
And with malicious counsel stir them up
Some way or other yet further to afflict thee.

Sam. He must allege some cause, and offered fight
Will not dare mention, lest a question rise
Whether he durst accept the offer or not,
And that he durst not plain enough appeared.
Much more affliction than already felt
They cannot well impose, nor I sustain;
If they intend advantage of my labours,
The work of many hands, which earns my keeping
With no small profit daily to my owners.
But come what will, my deadliest foe will prove
My speediest friend, by death to rid me hence,
The worst that he can give, to me the best.
Yet so it may fall out, because their end
Is hate, not help to me, it may with mine
Draw their own ruin who attempt the deed.

Chor. O how comely it is and how reviving
To the spirits of just men long oppressed!
When God into the hands of their deliverer
Puts invincible might
To quell the mighty of the earth, the oppressor,
The brute and boisterous force of violent men
Hardy and industrious to support
Tyrannic power, but raging to pursue
The righteous and all such as honour truth;
He all their ammunition
And feats of war defeats
With plain heroic magnitude of mind
And celestial vigour armed,
Their armouries and magazines contemns,
Renders them useless, while
With wingèd expedition
Swift as the lightning glance he executes
His errand on the wicked, who surprised
Lose their defence distracted and amazed.
    But patience is more oft the exercise
Of saints, the trial of their fortitude, [1]
Making them each his own deliverer,
And victor over all
That tyranny or fortune can inflict,
Either of these is in thy lot,
Samson, with might endued
Above the sons of men; but sight bereaved
May chance to number thee with those Whom patience finally must crown.
This idol's day hath been to thee no day of rest,
    Labouring thy mind
More than the working day thy hands,
And yet perhaps more trouble is behind.
For I descry this way
Some other tending, in his hand

---

[1] But patience is more oft the exercise / Of saints The Chorus's speech deals with the two kinds of fortitude (magnanimity and patience) from lines 1268–96. One may see in the tone of the earlier part a natural elation at the possibility that Samson may yet be capable of heroic action, and in the tone of what follows a sober acceptance of the likelihood that he may have to be content with heroic suffering. There is an irony which will not be apparent to the Danites until after Samson's death: that is, Samson's pulling down of the temple upon himself and the Philistines unites both kinds of fortitude; it is an action which is also a suffering.

A sceptre or quaint staff he bears,
Comes on amain, speed in his look.
By his habit I discern him now
A public officer, and now at hand.
His message will be short and voluble.

Off. Hebrews, the prisoner Samson here I seek.

Chor. His manacles remark him, there he sits.

Off. Samson, to thee our lords thus bid me say;
This day to Dagon is a solemn feast,
With sacrifices, triumph, pomp, and games;
Thy strength they know surpassing human rate,
And now some public proof thereof require
To honour this great feast, and great assembly;
Rise therefore with all speed and come along,
Where I will see thee heartened and fresh clad
To appear as fits before the illustrious lords.

Sam. Thou know'st I am an Hebrew, therefore tell them,
Our law forbids at their religious rites
My presence; for that cause I cannot come.

Off. This answer, be assured, will not content them.

Sam. Have they not sword-players, and every sort
Of gymnic artists, wrestlers, riders, runners,
Jugglers and dancers, antics, mummers, mimics,
But they must pick me out with shackles tired,
And over-laboured at their public mill,
To make them sport with blind activity?
Do they not seek occasion of new quarrels
On my refusal to distress me more,
Or make a game of my calamities?
Return the way thou cam'st, I will not come.

Off. Regard thyself, this will offend them highly.

Sam. Myself? my conscience and internal peace.
Can they think me so broken, so debased
With corporal servitude, that my mind ever
Will condescend to such absurd commands?
Although their drudge, to be their fool or jester,
And in my midst of sorrow and heart-grief
To show them feats, and play before their god,
The worst of all indignities, yet on me
Joined with extreme contempt? I will not come.

Off. My message was imposed on me with speed,
Brooks no delay: is this thy resolution?

Sam. So take it with what speed thy message needs.

Off. I am sorry what this stoutness will produce.

Sam. Perhaps thou shalt have cause to sorrow indeed.

Chor. Consider, Samson; matters now are strained
Up to the height, whether to hold or break;
He's gone, and who knows how he may report
Thy words by adding fuel to the flame?
Expect another message more imperious,
More lordly thundering than thou well wilt bear.

Sam. Shall I abuse this consecrated gift
Of strength, again returning with my hair
After my great transgression, so requite
Favour renewed, and add a greater sin
By prostituting holy things to idols;
A Nazarite in place abominable
Vaunting my strength in honour to their Dagon?
Besides, how vile, contemptible, ridiculous,
What act more execrably unclean, profane?

Chor. Yet with this strength thou serv'st the Philistines,
Idolatrous, uncircumcised, unclean.

Sam. Not in their idol-worship, but by labour
Honest and lawful to deserve my food
Of those who have me in their civil power.

Chor. Where the heart joins not, outward acts defile not.

Sam. Where outward force constrains, the sentence holds
But who constrains me to the temple of Dagon,
Not dragging? the Philistian lords command,
Commands are no constraints. If I obey them,
I do it freely; venturing to displease
God for the fear of man, and man prefer,
Set God behind: which in his jealousy
Shall never, unrepented, find forgiveness.
Yet that he may dispense with me or thee
Present in temples at idolatrous rites
For some important cause, thou need'st not doubt.

Chor. How thou wilt here come off surmounts my reach.

Sam. Be of good courage, I begin to feel
Some rousing motions in me which dispose
To something extraordinary my thoughts.
I with this messenger will go along,
Nothing to do, be sure, that may dishonour
Our law, or stain my vow of Nazarite.
If there be aught of presage in the mind,
This day will be remarkable in my life
By some great act, or of my days the last.

Chor. In time thou hast resolved, the man returns.

Off. Samson, this second message from our lords
To thee I am bid say. Art thou our slave,
Our captive, at the public mill our drudge,
And dar'st thou at our sending and command
Dispute thy coming? come without delay;
Or we shall find such engines to assail
And hamper thee, as thou shalt come of force,
Though thou wert firmlier fastened than a rock.

Sam. I could be well content to try their art,
Which to no few of them would prove pernicious.
Yet knowing their advantages too many,
Because they shall not trail me through their streets
Like a wild beast, I am content to go.
Masters' commands come with a power resistless
To such as owe them absolute subjection;
And for a life who will not change his purpose?
(So mutable are all the ways of men)
Yet this be sure, in nothing to comply
Scandalous or forbidden in our law.

Off. I praise thy resolution, doff these links:
By this compliance thou wilt win the lords
To favour, and perhaps to set thee free.

Sam. Brethren farewell, your company along
I will not wish, lest it perhaps offend them
To see me girt with friends; and how the sight
Of me as of a common enemy,
So dreaded once, may now exasperate them
I know not. Lords are lordliest in their wine;
And the well-feasted priest then soonest fired
With zeal, if aught religion seem concerned:
No less the people on their holydays
Impetuous, insolent, unquenchable;
Happen what may, of me expect to hear
Nothing dishonourable, impure, unworthy
Our God, our law, my nation, or myself,
The last of me or no I cannot warrant.

Chor. Go, and the holy one
Of Israel be thy guide
To what may serve his glory best, and spread his name
Great among the heathen round:
Send thee the angel of thy birth, to stand

Fast by thy side, who from thy father's field
Rode up in flames after his message told
Of thy conception, and be now a shield
Of fire; that spirit that first rushed on thee
In the camp of Dan
Be efficacious in thee now at need.
For never was from heaven imparted
Measure of strength so great to mortal seed,
As in thy wondrous actions hath been seen.
But wherefore comes old Manoa in such haste
With youthful steps? much livelier than erewhile
He seems: supposing here to find his son,
Or of him bringing to us some glad news?

Man. Peace with you brethren; my inducement hither
Was not at present here to find my son,
By order of the lords new parted hence
To come and play before them at their feast.
I heard all as I came, the city rings
And numbers thither flock, I had no will,
Lest I should see him forced to things unseemly.
But that which moved my coming now, was chiefly
To give ye part with me what hope I have
With good success to work his liberty.

Chor. That hope would much rejoice us to partake
With thee; say reverend sire, we thirst to hear.

Man. I have attempted one by one the lords
Either at home, or through the high street passing,
With supplication prone and father's tears
To accept of ransom for my son their prisoner,
Some much averse I found and wondrous harsh,
Contemptuous, proud, set on revenge and spite;
That part most reverenced Dagon and his priests,
Others more moderate seeming, but their aim
Private reward, for which both god and state
They easily would set to sale, a third
More generous far and civil, who confessed
They had enough revenged, having reduced
Their foe to misery beneath their fears,
The rest was magnanimity to remit,
If some convenient ransom were proposed. [1]
What noise or shout was that? it tore the sky.

Chor. Doubtless the people shouting to behold
Their once great dread, captive, and blind before them,
Or at some proof of strength before them shown.

Man. His ransom, if my whole inheritance
May compass it, shall willingly be paid
And numbered down: much rather I shall choose
To live the poorest in my tribe, than richest,
And he in that calamitous prison left.
No, I am fixed not to part hence without him.
For his redemption all my patrimony,
If need be, I am ready to forgo
And quit: not wanting him, I shall want nothing.

Chor. Fathers are wont to lay up for their sons,
Thou for thy son art bent to lay out all;
Sons wont to nurse their parents in old age,
Thou in old age car'st how to nurse thy son,
Made older than thy age through eyesight lost.

Man. It shall be my delight to tend his eyes,
And view him sitting in the house, ennobled
With all those high exploits by him achieved,
And on his shoulders waving down those locks,
That of a nation armed the strength contained:
And I persuade me God had not permitted

[1] Some much averse I found and wondrous harsh etc. Worden comments that after the Restoration some members of Parliament, "high-flying Anglicans among them, responded to pleas for leniency with bitter vindictiveness, others with personal opportunism, others still with heart-warming magnanimity. The stories told [by Ludlow and Lucy Hutchinson] are strikingly similar to Manoa's" ("Milton, Samson Agonistes, and the Restoration," 120).

His strength again to grown up with his hair
Garrisoned round about him like a camp
Of faithful soldiery, were not his purpose
To use him further yet in some great service,
Not to sit idle with so great a gift
Useless, and thence ridiculous about him.
And since his strength with eyesight was not lost,
God will restore him eyesight to his strength.

Chor. Thy hopes are not ill founded nor seem vain
Of his delivery, and thy joy thereon
Conceived, agreeable to a father's love,
In both which we, as next participate.[1]

Man. I know your friendly minds and—O what noise!
Mercy of heaven what hideous noise was that!
Horribly loud unlike the former shout.

Chor. Noise call you it or universal groan
As if the whole inhabitation perished,
Blood, death, and deathful deeds are in that noise,
Ruin, destruction at the utmost point.

Man. Of ruin indeed methought I heard the noise,[2]
O it continues, they have slain my son.

Chor. Thy son is rather slaying them, that outcry
From slaughter of one foe could not ascend.

Man. Some dismal accident it needs must be;
What shall we do, stay here or run and see?

Chor. Best keep together here, lest running thither
We unawares run into danger's mouth.
This evil on the Philistines is fall'n,
From whom could else a general cry be heard?
The sufferers then will scarce molest us here,
From other hands we need not much to fear.
What if his eyesight (for to Israel's God
Nothing is hard) by miracle restored,
He now be dealing dole among his foes,
And over heaps of slaughtered walk his way?

Man. That were a joy presumptuous to be thought.

Chor. Yet God hath wrought things as incredible
For his people of old; what hinders now?

Man. He can I know, but doubt to think he will;
Yet hope would fain subscribe, and tempts belief.
A little stay will bring some notice hither.

Chor. Of good or bad so great, of bad the sooner;
For evil news rides post, while good news baits.
And to our wish I see one hither speeding,
An Hebrew, as I guess, and of our tribe.

Messenger. O whither shall I run, or which way fly[3]
The sight of this so horrid spectacle
Which erst my eyes beheld and yet behold;
For dire imagination still pursues me.
But providence or instinct of nature seems,
Or reason though disturbed, and scarce consulted
To have guided me aright, I know not how,
To thee first reverend Manoa, and to these
My countrymen, whom here I knew remaining,
As at some distance from the place of horror,
So in the sad event too much concerned.

[1] as next in the sense of "next of kin" (as Danites).

[2] ruin the act of giving way and falling down, on the part of a building (OED ruin v I 1); for an interesting discussion of this word see Owen Barfield, Poetic Diction (London: Faber and Faber, 1952), 113–126.

[3] O whither shall I run etc. In relation to this speech, it is worth recalling what Milton writes in the Argument: "an Hebrew comes in haste confusedly at first; and afterward more distinctly relating the catastrophe."

Man. The accident was loud, and here before thee
With rueful cry, yet what it was we hear not,
No preface needs, thou seest we long to know.

Mess. It would burst forth, but I recover breath
And sense distract, to know well what I utter.

Man. Tell us the sum, the circumstance defer.

Mess. Gaza yet stands, but all her sons are fall'n,
All in a moment overwhelmed and fall'n.

Man. Sad, but thou know'st to Israelites not saddest
The desolation of a hostile city.

Mess. Feed on that first, there may in grief be surfeit.

Man. Relate by whom.

Mess. By Samson.
Man. That still lessens
The sorrow, and converts it nigh to joy.

Mess. Ah Manoa I refrain, too suddenly
To utter what will come at last too soon;
Lest evil tidings with too rude irruption
Hitting thy agèd ear should pierce too deep.

Man. Suspense in news is torture, speak them out.

Mess. Then take the worst in brief, Samson is dead.

Man. The worst indeed, O all my hope's defeated
To free him hence! but death who sets all free
Hath paid his ransom now and full discharge.
What windy joy this day had I conceived
Hopeful of his delivery, which now proves
Abortive as the first-born bloom of spring
Nipped with the lagging rear of winter's frost.
Yet ere I give the reins to grief, say first,
How died he? death to life is crown or shame.
All by him fell thou say'st, by whom fell he,
What glorious hand gave Samson his death's wound?

Mess. Unwounded of his enemies he fell

Man. Wearied with slaughter then or how? explain.

Mess. By his own hands.

Man. Self-violence? what cause
Brought him so soon at variance with himself
Among his foes?

Mess. Inevitable cause
At once both to destroy and be destroyed;
The edifice where all were met to see him
Upon their heads and on his own he pulled.

Man. O lastly over-strong against thyself!
A dreadful way thou took'st to thy revenge.
More than enough we know; but while things yet
Are in confusion, give us if thou canst,
Eye-witness of what first or last was done,
Relation more particular and distinct.

Mess. Occasions drew me early to this city,
And as the gates I entered with sunrise,
The morning trumpets festival proclaimed
Through each high street: little I had dispatched
When all abroad was rumoured that this day
Samson should be brought forth to show the people
Proof of his mighty strength in feats and games;
I sorrowed at his captive state, but minded
Not to be absent at that spectacle.
The building was a spacious theatre,
Half round on two main pillars vaulted high,
With seats where all the lords and each degree

Of sort, might sit in order to behold,
The other side was open, where the throng
On banks and scaffolds under sky might stand;
I among these aloof obscurely stood.
The feast and noon grew high, and sacrifice
Had filled their hearts with mirth, high cheer, and wine,
When to their sports they turned. Immediately
Was Samson as a public servant brought,
In their state livery clad; before him pipes
And timbrels, on each side went armèd guards,
Both horse and foot before him and behind
Archers, and slingers, cataphracts and spears. [1]
At sight of him the people with a shout
Rifted the air clamouring their god with praise,
Who had made their dreadful enemy their thrall.
He patient but undaunted where they led him,
Came to the place, and what was set before him
Which without help of eye might be assayed,
To heave, pull, draw, or break, he still performed
All with incredible, stupendious force,
None daring to appear antagonist.
At length for intermission sake they led him
Between the pillars; he his guide requested
(For so from such as nearer stood we heard)
As over-tired to let him lean awhile
With both his arms on those two massy pillars
That to the archèd roof gave main support.
He unsuspicious led him; which when Samson
Felt in his arms, with head a while inclined,
And eyes fast fixed he stood, as one who prayed,
Or some great matter in his mind revolved.
At last with head erect thus cried aloud,
Hitherto, lords, what your commands imposed
I have performed, as reason was, obeying,
Not without wonder or delight beheld.
Now of my own accord such other trial
I mean to show you of my strength, yet greater; [2]
As with amaze shall strike all who behold.
This uttered, straining all his nerves he bowed,
As with the force of winds and waters pent,
When mountains tremble, those two massy pillars
With horrible convulsion to and fro,
He tugged, he shook, till down they came and drew
The whole roof after them, with burst of thunder
Upon the heads of all who sat beneath,
Lords, ladies, captains, counsellors, or priests,
Their choice nobility and flower, not only
Of this but each Philistian city round
Met from all parts to solemnize this feast.
Samson with these immixed, inevitably
Pulled down the same destruction on himself;
The vulgar only scaped who stood without. [3]

Chor. O dearly-bought revenge, yet glorious!
Living or dying thou hast fulfilled
The work for which thou wast foretold
To Israel, and now li'st victorious
Among thy slain self-killed
Not willingly, but tangled in the fold,

[1] cataphracts soldiers in full armour (OED cataphract 2); spears spearmen.

[2] of my own accord The distinction between the inner voice and the promptings of the devices and desires of our own hearts is central to what has been called the crucial question in interpreting Samson Agonistes: whether Samson hurled down the pillars because he was divinely propelled or because he was self-motivated. There is more than one level of answer to the view that the words "of my own accord" represent an admission on Samson's part that he does not act by divine commission: (a) the phrase stands not in opposition to divine command but to Philistine command; (b) the phrase occurs in a speech in which Samson addresses the lords of Philistia; it should not therefore be treated as if it were omniscient author commentary. Samson is under no moral obligation of frankness toward his enemies; (c) at a deeper level than the one Samson intends the Philistines to understand, the verb "accord" means to "bring heart to heart" and therefore to reconcile oneself with another; in their hidden meaning the words refer to Samson's own individual empowerment through reconciliation with God. See Rudrum, Discerning the Spirit, 253–254.

[3] The vulgar only scaped who stood without Note that the common people escape slaughter; those who are killed belong to what historians of the early modern period call "the political nation," that is, those who have the wealth or position to exert political influence.

Of dire necessity, whose law in death conjoined
Thee with thy slaughtered foes in number more
Than all thy life had slain before.

Semichor. While their hearts were jocund and sublime,
Drunk with idolatry, drunk with wine,
And fat regorged of bulls and goats,
Chanting their idol, and preferring
Before our living dread who dwells
In Silo his bright sanctuary:
Among them he a spirit of frenzy sent,
Who hurt their minds,
And urged them on with mad desire
To call in haste for their destroyer;
They only set on sport and play
Unweetingly importuned
Their own destruction to come speedy upon them.
So fond are mortal men
Fall'n into wrath divine,
As their own ruin on themselves to invite,
Insensate left, or to sense reprobate,
And with blindness internal struck.

Semichor. But he though blind of sight,
Despised and thought extinguished quite,
With inward eyes illuminated
His fiery virtue roused
From under ashes into sudden flame,
And as an evening dragon came,
Assailant on the perchèd roosts,
And nests in order ranged
Of tame villatic fowl; but as an eagle
His cloudless thunder bolted on their heads.[2]
So virtue given for lost,
Depressed, and overthrown, as seemed,
Like that self-begotten bird
In the Arabian woods embossed,[3]
That no second knows nor third,
And lay erewhile a holocaust,
From out her ashy womb now teemed,
Revives, reflourishes, then vigorous most
When most unactive deemed,
And though her body die, her fame survives,
A secular bird ages of lives.[4]

Man. Come, come, no time for lamentation now,
Nor much more cause, Samson hath quit himself
Like Samson, and heroically hath finished
A life heroic, on his enemies
Fully revenged, hath left them years of mourning,
And lamentation to the sons of Caphtor[5]
Through all Philistian bounds. To Israel
Honour hath left, and freedom, let but them
Find courage to lay hold on this occasion,
To himself and father's house eternal fame;
And which is best and happiest yet, all this
With God not parted from him, as was feared,
But favouring and assisting to the end.
Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast, no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise, or blame, nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.
Let us go find the body where it lies
Soaked in his enemies' blood, and from the stream
With lavers pure, and cleansing herbs wash off
The clotted gore. I with what speed the while

[1] an evening dragon "not the fire-breathing, flying kind, but a large snake (OED 1), such as might enter a barnyard by stealth to prey on domestic fowl. Samson entered the temple like a cunning snake, but he struck the Philistines like an eagle" (JL).

[2] villatic fowl farmyard fowl.

[3] that self-begotten bird the Phoenix, which is unique (because there is only one living at any time) and an emblem of Christ because of its power of resurrection; the application of this image to Samson supports the arguments of those who see Samson as a "type" of Christ and the poem as a drama of regeneration; embossed imbosked, hidden in a wood (OED emboss v^2 1b, this place cited).

[4] secular living for an age or ages (OED secular a 6).

[5] the sons of Caphtor the Philistines, who had immigrated from Caphtor, thought to be Crete (JL).

(Gaza is not in plight to say us nay)
Will send for all my kindred, all my friends
To fetch him hence and solemnly attend
With silent obsequy and funeral train
Home to his father's house: there will I build him
A monument, and plant it round with shade
Of laurel ever green, and branching palm,
With all his trophies hung, and acts enrolled
In copious legend, or sweet lyric song.
Thither shall all the valiant youth resort,
And from his memory inflame their breasts
To matchless valour, and adventures high:
The virgins also shall on feastful days
Visit his tomb with flowers, only bewailing
His lot unfortunate in nuptial choice,
From whence captivity and loss of eyes.
Chor. All is best, though we oft doubt,
What the unsearchable dispose
Of highest wisdom brings about,
And ever best found in the close.
Oft he seems to hide his face,
But unexpectedly returns
And to his faithful champion hath in place
Bore witness gloriously; whence Gaza mourns
And all that band them to resist
His uncontrollable intent,
His servants he with new acquist
Of true experience from this great event
With peace and consolation hath dismissed,
And calm of mind all passion spent.

John Milton – Prose

Had Milton not published a line of verse, he would still hold a place in the canon of seventeenth-century writing by virtue of his prose. Milton was a major prose writer and a formidable polemicist, in Latin as well as English. He was also prolific (the modern scholarly edition of his complete prose occupies ten thick volumes), and wide-ranging in the subjects he addressed. Milton published numerous works of religious and political controversy (including defences of the regicide and of republicanism); he also tackled theology, reform of the divorce laws, educational theory, press censorship, grammar, logic, and the histories of Britain and Muscovia; in several pamphlets he wrote about himself. Written across thirty years of complex history, Milton's polemical works negotiate a shifting ideological landscape: his ideas are not static, nor even is his style (inimitable as it is). But at heart what unites all of Milton's polemic is his defence of liberties—religious, political, intellectual, personal, and civic.

The first of the three examples of Milton's prose below is the autobiographical preface to the second book of The Reason of Church Government Urged against Prelaty (dated 1641, but probably published in early 1642), one of the five anti-prelatical tracts Milton published in the early 1640s. Here Milton sets aside for a moment his arguments against church government by bishops and writes instead of his poetic ambitions, the intellectual training to which he has committed himself, and his reasons for entering the public sphere before completing "the full circle of my private studies."

The second selection is the complete text of Areopagitica (1644), Milton's response to a Parliamentary Order (June 1643) that banned the publication of any book that had not been licensed before publication: what Milton attacks is pre-publication censorship, not censorship in general. His main strategy is to link pre-publication licensing to its Laudian and ultimately Catholic antecedents, in effect accusing Parliament and the then-politically dominant Presbyterians with instituting a tyranny as egregious as the one they had fought to overthrow. (William Walwyn, Richard Overton, and Mary Howgill make the same charge in their attacks on the powers that in turn succeeded the Presbyterians, the New Model Army and Oliver Cromwell. For a text that sought to renew censorship after the Restoration, see Roger L'Estrange.) Areopagitica takes the form of an oration to Parliament: Milton's title invokes the Areopagite Discourse (ca. 355 B.C.E.) by Isocrates, who exhorted a return to the days when the Athenian court of the Areopagus (a kind of Supreme Court) was a model of virtue, wisdom, and responsibility. Milton might also expect his readers to remember that Paul delivered an oration on the Areopagus, the hill outside Athens that gave its name to the court that met there (Acts 17:19–34).

The final text is Of True Religion (1673), the last work Milton published in his lifetime and one of the many responses generated by Charles II's Declaration of Indulgence in 1672. The King had promised a measure of religious toleration in the Declaration of Breda (1660), but in the early years of his reign Parliament passed a series of statutes, collectively known as the Clarendon code, that made life very difficult for the large Nonconformist community. The Declaration of Indulgence offered to suspend penal laws on religious matters, and invited Nonconformists to apply for licenses permitting public worship; it also allowed Catholics freedom of worship in their homes. The King's principal aim was to initiate a softening of penalties on Catholicism: in the secret Treaty of Dover (1670) with Louis XIV of France, Charles promised the eventual announcement of his own conversion and the reestablishment of Catholicism in England. The Declaration however sparked a wave of "no popery" agitation, Parliament asserted its power in matters ecclesiastical, and the King was forced to withdraw it in 1673, though a bill was passed that eased restrictions on "his Majesty's subjects that are Dissenters in matters of Religion."

Milton likely wrote Of True Religion upon hearing that Parliament was considering some measure of toleration for dissenting Protestants. The pamphlet encourages support for the bill by opposing the Declaration and by making other conciliatory gestures to the Church of England; he takes care that his arguments for toleration, unlike the more general arguments from Christian liberty he had made in A Treatise of Civil Power (1659), do not apply to Catholics.

The Reason of Church Government

Preface to the Second Book

How happy were it for this frail, and as it may be truly called, mortal life of man, since all earthly things which have the name of good and convenient in our daily use are withal so cumbersome and full of trouble, if knowledge, yet which is the best and lightsomest possession of the mind were, as the common saying is, no burden, and that what it wanted of being a load to any part of the body, it did not with a heavy advantage overlay upon the spirit. For not to speak of that knowledge that rests in the contemplation of natural causes and dimensions, which must needs be a lower wisdom, as the object is low, certain it is that he who hath obtained in more than the scantiest measure to know anything distinctly of God, and of his true worship; and what is infallibly good and happy in the state of man's life, what in itself evil and miserable, though vulgarly not so esteemed; he that hath obtained to know this, the only high valuable wisdom indeed, remembering also that God, even to a strictness, requires the improvement of these his entrusted gifts, cannot but sustain a sorer burden of mind, and more pressing, than any supportable toil or weight which the body can labour under, how and in what manner he shall dispose and employ those sums of knowledge and illumination, which God hath sent him into this world to trade with.

And that which aggravates the burden more is, that having received amongst his allotted parcels certain precious truths, of such an orient lustre as no diamond can equal, which nevertheless he has in charge to put off at any cheap rate, yea, for nothing to them that will, the great merchants of this world, fearing that this course would soon discover and disgrace the false glitter of their deceitful wares wherewith they abuse the people, like poor Indians with beads and glasses, practise by all means how they may suppress the vending of such rarities, and at such a cheapness as would undo them, and turn their trash upon their hands. Therefore, by gratifying the corrupt desires of men in fleshly doctrines, they stir them up to persecute with hatred and contempt all those that seek to bear themselves uprightly in this their spiritual factory:[1] which they foreseeing, though they cannot but testify of truth, and the excellency of that heavenly traffic which they bring, against what opposition or danger soever, yet needs must it sit heavily upon their spirits, that being in God's prime intention and their own, selected heralds of peace and dispensers of treasure inestimable without price to them that have no pence, they find in the discharge of their commission that they are made the greatest variance and offence, a very sword and fire both in house and city over the whole earth.

This is that which the sad prophet Jeremiah laments: "Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me, a man of strife and contention" [Jeremiah 15:10]. And although divine inspiration must certainly have been sweet to those ancient prophets, yet the irksomeness of that truth which they brought was so unpleasant unto them, that everywhere they call it a burden. Yea, that mysterious book of Revelation, which the great evangelist was bid to eat, as it had been some eye-brightening electuary of knowledge and foresight, thought it were sweet in his mouth and in the learning, it was bitter in his belly, bitter in the denouncing.[1] Nor was this hid from the wise poet Sophocles, who in that place of his tragedy where Tiresias is called to resolve King Oedipus in a matter which he knew would be grievous, brings him in bemoaning his lot, that he knew more than other men.[2] For surely to every good and peaceable man, it must in nature needs be a hateful thing to be the displeaser and molester of thousands; much better would it like him doubtless to be the messenger of gladness and contentment, which is his chief intended business to all mankind, but that they resist and oppose their own true happiness. But when God commands to take the trumpet, and blow a dolorous or a jarring blast, it lies not in man's will what he shall say, or what he shall conceal. If he shall think to be silent as Jeremiah did, because of the reproach and derision he met with daily, "And all his familiar friends watched for his halting," to be revenged on him for speaking the truth, he would be forced to confess as he confessed: "His word was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones; I was weary with forbearing, and could not stay" [Jeremiah 20:8–10]. Which might teach these times not suddenly to condemn all things that are sharply spoken or vehemently written as proceeding out of stomach, virulence, and ill-nature; but to consider rather that, if the prelates have leave to say the worst that can be said, or do the worst that can be done, while they strive to keep to themselves, to their great pleasure and commodity, those things which they ought to render up, no man can be justly offended with him that shall endeavour to impart and bestow, without any gain to himself, those sharp but saving words which would be a terror and a torment in him to keep back.

[1] factory trading post.

For me, I have determined to lay as the best treasure and solace of a good old age, if God vouchsafe it me, the honest liberty of free speech from my youth, where I shall think it available in so dear a concernment as the Church's good. For if I be, either by disposition or what other cause, too inquisitive, or suspicious of myself and mine own doings, who can help it? But this I foresee, that should the Church be brought under heavy oppression, and God have given me ability the while to reason against that man that should be the author of so foul a deed; or should she, by blessing from above on the industry and courage of faithful men, change this her distracted estate into better days, without the least furtherance or contribution of those few talents which God at that present had lent me;[3] I foresee what stories I should hear within myself, all my life after, of discourage and reproach: "Timorous and ungrateful, the Church of God is now again at the foot of her insulting enemies, and thou bewailest. What matters it for thee, or thy bewailing? When time was, thou couldst not find a syllable of all that thou hast read, or studied, to utter in her behalf. Yet ease and leisure was given thee for thy retired thoughts, out of the sweat of other men. Thou hast the diligence, the parts, the language of a man, if a vain subject were to be adorned or beautified; but when the cause of God and his Church was to be pleaded, for which purpose that tongue was given thee which thou hast, God listened if he could hear thy voice among his zealous servants, but thou wert dumb as a beast; from henceforward be that which thine own brutish silence hath made thee."

[1] mysterious book See Revelation 10:9–10; electuary a medicine made palatable by being mixed with honey or syrup.

[2] Sophocles, Oedipus the King, ll. 316–17.

[3] those few talents See the parable of the talents in Matthew 25:14–31; Milton also invokes the parable in his Sonnet 19.

Or else I should have heard on the other ear: "Slothful, and ever to be set light by, the Church hath now overcome her late distresses after the unwearied labours of many her true servants that stood up in her defence; thou also wouldst take upon thee to share amongst them of their joy: but wherefore thou? Where canst thou show any word or deed of thine which might have hastened her peace? Whatever thou dost now talk, or write, or look, is the alms of other men's active prudence and zeal. Dare not now to say or do anything better than thy former sloth and infancy; or if thou darest, thou dost impudently to make a thrifty purchase of boldness to thyself out of the painful merits of other men; what before was thy sin is now thy duty, to be abject and worthless."

These, and such like lessons as these, I know would have been my matins duly, and my evensong.[1] But now by this little diligence, mark what a privilege, I have gained with good men and saints, to claim my right of lamenting the tribulations of the Church, if she should suffer, when others that have ventured nothing for her sake have not the honour to be admitted mourners. But if she lift up her drooping head and prosper, among those that have something more than wished her welfare, I have my charter and freehold of rejoicing to me and my heirs. Concerning therefore this wayward subject against prelaty, the touching whereof is so distasteful and disquietous to a number of men, as by what hath been said I may deserve of charitable readers to be credited, that neither envy nor gall hath entered me upon this controversy, but the enforcement of conscience only, and a preventive fear lest the omitting of this duty should be against me, when I would store up to myself the good provision of peaceful hours: so, lest it be still imputed to me, as I have found it hath been, that some self-pleasing humour of vain-glory hath incited me to contest with men of high estimation, now while green years are upon my head; from this needless surmisal I shall hope to dissuade the intelligent and equal auditor, if I can but say successfully that which in this exigent behooves me; although I would be heard only, if it might be, by the elegant and learned reader, to whom principally for a while I shall beg leave I may address myself.

To him it will be no new thing, though I tell him that if I hunted after praise by the ostentation of wit and learning, I should not write thus out of mine own season when I have neither yet completed to my mind the full circle of my private studies, although I complain not of any insufficiency to the matter in hand; or were I ready to my wishes, it were a folly to commit anything elaborately composed to the careless and interrupted listening of these tumultuous times. Next, if I were wise only to my own ends, I would certainly take such a subject as of itself might catch applause, whereas this hath all the disadvantages on the contrary; and such a subject as the publishing whereof might be delayed at pleasure, and time enough to pencil it over with all the curious touches of art, even to the perfection of a faultless picture; whenas in this argument the not deferring is of great moment to the good speeding, that, if solidity have leisure to do her office, art cannot have much. Lastly, I should not choose this manner of writing, wherein knowing myself inferior to myself, led by the genial power of nature to another task, I have the use, as I may account, but of my left hand.

And though I shall be foolish in saying more to this purpose, yet, since it will be such a folly wisest men go about to commit, having only confessed and so committed, I may trust with more reason, because with more folly, to have courteous pardon.

[1] matins…evensong morning and evening prayers (in both the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church, though Milton's meaning is probably generic).

For although a poet, soaring in the high region of his fancies, with his garland and singing robes about him, might, without apology, speak more of himself than I mean to do; yet for me sitting here below in the cool element of prose, a mortal thing among many readers of no empyreal conceit, to venture and divulge unusual things of myself, I shall petition to the gentler sort, it may not be envy to me.

I must say, therefore, that after I had for my first years, by the ceaseless diligence and care of my father (whom God recompense!), been exercised to the tongues and some sciences, as my age would suffer, by sundry masters and teachers, both at home and at the schools, it was found that whether aught was imposed me by them that had the overlooking, or betaken to of mine own choice in English, or other tongue, prosing or versing, but chiefly by this latter, the style, by certain vital signs it had, was likely to live. But much latelier in the private academies of Italy, whither I was favoured to resort, perceiving that some trifles which I had in memory, composed at under twenty or thereabout (for the manner is, that everyone must give some proof of his wit and reading there), met with acceptance above what was looked for; and other things which I had shifted in scarcity of books and conveniences to patch up amongst them were received with written encomiums,[1] which the Italian is not forward to bestow on men of this side the Alps; I began thus far to assent both to them and divers of my friends here at home, and not less to an inward prompting which now grew daily upon me, that by labour and intense study (which I take to be my portion in this life), joined with the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to aftertimes, as they should not willingly let it die.

These thoughts at once possessed me, and these other; that if I were certain to write as men buy leases, for three lives and downward, there ought no regard be sooner had than to God's glory, by the honour and instruction of my country. For which cause, and not only for that I knew it would be hard to arrive at the second rank among the Latins, I applied myself to that resolution, which Ariosto followed against the persuasions of Bembo,[2] to fix all the industry and art I could unite to the adorning of my native tongue; not to make verbal curiosities the end (that were a toilsome vanity), but to be an interpreter and relater of the best and sagest things among mine own citizens throughout this island in the mother dialect. That, what the greatest and choicest wits of Athens, Rome, or modern Italy, and those Hebrews of old did for their country, I, in my proportion, with this over and above, of being a Christian, might do for mine; not caring to be once named abroad, though perhaps I could attain to that, but content with these British islands as my world; whose fortune hath hitherto been that, if the Athenians, as some say, made their small deeds great and renowned by their eloquent writers, England hath had her noble achievements made small by the unskillful handling of monks and mechanics.

Time serves not now, and perhaps I might seem too profuse, to give any certain account of what the mind at home in the spacious circuits of her musing hath liberty to propose to herself, though of highest hope and hardest attempting; whether that epic form whereof the two poems of Homer, and those other two of Virgil and Tasso,[3] are a diffuse, and the book of Job a brief model: or whether the rules of Aristotle herein are strictly to be kept, or nature to be followed, which in them that know art, and use judgment, is no transgression, but an enriching of art; and lastly, what king or knight, before the conquest, might be chosen in whom to lay the pattern of a Christian hero. And as Tasso gave to a prince of Italy his choice whether he would command him to write of Godfrey's expedition against the Infidels, or Belisarius against the Goths, or Charlemain against the Lombards; if to the instinct of nature and the emboldening of art aught may be trusted, and that there be nothing adverse in our climate,[1] or the fate of this age, it haply would be no rashness, from an equal diligence and inclination, to present the like offer in our own ancient stories. Or whether those dramatic constitutions, wherein Sophocles and Euripides reign, shall be found more doctrinal and exemplary to a nation.

[1] encomiums poems of praise; five from Milton's Italian friends were published with his Poems in 1645.

[2] Ariosto...Bembo Pietro Bembo (1470–1547) reputedly advised Ludovico Ariosto (1474–1533) to write his epic Orlando Furioso in Latin rather than Italian; Ariosto declined, claiming that he preferred to be first-rate in his native tongue rather than second-rate among the Latin poets.

[3] Tasso Torquato Tasso (1544–1595), Italian poet whose work greatly influenced English writers, author of the epic Gerusalemme Liberata (1580–1581), translated by Edward Fairfax as Jerusalem Delivered (1600).

The scripture also affords us a divine pastoral drama in the Song of Solomon, consisting of two persons and a double chorus, as Origen rightly judges.[2] And the Apocalypse of St John is the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes and acts with a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies: and this my opinion the grave authority of Paraeus, commenting that book, is sufficient to confirm.[3] Or if occasion shall lead, to imitate those magnific odes and hymns, wherein Pindarus and Callimachus are in most things worthy, some others in their frame judicious, in their matter most and end faulty. But those frequent songs throughout the law and prophets beyond all these, not in their divine argument alone, but in the very critical art of composition, may be easily made appear over all the kinds of lyric poesy to be incomparable.

These abilities, wheresoever they be found, are the inspired gift of God, rarely bestowed, but yet to some (though most abuse) in every nation; and are of power, beside the office of a pulpit, to imbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue and public civility, to allay the perturbations of the mind, and set the affections in right tune; to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God's almightiness, and what he works, and what he suffers to be wrought with high providence in his Church; to sing victorious agonies of martyrs and saints, the deeds and triumphs of just and pious nations, doing valiantly through faith against the enemies of Christ; to deplore the general relapses of kingdoms and states from justice and God's true worship.

Lastly, whatsoever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable or grave, whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without, or the wily subtleties and refluxes of man's thoughts from within; all these things with a solid and treatable smoothness to paint out and describe. Teaching over the whole book of sanctity and virtue, through all the instances of example, with such delight to those especially of soft and delicious temper, who will not so much as look upon truth herself, unless they see her elegantly dressed; that whereas the paths of honesty and good life appear now rugged and difficult, though they be indeed easy and pleasant, they will then appear to all men both easy and pleasant, though they were rugged and difficult indeed. And what a benefit this would be to our youth and gentry, may be soon guessed by what we know of the corruption and bane which they suck in daily from the writings and interludes of libidinous and ignorant poetasters; who, having scarce ever heard of that which is the main consistence of a true poem, the choice of such persons as they ought to introduce, and what is moral and decent to each one, do for the most part lay up vicious principles in sweet pills to be swallowed down, and make the taste of virtuous documents harsh and sour.

[1] climate Milton expresses his fear that the English climate was inimical to the artistic intellect in Paradise Lost 9.44–45.

[2] Origen one of the most influential early Christian theologians (d. 254).

[3] Paraeus the biblical commentator David Paraeus (1548–1622).

But because the spirit of man cannot demean itself lively in this body, without some recreating intermission of labour and serious things, it were happy for the commonwealth if our magistrates, as in those famous governments of old, would take into their care not only the deciding of our contentious law-cases and brawls but the managing of our public sports and festival pastimes; that they might be, not such as were authorized a while since,[1] the provocations of drunkenness and lust, but such as may inure and harden our bodies by martial exercises to all warlike skill and performance; and may civilize, adorn, and make discreet our minds by the learned and affable meeting of frequent academies, and the procurement of wise and artful recitations, sweetened with eloquent and graceful enticements to the love and practice of justice, temperance, and fortitude, instructing and bettering the nation at all opportunities, that the call of wisdom and virtue may be heard everywhere, as Solomon saith: "She crieth without, she uttereth her voice in the streets, in the top of high places, in the chief concourse, and in the openings of the gates" [Proverbs 1:20–21; 8:2–3]. Whether this may not be not only in pulpits but after another persuasive method, at set and solemn paneguries, in theatres, porches,[2] or what other place or way may win most upon the people to receive at once both recreation and instruction, let them in authority consult.

The thing which I had to say, and those intentions which have lived within me ever since I could conceive myself anything worth to my country, I return to crave excuse that urgent reason hath plucked from me, by an abortive and foredated discovery. And the accomplishment of them lies not but in a power above man's to promise; but that none hath by more studious ways endeavoured, and with more unwearied spirit that none shall, that I dare almost aver of myself, as far as life and free leisure will extend; and that the land had once enfranchised herself from this impertinent yoke of prelaty, under whose inquisitorious and tyrannical duncery no free and splendid wit can flourish.

Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader, that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him toward the payment of what I am now indebted, as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth, or the vapours of wine; like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amorist, or the trencher fury of a rhyming parasite; nor to be obtained by the invocation of Dame Memory and her siren daughters; but by devout prayer to that eternal Spirit who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim with the hallowed fire of his altar to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases:[3] to this must be added industrious and select reading, steady observation, insight into all seemly and generous arts and affairs; till which in some measure be compassed, at mine own peril and cost, I refuse not to sustain this expectation from as many as are not loath to hazard so much credulity upon the best pledges that I can give them.

Although it nothing content me to have disclosed thus much beforehand, but that I trust hereby to make it manifest with what small willingness I endure to interrupt the pursuit of no less hopes than these, and leave a calm and pleasing solitariness, fed with cheerful and confident thoughts, to embark in a troubled sea of noises and hoarse disputes, put from beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies, to come into the dim reflection of hollow antiquities sold by the seeming bulk, and there be fain to club quotations with men whose learning and belief lies in marginal stuffings; who, when they have, like good sumpters,[1] laid ye down their horse-loads of citations and fathers at your door with a rhapsody of who and who were bishops here or there, ye may take off their pack-saddles, their day's work is done, and episcopacy, as they think, stoutly vindicated. Let any gentle apprehension that can distinguish learned pains from unlearned drudgery, imagine what pleasure or profoundness can be in this, or what honour to deal against such adversaries.

[1] such as were authorized referring to the Book of Sports, issued by James I in 1618 and re-issued by Charles I in 1633, which sought to combat Puritan sabbatarianism by authorizing the performance on Sundays and other holidays of such traditional pastimes as dancing around May poles, archery, and morris dancing.

[2] paneguries public assemblies during religious festivals; porches probably church porches or side-chapels.

[3] hallowed fire See Isaiah 6:1–7.

But were it the meanest under-service, if God by his secretary conscience enjoin it, it were sad for me if I should draw back; for me especially, now when all men offer their aid to help, ease, and lighten the difficult labours of the Church, to whose service, by the intentions of my parents and friends, I was destined of a child, and in mine own resolutions: till coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the Church, that he who would take orders must subscribe slave, and take an oath withal,[2] which unless he took with a conscience that would retch, he must either straight perjure, or split his faith; I thought it better to prefer a blameless silence before the sacred office of speaking, bought and begun with servitude and forswearing. Howsoever thus Church-outed by the prelates, hence may appear the right I have to meddle in these matters, as before the necessity and constraint appeared.

Areopagitica: A Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, to the Parliament of England

This is true Liberty, when free born men
Having to advise the public may speak free,
Which he who can, and will, deserves high praise,
Who neither can nor will, may hold his peace;
What can be juster in a State than this?
Euripedes, The Suppliants

They who to states and governors of the Commonwealth direct their speech, High Court of Parliament, or, wanting such access in a private condition, write that which they foresee may advance the public good; I suppose them, as at the beginning of no mean endeavour, not a little altered and moved inwardly in their minds: some with doubt of what will be the success, others with fear of what will be the censure; some with hope, others with confidence of what they have to speak. And me perhaps each of these dispositions, as the subject was whereon I entered, may have at other times variously affected;[3] and likely might in these foremost expressions now also disclose which of them swayed most, but that the very attempt of this address thus made, and the thought of whom it hath recourse to, hath got the power within me to a passion, far more welcome than incidental to a preface.

Which though I stay not to confess ere any ask, I shall be blameless, if it be no other than the joy and gratulation which it brings to all who wish and promote their country's liberty; whereof this whole discourse proposed will be a certain testimony, if not a trophy. For this is not the liberty which we can hope, that no grievance ever should arise in the Commonwealth—that let no man in this world expect; but when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty attained that wise men look for. To which if I now manifest by the very sound of this which I shall utter, that we are already in good part arrived, and yet from such a steep disadvantage of tyranny and superstition grounded into our principles as was beyond the manhood of a Roman recovery, it will be attributed first, as is most due, to the strong assistance of God our deliverer, next to your faithful guidance and undaunted wisdom, Lords and Commons of England. Neither is it in God's esteem the diminution of his glory, when honourable things are spoken of good men and worthy magistrates; which if I now first should begin to do, after so fair a progress of your laudable deeds, and such a long obligement upon the whole realm to your indefatigable virtues, I might be justly reckoned among the tardiest, and the unwillingest of them that praise ye.

[1] sumpters drivers of pack-horses (OED).

[2] take an oath A candidate for ordination had to swear allegiance to the King and subscribe to the Book of Common Prayer, its thirty-nine articles of belief, and the hierarchical government of the Church of England.

[3] other times Milton had published seven prose works before Areopagitica.

Nevertheless there being three principal things, without which all praising is but courtship and flattery: First, when that only is praised which is solidly worth praise: next, when greatest likelihoods are brought that such things are truly and really in those persons to whom they are ascribed: the other, when he who praises, by showing that such his actual persuasion is of whom he writes, can demonstrate that he flatters not; the former two of these I have heretofore endeavoured, rescuing the employment from him who went about to impair your merits with a trivial and malignant encomium;[1] the latter as belonging chiefly to mine own acquittal, that whom I so extolled I did not flatter, hath been reserved opportunely to this occasion.

For he who freely magnifies what hath been nobly done, and fears not to declare as freely what might be done better, gives ye the best covenant of his fidelity; and that his loyalist affection and his hope waits on your proceedings. His highest praising is not flattery, and his plainest advice is a kind of praising. For though I should affirm and hold by argument, that it would fare better with truth, with learning and the Commonwealth, if one of your published Orders, which I should name, were called in; yet at the same time it could not but much redound to the lustre of your mild and equal government, whenas private persons are hereby animated to think ye better pleased with public advice, than other statists have been delighted heretofore with public flattery. And men will then see what difference there is between the magnanimity of a triennial Parliament, and that jealous haughtiness of prelates and Cabin Counsellors that usurped of late, whenas they shall observe ye in the midst of your victories and successes more gently brooking written exceptions against a voted Order than other Courts, which had produced nothing worth memory but the weak ostentation of wealth, would have endured the least signified dislike at any sudden Proclamation.

If I should thus far presume upon the meek demeanour of your civil and gentle greatness, Lords and Commons, as what your published Order hath directly said, that to gainsay, I might defend myself with ease, if any should accuse me of being new or insolent, did they but know how much better I find ye esteem it to imitate the old and elegant humanity of Greece, than the barbaric pride of a Hunnish and Norwegian stateliness. And out of those ages, to whose polite wisdom and letters we owe that we are not yet Goths and Jutlanders, I could name him who from his private house wrote that discourse to the Parliament of Athens, that persuades them to change the form of democracy which was then established.[2] Such honour was done in those days to men who professed the study of wisdom and eloquence, not only in their own country, but in other lands, that cities and signiories heard them gladly, and with great respect, if they had aught in public to admonish the state. Thus did Dion Prusaeus, a stranger and a private orator, counsel the Rhodians against a former edict;[1] and I abound with other like examples, which to set here would be superfluous.

[1] from him Bishop Joseph Hall, whose Humble Remonstrance (1641) sparked the Smectymnuan controversy, to which Milton contributed Animadversions (1641) and Apology against a Pamphlet (1642).

[2] him Isocrates (436–338 B.C.E.), whose Areopagitic Discourse provided a formal model for Areopagitica.

But if from the industry of a life wholly dedicated to studious labours, and those natural endowments haply not the worse for two and fifty degrees of northern latitude, so much must be derogated, as to count me not equal to any of those who had this privilege, I would obtain to be thought not so inferior, as yourselves are superior to the most of them who received their counsel: and how far you excel them, be assured, Lords and Commons, there can no greater testimony appear, than when your prudent spirit acknowledges and obeys the voice of reason from what quarter soever it be heard speaking; and renders ye as willing to repeal any Act of your own setting forth, as any set forth by your predecessors.

If ye be thus resolved, as it were injury to think ye were not, I know not what should withhold me from presenting ye with a fit instance wherein to show both that love of truth which ye eminently profess, and that uprightness of your judgment which is not wont to be partial to yourselves; by judging over again that Order which ye have ordained to regulate Printing: that no book, pamphlet, or paper shall be henceforth printed, unless the same be first approved and licensed by such, or at least one of such, as shall thereto be appointed. For that part which preserves justly every man's copy to himself, or provides for the poor, I touch not, only wish they be not made pretences to abuse and persecute honest and painful men, who offend not in either of these particulars. But that other clause of Licensing Books, which we thought had died with his brother quadragesimal and matrimonial when the prelates expired,[2] I shall now attend with such a homily, as shall lay before ye, first the inventors of it to be those whom ye will be loath to own; next what is to be thought in general of reading, whatever sort the books be; and that this Order avails nothing to the suppressing of scandalous, seditious, and libellous books, which were mainly intended to be suppressed. Last, that it will be primely to the discouragement of all learning, and the stop of Truth, not only by disexercising and blunting our abilities in what we know already, but by hindering and cropping the discovery that might be yet further made both in religious and civil Wisdom.

I deny not, but that it is of greatest concernment in the Church and Commonwealth to have a vigilant eye how books demean themselves as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors. For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragon's teeth; and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men.[3] And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book. Who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. 'Tis true, no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse.

[1] Dion Prusaeus Greek rhetorician (d. ca. 117 C.E.) famous as a spokesman for republican ideals in Rome.

[2] quadragesimal pertaining to Lent and referring to dispensations from dietary restrictions given by bishops, who also had the power to dispense with certain restrictions governing marriage licenses.

[3] dragon's teeth In Greek mythology, the teeth of a dragon slain by Cadmus bred armed men when sown.

We should be wary therefore what persecutions we raise against the living labours of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom, and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre; whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at that ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself, slays an immortality rather than a life. But lest I should be condemned of introducing licence, while I oppose licensing, I refuse not the pains to be so much historical, as will serve to show what hath been done by ancient and famous commonwealths against this disorder, till the very time that this project of licensing crept out of the inquisition, was catched up by our prelates, and hath caught some of our presbyters.

In Athens, where books and wits were ever busier than in any other part of Greece, I find but only two sorts of writings which the magistrate cared to take notice of; those either blasphemous and atheistical, or libellous. Thus the books of Protagoras were by the judges of Areopagus commanded to be burnt, and himself banished the territory for a discourse begun with his confessing not to know 'whether there were gods, or whether not.' And against defaming, it was agreed that none should be traduced by name, as was the manner of Vetus Comoedia,[1] whereby we may guess how they censured libelling. And this course was quick enough, as Cicero writes, to quell both the desperate wits of other atheists, and the open way of defaming, as the event showed. Of other sects and opinions, though tending to voluptuousness, and the denying of Divine Providence, they took no heed.

Therefore we do not read that either Epicurus, or that libertine school of Cyrene, or what the Cynic impudence uttered, was ever questioned by the laws. Neither is it recorded that the writings of those old comedians were suppressed, though the acting of them were forbid; and that Plato commended the reading of Aristophanes, the loosest of them all, to his royal scholar Dionysius, is commonly known, and may be excused, if holy Chrysostom,[2] as is reported, nightly studied so much the same author and had the art to cleanse a scurrilous vehemence into the style of a rousing sermon.

That other leading city of Greece, Lacedaemon, considering that Lycurgus their lawgiver was so addicted to elegant learning, as to have been the first that brought out of Ionia the scattered works of Homer, and sent the poet Thales from Crete to prepare and mollify the Spartan surliness with his smooth songs and odes, the better to plant among them law and civility, it is to be wondered how museless and unbookish they were, minding nought but the feats of war. There needed no licensing of books among them, for they disliked all but their own laconic apothegms, and took a slight occasion to chase Archilochus out of their city, perhaps for composing in a higher strain than their own soldierly ballads and roundels could reach to. Or if it were for his broad verses, they were not therein so cautious but they were as dissolute in their promiscuous conversing; whence Euripides affirms in Andromache, that their women were all unchaste. Thus much may give us light after what sort of books were prohibited among the Greeks.

The Romans also, for many ages trained up only to a military roughness resembling most the Lacedaemonian guise, knew of learning little but what their twelve Tables, and the Pontific College with their augurs and flamens taught them in religion and law,[1] so unacquainted with other learning, that when Carneades and Critolaus, with the Stoic Diogenes coming ambassadors to Rome, took thereby occasion to give the city a taste of their philosophy, they were suspected for seducers by no less a man than Cato the Censor, who moved it in the Senate to dismiss them speedily, and to banish all such Attic babblers out of Italy. But Scipio and others of the noblest senators withstood him and his old Sabine austerity; honoured and admired the men; and the censor himself at last, in his old age, fell to the study of what whereof before he was so scrupulous. And yet at the same time, Naevius and Plautus, the first Latin comedians, had filled the city with all the borrowed scenes of Menander and Philemon. Then began to be considered there also what was to be done to libellous books and authors; for Naevius was quickly cast into prison for his unbridled pen, and released by the tribunes upon his recantation; we read also that libels were burnt, and the makers punished by Augustus. The like severity, no doubt, was used, if aught were impiously written against their esteemed gods. Except in these two points, how the world went in books, the magistrate kept no reckoning.

[1] Vetus Comoedia the "Old Comedy" of ancient Greece, characterized by virulent personal satire.

[2] Chrysostom St. John Chrysostom (ca. 347–407), one of the most influential of the Greek Church Fathers.

And therefore Lucretius without impeachment versifies his Epicurism to Memmius, and had the honour to be set forth the second time by Cicero, so great a father of the commonwealth; although himself disputes against that opinion in his own writings. Nor was the satirical sharpness or naked plainness of Lucilius, or Catullus, or Flaccus, by any order prohibited. And for matters of state, the story of Titus Livius, though it extolled that part which Pompey held, was not therefore suppressed by Octavius Caesar of the other faction. But that Naso was by him banished in his old age,[2] for the wanton poems of his youth, was but a mere covert of state over some secret cause: and besides, the books were neither banished nor called in. From hence we shall meet with little else but tyranny in the Roman empire, that we may not marvel, if not so often bad as good books were silenced. I shall therefore deem to have been large enough, in producing what among the ancients was punishable to write; save only which, all other arguments were free to treat on.

By this time the emperors were become Christians, whose discipline in this point I do not find to have been more severe than what was formerly in practice. The books of those whom they took to be grand heretics were examined, refuted, and condemned in the general Councils; and not till then were prohibited, or burnt, by authority of the emperor. As for the writings of heathen authors, unless they were plain invectives against Christianity, as those of Porphyrius and Proclus, they met with no interdict that can be cited, till about the year 400, in a Carthaginian Council, wherein bishops themselves were forbid to read the books of Gentiles, but heresies they might read: while others long before them, on the contrary, scrupled more the books of heretics than of Gentiles. And that the primitive Councils and bishops were wont only to declare what books were not commendable, passing no further, but leaving it to each one's conscience to read or to lay by, till after the year 800, is observed already by Padre Paolo, the great unmasker of the Trentine Council.[3]

After which time the Popes of Rome, engrossing what they pleased of political rule into their own hands, extended their dominion over men's eyes, as they had before over their judgments, burning and prohibiting to be read what they fancied not; yet sparing in their censures, and the books not many which they so dealt with: till Martin V, by his bull, not only prohibited, but was the first that excommunicated the reading of heretical books; for about that time Wycliffe and Huss, growing terrible, were they who first drove the Papal Court to a stricter policy of prohibiting.[1] Which course Leo X and his successors followed, until the Council of Trent and the Spanish Inquisition engendering together brought forth, or perfected, those Catalogues and expurging Indexes, that rake through the entrails of many an old good author, with a violation worse than any could be offered to his tomb. Nor did they stay in matters heretical, but any subject that was not to their palate, they either condemned in a Prohibition, or had it straight into the new Purgatory of an Index.

[1] twelve Tables the basic texts of the Roman legal code; Pontific College supreme ecclesiastical authority of ancient Rome; augurs Roman priests responsible for reading omens; flamens Roman priests responsible for maintaining the sacrificial fires.

[2] Naso Ovid, banished from Rome to a town on the Black Sea at the age of 43; the true cause of his exile remains unknown.

[3] Padre Paolo Paolo Servita (Pietro Sarpi); his influential History of the Council of Trent (1619) cast a sceptical eye on the Council of Trent (1545-1563), which affirmed Roman Catholic doctrine against the challenge posed by the Reformation.

To fill up the measure of encroachment, their last invention was to ordain that no book, pamphlet, or paper should be printed (as if St. Peter had bequeathed them the keys of the press also out of Paradise) unless it were approved and licensed under the hands of two or three glutton friars. For example:[2]

> Let the Chancellor Cini be pleased to see if in this present work be contained ought that may withstand the printing
> Vincent Rabbatta, Vicar of Florence
> I have seen this present work, and find nothing athwart the catholic faith and good manners: In witnesse whereof I have given, &c.
> Nicolò Cini, Chancellor of Florence
> Attending the precedent relation, it is allowed that this present work of Davanzati may be printed,
> Vincent Rabbatta, &c.
> It may be printed, July 15.
> Friar Simon Mompei d'Amelia, Chancellor of the holy office in Florence

Sure they have a conceit, if he of the bottomless pit had not long since broke prison, that this quadruple exorcism would bar him down. I fear their next design will be to get into their custody the licensing of that which they say Claudius intended,[3] but went not through with. Vouchsafe to see another of their forms the Roman stamp:

> Imprimatur, if it seem good to the reverend master of the holy Palace,
> Belcastro, Vicegerent
> Imprimatur
> Friar Nicolò Rodolphi, master of the holy Palace

Sometimes five Imprimaturs are seen together dialogue-wise in the piazza of one title-page, complimenting and ducking each to other with their shaven reverences, whether the author, who stands by in perplexity at the foot of his epistle, shall to the press or to the sponge. These are the pretty responsories, these are the dear antiphonies, that so bewitched of late our Prelates and their chaplains with the goodly echo they made; and besotted us to the gay imitation of a lordly Imprimatur, one from Lambeth House, another from the west end of Pauls; so apishly romanizing, that the word of command still was set down in Latin; as if the learned grammatical pen that wrote it would cast no ink without Latin; or perhaps, as they thought, because no vulgar tongue was worthy to express the pure conceit of an Imprimatur; but rather, as I hope, for that our English, the language of men, ever famous and foremost in the achievements of liberty, will not easily find servile letters enow to spell such a dictatory presumption English.

[1] Martin V...prohibiting In 1418 Pope Martin V published a bull that condemned the works of John Wycliffe (ca. 1324–1384) and John Huss (ca. 1373–1415), founders of influential movements for religious reform in England and Bohemia respectively.

[2] What follows are Milton's translations of the permissions printed with Bernardo Davanzati's Scisma d'Inghilterra (1638).

[3] "Quo veniam daret flatum crepitumque ventris in convivio emittendi" [Milton's marginal note]: Claudius "thought of an edict allowing the privilege of breaking wind quietly or noisily at table" (Suetonius, Life of Claudius, 32).

And thus ye have the inventors and the original of booklicensing ripped up and drawn as lineally as any pedigree. We have it not, that can be heard of, from any ancient state, or polity or church; nor by any statute left us by our ancestors elder or later; nor from the modem custom of any reformed city or church abroad; but from the most antichristian council and the most tyrannous inquisition that ever inquired. Till then books were ever as freely admitted into the world as any other birth; the issue of the brain was no more stifled than the issue of the womb: no envious Juno sat cross-legged over the nativity of any man's intellectual offspring; but if it proved a monster, who denies, but that it was justly burnt, or sunk into the sea? But that a book, in worse condition than a peccant soul, should be to stand before a jury ere it be born to the world, and undergo yet in darkness the judgment of Radamanth and his colleagues, ere it can pass the ferry backward into light, was never heard before, till that mysterious iniquity, provoked and troubled at the first entrance of Reformation, sought out new limbos and new hells wherein they might include our books also within the number of their damned. And this was the rare morsel so officiously snatched up, and so ill-favouredly imitated by our inquisiturient bishops, and the attendant minorities their chaplains. That ye like not now these most certain authors of this licensing order, and that all sinister intention was far distant from your thoughts, when ye were importuned the passing it, all men who know the integrity of your actions, and how ye honour Truth, will clear ye readily.

But some will say, What though the inventors were bad, the thing for all that may be good? It may be so; yet if that thing be no such deep invention, but obvious, and easy for any man to light on, and yet best and wisest commonwealths through all ages and occasions have forborne to use it, and falsest seducers and oppressors of men were the first who took it up, and to no other purpose but to obstruct and hinder the first approach of Reformation; I am of those who believe it will be a harder alchemy than Lullius ever knew, to sublimate any good use out of such an invention.[1] Yet this only is what I request to gain from this reason, that it may be held a dangerous and suspicious fruit, as certainly it deserves, for the tree that bore it, until I can dissect one by one the properties it has. But I have first to finish, as was propounded, what is to be thought in general of reading books, whatever sort they be, and whether be more the benefit or the harm that thence proceeds?

Not to insist upon the examples of Moses, Daniel, and Paul, who were skilful in all the learning of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Greeks, which could not probably be without reading their books of all sorts; in Paul especially, who thought it no defilement to insert into Holy Scripture the sentences of three Greek poets, and one of them a tragedian;[2] the question was notwithstanding sometimes controverted among the primitive doctors, but with great odds on that side which affirmed it both lawful and profitable; as was then evidently perceived, when Julian the Apostate and subtlest enemy to our faith made a decree forbidding Christians the study of heathen learning: for, said he, they wound us with our own weapons, and with our own arts and sciences they overcome us. And indeed the Christians were put so to their shifts by this crafty means, and so much in danger to decline into all ignorance, that the two Apollinarii were fain, as a man may say, to coin all the seven liberal sciences out of the Bible, reducing it into divers forms of orations, poems, dialogues, even to the calculating of a new Christian grammar. But, saith the historian Socrates, the providence of God provided better than the industry of Apollinarius and his son, by taking away that illiterate law with the life of him who devised it.[1] So great an injury they then held it to be deprived of Hellenic learning; and thought it a persecution more undermining, and secretly decaying the Church, than the open cruelty of Decius or Diocletian.

[1] Lullius Ramón Lull (d. 1315), the best-known medieval alchemist.

[2] Acts 17:28 (quoting Aratus); I Corinthians 15:33 (Euripedes, probably via Menander); Titus 1:12 (Epimenides).

And perhaps it was the same politic drift that the devil whipped St. Jerome in a Lenten dream, for reading Cicero; or else it was a phantasm bred by the fever which had then seized him. For had an angel been his discipliner, unless it were for dwelling too much upon Ciceronianisms, and had chastised the reading, not the vanity, it had been plainly partial; first to correct him for grave Cicero, and not for scurril Plautus, whom he confesses to have been reading not long before; next to correct him only, and let so many more ancient fathers wax old in those pleasant and florid studies without the lash of such a tutoring apparition; insomuch that Basil teaches how some good use may be made of Margites, a sportful poem, not now extant, writ by Homer; and why not then of Morgante, an Italian romance much to the same purpose?[2]

But if it be agreed we shall be tried by visions, there is a vision recorded by Eusebius, far ancienter than this tale of Jerome to the nun Eustochium, and, besides, has nothing of a fever in it. Dionysius Alexandrinus was about the year 240 a person of great name in the Church for piety and learning, who had wont to avail himself much against heretics by being conversant in their books; until a certain presbyter laid it scrupulously to his conscience, how he durst venture himself among those defiling volumes. The worthy man, loath to give offence, fell into a new debate with himself what was to be thought, when suddenly a vision sent from God (it is his own epistle that so avers it) confirmed him in these words: Read any books whatever come to thy hands, for thou art sufficient both to judge aright, and to examine each matter. To this revelation he assented the sooner, as he confesses, because it was answerable to that of the Apostle to the Thessalonians, "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good" [I Thessalonians 5:21]. And he might have added another remarkable saying of the same author: "To the pure, all things are pure" [Titus 1:15], not only meats and drinks, but all kind of knowledge whether of good or evil; the knowledge cannot defile, nor consequently the books, if the will and conscience be not defiled.

For books are as meats and viands are; some of good, some of evil substance; and yet God, in that unapocryphal vision, said without exception, "Rise, Peter; kill and eat" [Acts 10:13], leaving the choice to each man's discretion. Wholesome meats to a vitiated stomach differ little or nothing from unwholesome; and best books to a naughty mind are not unappliable to occasions of evil. Bad meats will scarce breed good nourishment in the healthiest concoction; but herein the difference is of bad books, that they to a discreet and judicious reader serve in many respects to discover, to confute, to forewarn, and to illustrate. Whereof what better witness can ye expect I should produce, than one of your own now sitting in Parliament, the chief of learned men reputed in this land, Mr. Selden;

[1] the two Apollinarii a fourth-century father and son who, when the Emperor Julian forbade Christians from studying secular literature, translated Scripture into verse, drama, and dialogues; Milton's source is Socrates Scholasticus, Ecclesiastical History, 3.14.

[2] Morgante a mock-heroic romance (1481) by Luigi Pulci.

whose volume of natural and national laws proves, not only by great authorities brought together, but by exquisite reasons and theorems almost mathematically demonstrative, that all opinions, yea errors, known, read, and collated, are of main service and assistance toward the speedy attainment of what is truest.[1] I conceive, therefore, that when God did enlarge the universal diet of man's body, saving ever the rules of temperance, he then also, as before, left arbitrary the dieting and repasting of our minds; as wherein every mature man might have to exercise his own leading capacity.

How great a virtue is temperance, how much of moment through the whole life of man! Yet God commits the managing so great a trust, without particular law or prescription, wholly to the demeanour of every grown man. And therefore when he himself tabled the Jews from heaven, that omer which was every man's daily portion of manna [Exodus 16:33] is computed to have been more than might have well sufficed the heartiest feeder thrice as many meals. For those actions which enter into a man, rather than issue out of him, and therefore defile not, God uses not to captivate under a perpetual childhood of prescription, but trusts him with the gift of reason to be his own chooser; there were but little work left for preaching, if law and compulsion should grow so fast upon those things which heretofore were governed only by exhortation. Solomon informs us, that much reading is a weariness to the flesh [Ecclesiastes 12:12]; but neither he nor other inspired author tells us that such or such reading is unlawful: yet certainly had God thought good to limit us herein, it had been much more expedient to have told us what was unlawful than what was wearisome. As for the burning of those Ephesian books by St. Paul's converts; 'tis replied the books were magic, the Syriac so renders them [Acts 19:19]. It was a private act, a voluntary act, and leaves us to a voluntary imitation: the men in remorse burnt those books which were their own; the magistrate by this example is not appointed; these men practised the books, another might perhaps have read them in some sort usefully.

Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed upon Psyche as an incessant labour to cull out, and sort asunder, were not more intermixed.[2] It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to say of knowing good by evil. As therefore the state of man now is; what wisdom can there be to choose, what continence to forbear without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Christian.

I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental whiteness.[3] Which was the reason why our sage and serious poet Spenser, whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas, describing true temperance under the person of Guyon, brings him in with his Palmer through the cave of Mammon, and the bower of earthly bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain.[1] Since therefore the knowledge and survey of vice is in this world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely, and with less danger, scout into the regions of sin and falsity than by reading all manner of tractates and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read.

[3] excremental superficial (OED a^2).

But of the harm that may result hence three kinds are usually reckoned. First, is feared the infection that may spread; but then all human learning and controversy in religious points must remove out of the world, yea the Bible itself; for that ofttimes relates blasphemy not nicely, it describes the carnal sense of wicked men not unelegantly, it brings in holiest men passionately murmuring against Providence through all the arguments of Epicurus: in other great disputes it answers dubiously and darkly to the common reader. And ask a Talmudist what ails the modesty of his marginal Keri, that Moses and all the prophets cannot persuade him to pronounce the textual Chetiv.[2] For these causes we all know the Bible itself put by the Papist into the first rank of prohibited books. The ancientest fathers must be next removed, as Clement of Alexandria, and that Eusebian book of Evangelic preparation, transmitting our ears through a hoard of heathenish obscenities to receive the Gospel.[3] Who finds not that Irenaeus, Epiphanius, Jerome, and others discover more heresies than they well confute, and that oft for heresy which is the truer opinion?

Nor boots it to say for these, and all the heathen writers of greatest infection, if it must be thought so, with whom is bound up the life of human learning, that they writ in an unknown tongue, so long as we are sure those languages are known as well to the worst of men, who are both most able, and most diligent to instil the poison they suck, first into the courts of princes, acquainting them with the choicest delights and criticisms of sin. As perhaps did that Petronius whom Nero called his Arbiter, the master of his revels; and the notorious ribald of Arezzo, dreaded and yet dear to the Italian courtiers.[4] I name not him for posterity's sake, whom Henry VIII named in merriment his Vicar of hell.[5] By which compendious way all the contagion that foreign books can infuse will find a passage to the people far easier and shorter than an Indian voyage, though it could be sailed either by the north of Cataio eastward,[6] or of Canada westward, while our Spanish licensing gags the English press never so severely.

But on the other side that infection which is from books of controversy in religion is more doubtful and dangerous to the learned than to the ignorant; and yet those books must be permitted untouched by the licenser.[7] It will be hard to instance where any ignorant man hath been ever seduced by papistical book in English, unless it were commended and expounded to him by some of that clergy: and indeed all such tractates, whether false or true, are as the prophecy of Isaiah was to the eunuch, not to be understood without a guide [Acts 8:27–35]. But of our priests and doctors how many have been corrupted by studying the comments of Jesuits and Sorbonists,[1] and how fast they could transfuse that corruption into the people, our experience is both late and sad. It is not forgot, since the acute and distinct Arminius was perverted merely by the perusing of a nameless discourse written at Delft, which at first he took in hand to confute.[2]

[1] Milton famously misremembers The Faerie Queene: while Guyon, the Knight of Temperance, does resist the Bower of Bliss (II.xii.42ff.) with the aid of his Palmer (a pilgrim who has been to the Holy Land, and a figure for the reason that restrains passion), his settled habits of temperance allow Guyon to withstand the temptations of Mammon's cave on his own (II.vii.2; viii.3).

[2] Keri...Chetiv terms from Hebraic textual criticism: if a given reading (Chetiv) was thought corrupt or unseemly, a marginal note (Ketiv) provided an emendation or euphemism.

[4] the notorious ribald Pietro Aretino (1492–1557), a writer of famously explicit sonnets, published in illustrated editions.

[7] The Licensing Order in fact specifically provided for such books.

Seeing, therefore, that those books, and those in great abundance, which are likeliest to taint both life and doctrine, cannot be suppressed without the fall of learning and of all ability in disputation, and that these books of either sort are most and soonest catching to the learned, from whom to the common people whatever is heretical or dissolute may quickly be conveyed, and that evil manners are as perfectly learnt without books a thousand other ways which cannot be stopped, and evil doctrine not with books can propagate, except a teacher guide, which he might also do without writing, and so beyond prohibiting, I am not able to unfold, how this cautelous enterprise of licensing can be exempted from the number of vain and impossible attempts.[3] And he who were pleasantly disposed could not well avoid to liken it to the exploit of that gallant man who thought to pound up the crows by shutting his park gate.

Besides another inconvenience, if learned men be the first receivers out of books and dispreaders both of vice and error, how shall the licensers themselves be confided in, unless we can confer upon them, or they assume to themselves above all others in the land, the grace of infallibility and uncorruptedness? And again, if it be true that a wise man, like a good refiner, can gather gold out of the drossiest volume, and that a fool will be a fool with the best book, yea or without book; there is no reason that we should deprive a wise man of any advantage to his wisdom, while we seek to restrain from a fool, that which being restrained will be no hindrance to his folly. For if there should be so much exactness always used to keep that from him which is unfit for his reading, we should in the judgment of Aristotle not only, but of Solomon and of our Saviour, not vouchsafe him good precepts, and by consequence not willingly admit him to good books; as being certain that a wise man will make better use of an idle pamphlet, than a fool will do of sacred Scripture.

'Tis next alleged we must not expose ourselves to temptations without necessity, and next to that, not employ our time in vain things. To both these objections one answer will serve, out of the grounds already laid, that to all men such books are not temptations, nor vanities, but useful drugs and materials wherewith to temper and compare effective and strong medicines, which man's life cannot want. The rest, as children and childish men, who have not the art to qualify and prepare these working minerals, well may be exhorted to forbear, but hindered forcibly they cannot be by all the licensing that sainted Inquisition could ever yet contrive. Which is what I promised to deliver next, That this order of licensing conduces nothing to the end for which it was framed; and hath almost prevented me by being clear already while thus much hath been explaining. See the ingenuity of Truth, who, when she gets a free and willing hand, opens herself faster than the pace of method and discourse can overtake her.

[1] Sorbonists the theology faculty at the University of Paris.

[2] Arminius Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609); his "corruption" was not a conversion to Catholicism but a move to what became known as Arminianism, a form of Protestantism that challenged the strict predestinarian theology of Calvinism. Milton held Arminian views, as is clear from his major poems.

[3] cautelous deceitful, crafty (OED).

It was the task which I began with, to show that no nation, or well-instituted state, if they valued books at all, did ever use this way of licensing; and it might be answered, that this is a piece of prudence lately discovered. To which I return, that as it was a thing slight and obvious to think on, so if it had been difficult to find out, there wanted not among them long since who suggested such a course; which they not following, leave us a pattern of their judgment that it was not the not knowing, but the not approving, which was the cause of their not using it.

Plato, a man of high authority, indeed, but least of all for his commonwealth, in the book of his Laws, which no city ever yet received, fed his fancy by making many edicts to his airy burgomasters, which they who otherwise admire him wish had been rather buried and excused in the genial cups of an Academic night sitting. By which laws he seems to tolerate no kind of learning but by unalterable decree, consisting most of practical traditions, to the attainment whereof a library of smaller bulk than his own Dialogues would be abundant. And there also enacts, that no poet should so much as read to any private man what he had written, until the judges and law-keepers had seen it, and allowed it.[1] But that Plato meant this law peculiarly to that commonwealth which he had imagined, and to no other, is evident. Why was he not else a lawgiver to himself, but a transgressor, and to be expelled by his own magistrates; both for the wanton epigrams and dialogues which he made, and his perpetual reading of Sophron Mimus and Aristophanes, books of grossest infamy, and also for commending the latter of them, though he were the malicious libeller of his chief friends, to be read by the tyrant Dionysius, who had little need of such trash to spend his time on? But that he knew this licensing of poems had reference and dependence to many other provisos there set down in his fancied republic, which in this world could have no place: and so neither he himself, nor any magistrate, or city ever imitated that course, which, taken apart from those other collateral injunctions, must needs be vain and fruitless. For if they fell upon one kind of strictness, unless their care were equal to regulate all other things of like aptness to corrupt the mind, that single endeavour they knew would be but a fond labour; to shut and fortify one gate against corruption, and be necessitated to leave others round about wide open.

If we think to regulate printing, thereby to rectify manners, we must regulate all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightful to man. No music must be heard, no song be set or sung, but what is grave and Doric.[2] There must be licensing dancers, that no gesture, motion, or deportment be taught our youth but what by their allowance shall be thought honest; for such Plato was provided of; it will ask more than the work of twenty licensers to examine all the lutes, the violins, and the guitars in every house; they must not be suffered to prattle as they do, but must be licensed what they may say. And who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers? The windows also, and the balconies must be thought on; there are shrewd books, with dangerous frontispieces, set to sale; who shall prohibit them, shall twenty licensers? The villages also must have their visitors to inquire what lectures the bagpipe and the rebeck reads,[3] even to the ballatry and the gamut of every municipal fiddler, for these are the countryman's Arcadias, and his Montemayors.[4]

Next, what more national corruption, for which England hears ill abroad, than household gluttony:

[1] a paraphrase of Plato, Laws, VII.801.

[2] Doric used by Plato (Republic III.398–99) to describe music that was manly and dignified (see Paradise Lost 1.550).

[3] rebeck a three-stringed violin.

[4] That is, music is the rural equivalent to sophisticated prose romances, such as Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590) and Jorge de Montemayor's Diana (ca. 1559).

who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting? And what shall be done to inhibit the multitudes that frequent those houses where drunkenness is sold and harboured? Our garments also should be referred to the licensing of some more sober workmasters to see them cut into a less wanton garb. Who shall regulate all the mixed conversation of our youth, male and female together, as is the fashion of this country? Who shall still appoint what shall be discoursed, what presumed, and no further? Lastly, who shall forbid and separate all idle resort, all evil company? These things will be, and must be; but how they shall be least hurtful, how least enticing, herein consists the grave and governing wisdom of a state.

To sequester out of the world into Atlantic and Utopian polities which never can be drawn into use will not mend our condition; but to ordain wisely as in this world of evil, in the midst whereof God hath placed us unavoidably. Nor is it Plato's licensing of books will do this, which necessarily pulls along with it so many other kinds of licensing, as will make us all both ridiculous and weary, and yet frustrate; but those unwritten, or at least unconstraining, laws of virtuous education, religious and civil nurture, which Plato there mentions as the bonds and ligaments of the commonwealth, the pillars and the sustainers of every written statute; these they be which will bear chief sway in such matters as these, when all licensing will be easily eluded. Impunity and remissness, for certain, are the bane of a commonwealth; but here the great art lies, to discern in what the law is to bid restraint and punishment, and in what things persuasion only is to work.

If every action which is good or evil in man at ripe years were to be under pittance and prescription and compulsion, what were virtue but a name, what praise could be then due to well-doing, what gramercy to be sober, just, or continent? Many there be that complain of Divine Providence for suffering Adam to transgress; foolish tongues! When God gave him reason, he gave him freedom to choose, for reason is but choosing; he had been else a mere artificial Adam, such an Adam as he is in the motions. We ourselves esteem not of that obedience, or love, or gift, which is of force: God therefore left him free, set before him a provoking object, ever almost in his eyes; herein consisted his merit, herein the right of his reward, the praise of his abstinence. Wherefore did he create passions within us, pleasures round about us, but that these rightly tempered are the very ingredients of virtue?
